CHAP. IV.

The history of France.

SECT. V.

The reigns of Eudes, Charles the Simple, Raoul, Lewis IV. surnamed the Stranger, Lothaire, and Lewis V. in whom ended the race of Charlemagne.

<sup>a</sup> THE crown of France was an object of such importance, as to occupy the thoughts of a great variety of pretenders, who laboured to recommend themselves by very plausible claims, at the same time they were preparing to support them by force. Guy, duke of Spoletto, and Berenger, duke of Frioul, stood both in the fourth degree of descent from Charlemagne; the one springing from a daughter of Lewis the Debonnaire, and the other from the daughter of king Pepin<sup>a</sup>. Lewis, the son of Boson, talked likewise of a kind of right, his mother being the daughter of the emperor Lewis II. and himself adopted by Charles the Bald. He was, however, a child, and his pretensions therefore of little weight; yet in process of time, by the recommendation of the pope, he was chosen king of Arles. About the same time, Raoul, or Rodolph, the son of Conrade, count of Paris, seized the farther Burgundy, and converted it into a kingdom<sup>b</sup>. Herbert, count of Vermandois, shewed himself a kind of competitor, being descended in a right line from Bernard, king of Italy. It is true there was a suspicion of bastardy; but that was of no great importance, since Bernard himself was a bastard, and yet declared king of Italy by Charlemagne, at the request of Lewis the Debonnaire<sup>c</sup>. The most formidable pretender was Arnold, king of Germany, who looked upon himself as emperor, and who, in virtue of his power, thought to become king of France. But the nobility were unwilling to admit of a stranger: and therefore they chose Eudes, count of Paris, the son of the famous Robert le Fort; and some attempts have been made to frame a title for him, as being descended, in a right line, from Childebrand, the brother of Charles Martel, on the father's side, and on the mother's from Adelaide, the daughter of Lewis the Debonnaire<sup>d</sup>. But these stories are at best uncertain. Eudes had a far superior right, arising from the public necessity, the unbiassed voices of the nobility, and his own superior merit. He accepted the crown then, upon these conditions; first, that the consent of Arnold, king of Germany, should be obtained, to prevent his elevation being made the pretence of a civil war; and next, that he should hold this dignity in trust for the right heir Charles the Simple, who was not of age to execute its functions<sup>e</sup>. Under these conditions he was crowned by the bishop of Sens. Soon after he went, of his own accord, to the diet at Worms, where he told Arnold, that he was very ready to resign the ensigns of royalty, rather than involve the French nation in a quarrel on his account; with which generous and candid proceeding Arnold was so much pleased, that he owned him, without scruple, for king of France, and entered into a treaty with him in that capacity<sup>f</sup>.

He defeats the Normans, and suppresses
an insurrection against him in Aquitaine.

THE Normans continuing to desolate the kingdom by perpetual irruptions, sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other, Eudes, who had but a small number of forces, was constrained to supply that defect by vigilance and activity<sup>g</sup>. He had the good fortune to surprize a body, or rather an army, of these plunderers, consisting of near twenty thousand horse and foot, in the neighbourhood of a town called Montfaucon, at the entrance of a wood; and though he had but a thousand horse under his command, yet disposing these into different places, and causing the attack to be made at the same instant, the enemy were broke before they discovered their superiority; and the people of the country, seeing their disorder, fell upon them with such fury, that few or none could make their escape<sup>h</sup>. This victory gained him great reputation; and would, no doubt, have been highly advantageous to France, if an insurrection had not broke out in Aquitain, which made the king's presence necessary there: and though he was so fortunate as to subdue the malecontents with little trouble, yet in the mean time the Normans took Meaux, and breaking their capitulation, destroyed it<sup>i</sup>. They likewise made themselves masters of Troie, Toul, and Verdun, and made a second and third attempt upon Paris, though without effect. They also committed great disorders throughout Lorrain, till they were severely chastised by order of the king of Germany, who, with the assistance of the French, defeated them with great slaughter<sup>k</sup>. All this time the king was employed in establishing his authority, and in repressing those disorders which were so detrimental to the state: and though, in doing this, he shewed all the mildness and moderation possible, yet those who perhaps owed their wealth and their power to nothing but the continuance of these disorders, were extremely offended, and testified their disaffection in such a manner, as induced some of the ambitious nobility, who only waited and wanted such an opportunity to disturb the public peace<sup>l</sup>, to concur with them, and put the kingdom in a flame.

ed in a civil war with the partizans of Charles, the son of Lewis
the Stammerer.

THE first who declared himself openly was count Walgaire, who surprized the city of Laon; and, that he might give some kind of colour to this proceeding, proclaimed king Charles. Eudes, than whom there never was a more active prince, foreseeing the consequences of this revolt, invested the place unexpectedly, and, attacking it with great vigour, compelled the garrison to surrender: he then called count Walgaire to answer before the nobility who were about him, and, upon their adjudging him a traitor, caused him immediately to be beheaded<sup>m</sup>. This act of severity had not the consequences that he expected. Eblon, abbot of St. Denis, who had been the king's most intimate friend, with some other noblemen, raised all Aquitain. Eudes marched thither immediately, and brought things into order barely by his presence<sup>n</sup>. In the mean time, the party of count Walgaire had time to act. They brought over queen Adelaide, and her son Charles, from England; and, being joined by Herbert, count of Vermendois, and Philip, count of Senlis, both descended from Charlemagne, they carried the young prince to Rheims, where he was crowned by Fouques, the archbishop, who wrote a letter to Arnold, king of Germany, to intreat his assistance. This was in some measure obtained; and the party who had Charles at their head came, with a great army, and laid siege to Laon<sup>o</sup>. The inhabitants made a brave defence, which gave Eudes time to come to their assistance, with a small but gallant army; at the approach of which the forces of Charles mouldered away, and he was obliged to retire. Eudes found means to justify himself to Arnold, king of Germany, which he did, by making him sensible that his government was far from being prejudicial to Charles, and that those who were about the young king had his interest much less at heart; and of this he gave a convincing proof, by dividing the kingdom with Charles, and doing homage to him for the small part that he retained<sup>p</sup>. He did not long survive this agreement, dying at La Fere in Picardy, on the 3d of January, in the year 898, in the 40th year of his age, hated by the nobility, whose oppression he had restrained, beloved a by the people, and esteemed by all the world<sup>a</sup>. He left behind him a son, Arnold, to whom some would have given the title of king; but he survived him for so short a space, that it afforded no time for the adherents of his father to take their measures in his favour: they attached themselves, therefore, to Robert, the brother of Eudes, who succeeded him in his county, and was one of the gallantest and greatest men that age produced<sup>r</sup>: and, but for some such spirits, the monarchy had been subverted, as well as the family of Charlemagne.

His competitor being removed, Charles was acknowledged, in his own right, king of France: but, alas! that country was not now what it had been under his predecessors, in point of extent, wealth, or number of people. Arnold, king of Germany, was in possession of Lorraine; and Charles himself had relinquished his claims upon it, in consideration of the assistance and countenance he had received<sup>s</sup>. On the other side, Burgundy was erected into a kingdom, which comprehended what is now called Switzerland, together with the Franche Comté, or at least the best part of it<sup>t</sup>. Lewis, the son of Boson, held the country which has been before described under the name of the kingdom of Arles; and it had been well if, after all these sacrifices, Charles could have been said to hold the rest<sup>u</sup>. But this was so far from being true, that it is very difficult to say what he held, except the title of king, and the power of giving away. It is true that, not long after he mounted the throne, he had a fair opportunity of recovering part of his dominions, and establishing his reputation, by the revolt of the people of Lorraine against the son of Arnold; and accordingly he marched, with a great army, into that country, where he might have done what he had pleased, and, by re-annexing it to the crown, had received an honourable and ample subsistence: but he loved the pleasures of a court, and hated rather the fatigues than perils of a camp; for he was personally brave, and, when necessity required, did his duty as an officer without reproach; but he was naturally indolent, and easily imposed upon<sup>w</sup>. Zuentibold, king of Lorraine, who was much of the same temper, and had lost his dominions by indulging it, perceived what errors were committed by Charles; and though he had but a small body of troops, yet he kept the field, and at length distressed the French in such a manner, that Charles was glad to conclude, by a treaty, a war that ought to have been ended by the sword, and, for the sake of some very small acquisitions, abandoned entirely a kingdom that he had almost obtained<sup>x</sup>. This gave a great blow to his credit; but so long as he enjoyed the assistance of Fouques, archbishop of Rheims, and followed the wise counsels he gave, he in some measure maintained his dignity: but when that prelate was assassinated, by the order of the earl of Flanders, his behaviour procured him the depreciating surname of Charles the Simple; and it is hard to say, whether this be alleviated or exaggerated by what some historians have observed, that, if he had not been unworthy of the crown, he had never been permitted to wear it<sup>y</sup>. Scandalous source of royalty indeed!

THE nobility of France, having had leisure to frame their system, had now the fairest opportunity of carrying it into execution. Such, therefore, as had been intrusted with, or had got into possession of governments, demanded confirmations of them, not barely for life, but to them and to their heirs; and either by their own power, or by the assistance of some great person at court, obtained what they demanded, upon the easy terms of doing homage<sup>z</sup>. It cannot be affirmed that nothing of this kind had taken place before the reign of Charles the Simple, because some instances, perhaps, might be given in earlier times; but the mischief did not become general till now, when, out of one large, well-ordered, and wisely-governed kingdom, there started up a multitude of principalities, in some degree, and but in some degree, dependent on the crown<sup>a</sup>. Considered in this light, they may be truly stiled principalities, though the possessors of them took indiscriminately the titles of dukes, marquises, or counts: nor does it appear, that there was any rank or precedency in these titles: duke had been formerly in most esteem, but that of count seems to have been in most credit now. Under this highest class of nobility there were other considerable lords, who held of them in like manner; and these again had others, who held of them, and even these had their vassals. Instead, therefore, of that easy equal government, regulated by laws and customs, which had hitherto prevailed, a multitude of little insupportable tyrannies were erected<sup>b</sup>.

It has been observed, that the king, by suffering the murder of Fouques, archbishop of Rheims, to whom he had so many and so great obligations, to escape unpunished, though perhaps against his will, lessened him exceedingly in the eyes of his subjects; and their contempt of him was still farther increased by the ravages of the Normans, who, for five or six years together, desolated the finest provinces in France. Those who sailed up the Loire burnt the famous church of St. Martin at Tours; and those who entered the Seine took the city of Rouen by composition, which they had observed with greater fidelity than was customary with this nation<sup>c</sup>. This was ascribed to their chief named Rollo, who was not barely the captain of a numerous banditti, but was, in reality, a great prince by birth; and, which was more, endowed with qualities worthy of his rank and descent. He made use therefore of this place, to serve him for a kind of head quarters; made several expeditions from thence, and, when they were finished, returned thither again, while the French, seeing him lay waste not only all Neustria, but the countries that are now called Artois and Picardy, clamoured against Charles for indolently sitting still in his absence, and not recovering and fortifying Rouen, as he might have done<sup>d</sup>. The king was equally at a loss how to repress these northern invaders, or to silence the outcries of his own people, which were not either the less loud or general, from his having at first encouraged and allied himself with these Normans in the days of king Eudes. At length it was judged most expedient to engage Francon, archbishop of Rouen, to propose to Rollo a truce for five or six months, in which time a stable and solid peace might be made, by the grant of a fair and ample establishment<sup>e</sup>. Rollo, whose parts were not at all inferior to his courage, observed to the archbishop, that of these two propositions the first was directly repugnant to his inclinations and his interests, and the latter perfectly consistent with both: that, notwithstanding this, he was very willing to accept the one, for the sake of the other; and, upon full assurances given on both sides, the truce took place<sup>f</sup>. Richard, duke of Burgundy, that is, the possessor of what is now stiled the dukedom of Burgundy, and some of the great lords of Aquitain, were extremely dissatisfied with this measure, as it appeared alike dishonourable to the king, and dangerous to the public; and therefore, by promising to give him all the assistance he could desire, they prevailed upon him to break the truce, which so provoked Rollo, that he marched immediately, with a considerable body of forces, and invested Chartres<sup>g</sup>. The confederated lords, in pursuance of their engagements, advanced to its relief, attacked the Normans in their camp, and, with the assistance of a sally from the place, at the head of which was the bishop in his robes, forced Rollo to abandon his enterprize, and to retire to an eminence, where they besieged him and his Normans in their turn<sup>h</sup>. However, having, by a stratagem, forced a passage through their camp, Rollo returned to his old station; and being reinforced there by many thousands of his countrymen, renewed his depredations on all sides, with circumstances which very plainly shewed that resentment instigated these excesses<sup>i</sup>.

Rollo compels Charles the Simple to grant him Neustria, with the title of a duchy.

In this critical and perplexed situation of affairs, finding no hopes of the like assistance, Charles suffered himself to be governed by Robert, the brother of Eudes, now stiled duke Robert, who prevailed upon him to recur to the first method of negotiation<sup>k</sup>. Francon, archbishop of Rouen, was again the mediator; and Rollo, though by a great accession of strength he was become more formidable, and, by the usage he had met with, more provoked, yet so great an ascendancy had the prelate over his mind, that he made no scruple of declaring to him, that he was content to treat upon the old basis, provided the treaty was speedy and sincere<sup>l</sup>. Francon, being well instructed, proposed to him three things; the first was, that he should become a Christian, that the king might escape the imputation of giving the Pagans a settlement in France; the second, that he should marry Gisele, the king's daughter, by which Charles might gain an honourable pretence of bestowing the noble country of Neustria as her dowry; and lastly, that he should do homage to the king in the same manner, and hold this country to himself and his heirs on the same terms, as the great lords of France, that it might not be said the king paid greater deference to a stranger, than to the native nobility of his realm<sup>m</sup>. The Norman expressed himself well satisfied with these offers, to which he made only one objection, that the country of Neustria, though extensive, rich, and fertile in itself, was at this time so wasted and depopulated, as not to afford him and his people subsistence; and therefore he desired that he might have some other country assigned him, for the supply of immediate wants<sup>n</sup>. This demand was hard of digestion, and some affirm, that, had it not been for the influence of duke Robert, it might have stopped the treaty. Subsequent events have contributed to render this probable; and yet perhaps it is equally probable, that the same necessity which produced the negotiation, drove it on to a conclusion<sup>o</sup>. The first country offered to Rollo was Flanders, dependent only on the crown of France, and then in the possession of a prince with whom Charles had good reason to be offended; so that there wanted not policy in the offer; yet Rollo rejected it, as lying at too great a distance from Neustria, and being in other respects inconvenient<sup>p</sup>. Bretagne was next mentioned, and accepted. The preliminaries being thus adjusted, the king and this Norman prince had an <sup>a</sup> interview at Saint Clair, upon the Epte, where, in the presence of the whole court, Rollo did homage, in quality of the duke of Neustria, to his new sovereign; but he was somewhat awkward in the performance of the ceremony, and when he came to the last, which was kneeling and making a semblance of kissing the king's foot, he peremptorily refused to go farther. An expedient was found, which was, that one of his guards should do it for him; but it seems all the Normans were bad courtiers, for this lifeguard man tossed Charles's foot chair over. This accident was passed by with much good humour, because resentment had been ill-placed<sup>1</sup>.

On Easter-day, Rollo received, with great solemnity, the rite of baptism; his old friend, duke Robert, being one of the sponsors, and bestowing upon him his own name, which is the reason that, in the French historians, we find him seldom called Rollo after this, but Robert. He was, without question, a prince of extraordinary abilities, since, upon this critical occasion, he acted throughout with the utmost dignity, and with the most consummate prudence<sup>2</sup>. The principal officers in his army, led by his example, became Christians likewise, and, in deference to his councils, entered readily into the plan he proposed for regulating his new state after the model of that of France<sup>3</sup>. He began with establishing bishopricks and religious houses, which he liberally endowed. He appointed governors of districts, with the title of counts; placed under them inferior magistrates; and enacted such laws, as he judged most expedient for bringing his new government into a tolerable condition. He was particularly severe in punishing theft, and in the equal distribution of justice, which he saw was the great basis of policy, and without which his people must naturally recur to their old method of living by robbery and piracy<sup>4</sup>. It is amazing with what speed and success he executed what he had proposed, and in how short a time that ruined and depopulated country was not only filled with inhabitants, but those too vigilant and industrious, and, which was more extraordinary, regular in their manners, and perfectly obedient. One great cause of this, was the resort of the better sort of Normans, from all parts, into his dominions, who, weary of that restless and roving kind of life which they had hitherto led, very gladly came to participate in the advantages which he had procured for the people under his command, which he most readily imparted, as knowing that the power of a prince is always in proportion to the number and employments of his subjects<sup>5</sup>. He complied also, as soon as things were in a tolerable condition, with the intended marriage, though very unequal in point of years; for, at this time, the duke was at least sixty, and the lady could not be above fourteen. Thus Charles, though some of his subjects continually reproached him with it, saw the new duchy of Normandy, for so in honour of its inhabitants it was stiled, thoroughly fixed, and thereby an end put to the terrors so long spread by the Normans. 912.

While these things passed in France, there happened great alterations amongst her neighbours. Arnold, king of Germany, and who also assumed the title of emperor, died, and left behind him two sons; Lewis, by the queen his consort, who succeeded him as king of the Germans and Romans, and Zuintibold, his natural son, king of Lorraine, who would have disputed the whole succession with Lewis; but being slain in battle, the last-mentioned prince added to the rest of his dominions the kingdom of Lorraine. Berenger, whom the emperor Arnold had shut up in a corner of Lombardy, but still preserving the title of king, availed himself of his death, and was again crowned at Pavia<sup>6</sup>. Lewis the son of Boson, king of Arles, passed the Alps with an army, and met at first with such success, that he procured himself to be crowned emperor at Rome; but, in the short space of four years, he fell into the hands of Berenger, who put out his eyes; and he dying not long after, the regal title was lost in his family, Hugo, count of Arles, assuming the title of king. Berenger, pushing this good fortune, compelled pope John IX. to crown him emperor, tho' he had great opposition given him by Lambert, the son of Guy, duke of Spoleto, who, for a time, bore the title of emperor, and who, as some writers say, had been also crowned king of France at Langres<sup>7</sup>. But, in the end, the death of Lambert left him without a rival, and Berenger had the satisfaction of bearing the lofty titles of emperor and king of Italy, being, as we observed, descended by a female from Charlemagne, and the last of his blood who enjoyed sovereign authority on the other side of the Alps. On the other hand, the very year that Charles erected the new duchy of Normandy, Lewis, king of the Germans, Romans, and people of Lorraine, breathed his last, and in him ended the male line of Charlemagne in Germany. Upon which the great lords of that country elected Conrade, duke of Franconia. But the people of Lorraine, more inclined to the French government, or having still an high veneration for the Carlovingian race, resolved to call in the only surviving prince, and to place their crown once more on the head of Charles the Simple<sup>8</sup>.

who by this acquisition was, in some measure, indemnified for the cession he had been forced to make of Normandy. His conduct soon after sufficiently acquainted the world, how much easier it is to acquire kingdoms than to preserve them; more especially when countries are cantoned amongst a powerful nobility, as was the case at this time in Lorraine, as well as France.

Charles devolves all his power on his favourite Haganon and neglects the nobility.

CHARLES, if we may give credit to the bulk of the French historians, had no great abilities as a politician, much less was he capable of managing affairs in so perplexed a situation as they then stood: but he seems to have been sensible of this, and of something more, which was, that he ran a greater hazard in trusting any of his nobility, than in relying on his own parts, slender as they were. It gave him therefore vast satisfaction, when he found one Haganon, a gentleman not distinguished either by birth or fortune, upon whom he could rest the weight of his affairs; and who, though in other respects he might be deficient, possessed two qualities that were truly valuable, fidelity and penetration<sup>a</sup>. Charles, who was an honest and good man, had such an affection for this minister, that he was hardly ever out of his company, and did not keep even the necessary appearances for the grandeess<sup>b</sup>. An instance will explain this clearly. Charles being at Aix la Chapelle, Henry, duke of Saxony, afterwards king of Germany, came to pay his respects to him, and for four days successively missed of an audience, receiving continually the same answer, "The king is busy with Haganon," which so much provoked him, that he took his leave, with this observation; "I make no doubt but, in a little time, one of these two things will happen, either Haganon will seat himself on the same throne with Charles, or Charles will become a private gentleman like Haganon."<sup>c</sup> The king being informed of this, was forced to send Hervé, archbishop of Rheims, to intreat the duke to return, and to endeavour, when he did return, to efface, by his caresses, the bad effects of his indiscretion, which Henry, who was truly a great prince, easily overlooked. But, when verified by the event, this shrewd prediction was universally remembered<sup>d</sup>.

The nobility of France form a resolution of de-posing Charles,
which is avoided by a treaty.

AMONGST the great lords, of whom the king and his minister were most jealous, were the two Roberts, dukes of Normandy and France. The former was his son-in-law, but had never consummated his marriage; and, by the advice of Haganon, he sent two gentlemen to his court to have an eye on his proceedings. These the duchess for a long time concealed; but at length they were discovered, and the duke, without any ceremony, hanged them as spies, which provoked Charles so much, that they were on the point of coming to a rupture<sup>e</sup>. The other duke Robert, out of pure friendship, as he would have it understood, began hostilities first, and acted without scruple against Charles, sending envoys to the duke of Normandy to express his zeal; for which the Norman testifying much gratitude, they went somewhat farther, and acquainted him, that their master had great connections with the French nobility, and doubted not, with his and their assistance, to depose Charles, and to seat himself upon the throne, which his brother Eudes had formerly occupied. To this proposition they received a very unexpected answer. The duke of Normandy told them, that the views of their master were extravagant, and that he was equally incapable of suffering or assisting injustice; which calmed the intestine troubles of the kingdom for some time<sup>f</sup>. But duke Robert, having still the same object in view, and the duke of Normandy being dead, he took advantage of an assembly of the nobility held at Soissons, and engaged the major part of those who were present, not only to expostulate with Charles on the indignity offered to them, by reposing such entire confidence in his minister, but also to give him to understand that they looked upon him as unworthy to be their king, and that they meant to consider him no longer in that light. After this they retired; but, through the interposition of the archbishop of Rheims, and count Hugo, a kind of treaty of pacification was concluded for a year, in consequence of which Haganon was discarded, at least in appearance, and some of the malecontent lords repaired again to court<sup>g</sup>. However, this insincere compromise did not last long, as answering the intentions of neither party.

At length they accomplish
their project,
and crown
duke Robert
at Rheims.

RICHARD, duke of Burgundy, a very wise and very worthy prince, who had always adhered to Charles, dying, the malecontents renewed their intrigues; upon which the king, looking upon the former agreement as void, recalled Haganon, and heaped upon him new favours<sup>h</sup>. The disaffected lords magnified this as a direct breach of the convention, and taking arms, forced Laon, where all Haganon's treasures were; and having distributed these amongst their troops, they no longer kept any measures, but, declaring Charles to be weak and incapable of the royal dignity, proclaimed Robert, duke of France, carried him from thence to Rheims, in a

- a kind of triumph, and there the archbishop Hervé set the crown upon his head, on the last day of June, and died three days after. Charles, in the mean time, collected what strength he could, in order to defend his crown, and reduce his enemies, amongst whom was Gilbert, whom he had made duke of Lorraine, though most of the lords in that country still adhered to his interest<sup>b</sup>. The duke of Aquitaine, and the lords in that country, were for Charles; but Rodolph, the new duke of Burgundy, having espoused the daughter of king Robert, abetted his party with great zeal. Herbert, count of Vermandois, who was a man of parts and power, descended by the male line from Charlemagne, and who had always boasted his loyalty to Charles, deserted him to join Robert, who, that he might leave the unfortunate monarch no resource, went in person to confer with Henry, king of Germany; and having detached him from the interests of his competitor, returned, with a full persuasion, that he should quickly oblige Charles to abandon the kingdom, or, like Charles the Gross, to accept of a precarious subsistence, and lead for the future a private life; the only thing wanting to his own establishment<sup>c</sup>.

- In order to execute this plan, he assembled an army under the walls of Soissons, and having the principal part of his lords about him, consulted with them how their purposes might be soonest effected. In the mean time Charles, having still a good body of troops, but perceiving plainly that he could not provide long for their subsistence, resolved to make a sudden and desperate effort, and passing the river Aisne unexpectedly, surprized Robert and his adherents, as they were going to dinner<sup>d</sup>. That prince, who was naturally brave, immediately mounted and put his troops in the best order he could; but while he encouraged them to do their duty, and carried his own standard in his hand, Charles, who was in the first ranks of his own troops, engaged him, and bore him to the ground with his lance, where he was presently killed: yet his son Hugo, and Herbert, count of Vermandois, not only restored the battle, but, in the end, beat the king's army, and made themselves masters of his baggage, which left them at liberty to consult how they might best prosecute their affairs, and of whom they should make choice to supply the place of their late king, the constitution being now so totally subverted, that the nobility were become hereditary, and the crown elective. This action happened on the 15th of June; and some say the shortness of his reign, others his not being universally owned, prevented the name of Robert from being taken into the list of French kings. The competitors for the succession were Hugo, duke of France, the son of Robert, by the sister of Herbert, count of Vermandois; Herbert himself; and Rodolph, duke of Burgundy, who had espoused Emma, the daughter of duke Robert, and the sister of Hugo. The nobility in general, though they admired the courage and the capacity of Herbert, detested his ingratitude. Hugo, seeing the dispute lay between him and Rodolph, left it to the choice of his sister, who, desirous of being a queen, declared for her husband, and Hugo, as he had promised, procured him to be elected; and accordingly the crown was set upon his head at Soissons, on the 13th of July<sup>e</sup>. The few lords that still adhered to Charles, either pleased with the choice of this prince for the sake of novelty, or through fear of being despoiled of their estates, began to drop away: so that, in a short time, he was as much abandoned as Charles the Gross, his unfortunate cousin, and the victim of other mens ambition.

- In this situation, as weak as his enemies represent him, he did not sink into despair; Rodolph, on the contrary, he endeavoured to retire to William, duke of Normandy, who, like his father, knew no king but him who gave him his duchy; in which, through the vigilance of Rodolph and his party, he was disappointed, which brought him so low, that he was obliged to apply himself to Henry, king of Germany, and to offer to quit in his favour the claims he had on the kingdom of Lorraine, provided he would grant him his assistance<sup>f</sup>. Henry, considering how much he was to be the gainer, and how honourable the enterprize was in itself, determined to undertake it, and began to raise an army for this purpose. King Rodolph began in his turn to feel great apprehensions, well knowing that the dukes of Normandy and Aquitaine disapproved his election<sup>g</sup>. Out of this peplexity he was delivered by Herbert, count of Vermandois, who, dreading the restitution of Charles, sent deputies to implore his clemency, to assure him of his fidelity, and to desire that he would march such forces as he had about him into his country, that he might be the better able to defend it against their common enemies. Charles was the more easily deceived by these deputies, because they were first deceived themselves, and really believed the count to be in earnest. He marched therefore into Vermandois, with a handful of troops, and was received by count Herbert with all possible testimonies of the most profound respect. At first, however, the king acted with some precaution; but being at length persuaded to enter the fortress of Chateau-Thierry, Herbert, the very same night, caused him to be seized in a his bed, and then sent one of his adherents to compliment Rodolph on his having nothing to fear, since Charles was a prisoner for life<sup>p</sup>. The queen of this unfortunate monarch, whose name was Egiva, fled with her son Lewis to the court of her brother in England. Rodolph, having now leisure, turned his arms against William, duke of Aquitaine, who perceiving that he had no assistance to expect, thought it expedient to make the best terms he could for himself; and in order to this, did homage to Rodolph; but it is certain he did this to a conqueror, and not to a king, submitting only because he found himself unable to resist<sup>q</sup> (A). This war was scarce ended, before Rodolph found himself embarked in another against the Normans; by which we are not to understand the subjects of duke William, but a new swarm of these plunderers from the north, commanded by one Rainold, who fell into Burgundy, and wasted it with fire and sword. The king managed this war but with indifferent success; and after lying some time before their intrenchments, was content to let them make their escape<sup>r</sup>. In this state of things, the Normans settled in France broke out into hostilities, on account of some injuries they had received; and while Rodolph was employed in raising an army to bring them to reason, the great lords of Lorraine revolted, and submitted themselves to the king of Germany; which though Rodolph could not possibly help, and in his present circumstances was as little able to resent, yet it lessened his reputation. For the nobility of France were equally jealous of the power of their kings, and ready to despise them if they wanted power; and, on the other hand, the lords of Lorraine expected to be better gratified by the German monarch for bringing him a kingdom, than they could be by Rodolph for preserving it; in which they were chiefly governed by duke Gilbert, who was very nearly allied to the German, though he owed his great preferments to Charles, against whom he was one of the first that revolted<sup>s</sup>.

A BODY of Normans having made an irruption into the county of Artois, Rodolph marched against them with his forces; and as he approached them on one side, Herbert, count of Vermandois, with the whole strength of his estates, advanced on the other, and, by this means, the Normans found themselves besieged in their camp; but as they had been always famous for defending intrenchments with the utmost intrepidity, the king delayed the attack, in hopes of receiving some propositions from them. But the Normans quitting their camp in a dark night, attacked that of the king, forced it, and had infallibly destroyed both him and his army, if the count of Vermandois had not come to his relief. As it was, the king was wounded, the officer who commanded under him killed, and his forces so roughly treated, that he was forced to retire with them to Laon, and leave the Normans to live at discretion, till, by the payment of a sum of money, he procured their retreat<sup>t</sup>. He was chiefly induced to this, that he might humble William, duke of Aquitaine, whom he still regarded as his most formidable enemy. But when he was ready to pass the Loire with a numerous army, or, as some historians say, had actually passed it, he was constrained to return, in order to repel the Hungarians, a most barbarous people, as some authors, particularly Mezeray, assert, who had penetrated through Lorraine to the frontiers of his dominions<sup>u</sup>. The presence of the king, say some, restored peace, and engaged these terrible enemies to retire; but others insinuate, that plunder being their aim, they were induced to retire by receiving a large sum of

(A) This William, duke of Aquitaine, surnamed the Devout, was extremely attached to the family of Charlemagne, and so were all the nobility in the adjacent countries, chiefly on account of the lenity of those princes, who left them in a kind of independency, and expected nothing from them beyond the ordinary compliment of homage, and dating their charters according to the years of their reigns, in which they were, as we shall see very correct. We must observe, that the very title of duke of Aquitaine was derived from the favour of this king, the proper title of this nobleman being count of Auvergne, which, in all probability, might be a government erected by Charlemagne, or Lewis the Debonnaire, which, according to the custom of that time, was become hereditary in this family: but there were many counts in his neighbourhood, not at all inferior to him in birth and fortune, till he was honoured with this title of duke of Aquitaine, which implied nearly the same thing with the king's lieutenant, and in virtue of which he became their superior; and therefore his own dignity, being in a great measure dependent on the prince who bestowed it, bound him strictly to Charles, and rendered him very unwilling to submit to his competi-

tor. How far he did this, and in what way the gentry in these parts, following the example of their lord, evaded acknowledging this prince, otherwise than as a conqueror, appears from a charter still preserved, which is thus dated; 'Done the fifth before the ides of October, in the fourth year since king Charles was degraded by the French, and Rodolph elected contrary to the laws.' Other instances of the same nature might be produced, and particularly the will of this duke's successor, which is dated in the same manner, but a year later. He was the nephew of William, and, upon his demise, the title came to Aimar, count of Poitiers, who likewise inherited the county of Auvergne. We shall see in the text that king Lothaire, the grandson of Charles the Simple, deprived this family of the ducal title, in order to transfer it to Hugo the White, who was duke of France and of Burgundy before. We may likewise collect from hence, the true reason why the title of duke sunk in esteem, which was no other than this, that it implied a dependence, and that they held it from another; whereas they looked upon their counties as their own.

a money. A domestic misfortune followed next : the count of Laon dying, Herbert, who had served the king so much, and whose services had been so well paid, demanded that place, which lay conveniently for him, though the deceased count had left several children ; which favour the king refusing to grant, Herbert turned his eyes upon his royal prisoner, and brought Charles again upon the stage, with all the honours due to a great prince <sup>w</sup>.

HUGO, duke of the country between the Seine and the Loire, stiled commonly duke of France, or of the French, had lately married Ethelinda, the daughter of king Edward, and the sister of Charles's consort, and therefore he entered readily into Herbert's measures. The next point was to engage the duke of Normandy to concur with them, and, in order to this, they had an interview, in which they concluded, first, a marriage between Letgarde, the count's daughter, and the duke, and afterwards a treaty, by which they engaged to set Charles once more upon the throne of France : and, as a farther proof of his sincerity, the duke, in another conference held at Eu, treated Charles with great magnificence, and did homage to him for his dominions *. This turn was so unexpected, and their party was become so formidable, that king Rodolph, leaving Emma his consort in Laon, went into Burgundy to raise an army, with which he quickly took the field, as the confederates likewise did ; but duke Hugo, doubting the issue of the war, negotiated a treaty between king Rodolph and the count of Vermandois, by which he was gratified in respect to the county of Laon, orders being sent by king Rodolph to his consort to deliver it immediately, with which, out of a spirit of womanish obstinacy, she refused to comply. This rendered the reconciliation more difficult ; for Henry, king of Germany, and William, duke of Normandy, insisted that Charles should be restored ; and pope John IX. threatened the count of Vermandois with excommunication if he did not comply with his engagements ; besides, he had given his son over as a hostage to the duke of Normandy, and was therefore obliged to save appearances. With this view he called an assembly of prelates and great lords, in whose presence he did homage, for all his estates, to king Charles <sup>y</sup>, by which he procured his son's liberty ; and, understanding the pope was dead, he summoned king Rodolph to make good his treaty ; and the king, having gained Henry the German, caused the county of Laon to be delivered up to Herbert, so that Charles was once more abandoned ; and Herbert having done homage to his competitor, shut him up again in prison ; upon which the queen Egiva, who with her son had returned into France, withdrew again, by the advice of the duke of Normandy, into England <sup>z</sup>. But Rodolph, having no great confidence in one who had so often deceived him, made a tour to Rheims, and desired that the count of Vermandois would bring Charles thither, which he did ; and Rodolph received him with great respect, and made him very rich presents, as all the nobility and prelates also did, and, at the same time, settled a competent allowance for his maintenance ; which, however, he did not long enjoy, since he died in the castle of Peronne on the 9th of October following, in the 51st year of his age, leaving his competitor in the quiet possession of his dominions <sup>a</sup> (B).

THIS event produced a great alteration in the face of affairs. Rodolph, finding himself more at liberty, resolved to live and act like a king ; he pursued the Normans of the Loire, so called to distinguish them from those of the Seine, now become a flourishing and fixed people, till he had compelled them either to quit the kingdom, or to betake themselves to some settled habitation. In like manner he visited the frontiers, compelled several lords, who had hitherto been subject to the kings of Provence, to do him homage, constrained the duke of Gascony to follow their example, and most of the lords of Languedoc, and the countries adjacent ; who having enjoyed independency so long, were very unwilling to stoop to the yoke. He repelled likewise the Hungarians, or Bulgarians, for we find them called by both names, who made a new irruption, and, in a word, acted in all respects in a manner suitable to his dignity <sup>b</sup>. In these expeditions he was assisted and supported by Hugo, count of France ; but Herbert, count of Vermandois, looked with a very evil eye on all these acquisitions of power, more especially as he plainly saw, that, since the death of Charles the Simple, he was no longer courted and gratified as in times past. In order to convince the king of his importance, he entered into a league with the count of Flanders, to whom he gave his daughter Adila in marriage ; with Gilbert, duke of Lorraine, and Henry, king of Germany, to whom he did homage for his

(B) We have no mention made in any of the ancient historians of the first wife of Charles the Simple, by whom he became the father of Gisele, who espoused Robert, or Rollo, duke of Normandy. His second consort was Fredervne, sister to Beuves, bishop of Chalons, by whom he had Hermentrude, Fredervne, Hildegard, and Rotrude. His third queen was Egiva, or, as the French writers call her, Ogive, or Ogine, the daughter of Edward, surnamed the Elder, and the grand-daughter of Alfred the Great, by whom he had his only son Lewis ; after his decease she espoused, as we shall see in the text, Herbert, count of Troyes, the second son of Herbert, count of Vermandois, who had so long kept her husband in prison.

estates; upon which a war ensued that lasted for many years<sup>c</sup>. The king did not take part therein as principal, but suffered his troops to act under the authority of Hugo, duke of France, who gradually dispossessed the count of most of the best places he held, such as Eu, Amiens, Saint Quintin, Peronne, Ham, Arras, Chateau-Thierry, and, at length, of Rheims, which he held in the name of his son Hugo, whom, by fraud and violence, he had procured to be elected archbishop, when but little more than five years of age; but the king was no sooner in possession of that place, than he promoted Artaud, who was a monk there, to be archbishop of that see, which hurt the count exceedingly<sup>d</sup>. Such were the miseries of those times, and such the disorders in church and state!

The death and character of king Rodolph, after a short and troublesome reign.

It has been before observed, that Herbert had great courage and capacity, though very little candour; and, in the management of this war, though very unsuccessful, he shewed equal firmness and address. He had his emissaries at the courts of the duke of Normandy, the duke of Aquitaine, the duke of Gascony, and, in a word, of all the great lords who had done homage to Rodolph, who were continually whispering, that their master was the champion of the nobility of France, whose title to their estates lay in their possession, and the power to maintain that possession; since, if he was once subdued, they would soon feel the power of the victor, who would not fail to chastise and humble all of them in their turns<sup>e</sup>. By this means he derived secret supplies and succours, which enabled him to continue the war as long as he did; and he not only expressed great fortitude in the continuance of it, but managed it in such a manner as kept up his reputation, both as a great captain and a consummate statesman; so that, on the whole, his character was one of the most singular that stands recorded in history, as at one and the same time he was both detested and esteemed. At length Rodolph blocked him up in Laon, which he surrendered upon terms; and then, beginning to feel himself sinking, and gradually losing the supports he had hitherto received, he attempted, though without effect, to reconcile himself to the king<sup>f</sup>. An accident extricated him from this dilemma. The Bulgarians, with a very formidable army, threatened both Germany and France. The two kings had a conference, at which some of the great lords assisted, and amongst the rest Herbert, count of Vermendois. Henry took this opportunity of representing to Rodolph, how injurious it was to the French nation to waste their forces in these intestine disputes: and having brought him to think in his way upon this head, a peace was concluded under his mediation, and Herbert once more did homage to Rodolph for all his lands. The Hungarians were so frightened by the league concluded at this interview, that they renounced their former designs, and made an irruption into Italy<sup>g</sup>. Hugo, duke of France, who was in possession of most of the places taken from Herbert, was very unwilling to part with them, and upon this the war broke out again: but Rodolph, who was not a prince to be trifled with, declared roundly, that he meant the treaty should be fulfilled; upon which Hugo submitted, and the public tranquillity was restored; his brother Boson, who had seized the city of Dijon (such was the spirit of mutiny in those days), dying of vexation soon after. The king himself did not survive him long; for, having struggled with difficulty through a dangerous distemper in the autumn, he deceased on the fifteenth of January, in the following year, at Auxerre, in the fourteenth year of his reign; and leaving no issue, the duchy of Burgundy fell to his brother Hugh, surnamed the Black<sup>h</sup>. All writers agree that Rodolph was one of the most brave, generous, and prudent princes, who had reigned in that country, and who in better times would, without question, have carried the honour of the nation as high as any of his predecessors; but it was his misfortune to be continually involved in war, in which, though he was personally fortunate, the state felt the weight of every defeat<sup>i</sup> (C).

(C) Some writers have confounded this Rodolph, king of France and duke of Burgundy, with Rodolph, king of Burgundy, who was contemporary with him, and present at the conference with Henry, king of Germany. This monarch Rodolph made a very great figure when he was only duke of Burgundy; and out of that country he drew the best part of what was necessary for the maintenance of his court, as well as most of the troops that formed his army. After the death of Charles the Simple, he remained in quiet possession of so much of the kingdom as had submitted to him; but in Aquitaine he was never owned, as appears by their dating their charters from the death of Charles, adding, Christ reigning, and the king expected. Some writers speak of a former wife, which Rodolph had before he espoused Emma, the sister of duke Hugo; but by her he had no issue: whereas by Emma, or, as some call her, Emina, he had a son, whose name was Lewis, and who, with his mother, died before him, as did also his brother Boson, who was of the whole blood; so that he was succeeded in his hereditary estates by Hugues le Noir, i. e. Hugh the Black, who was but his half brother. This monarch died at Auxerre, in a manner which has been sometimes regarded as a judgment, pediculari morbo, but which was, it seems, a disease not very unfrequent in those days.

- a four or five great abbies, in conjunction with his duchy of France, had a powerful interest, and was besides the son of a king<sup>k</sup>. But he was opposed by Herbert, count of Vermandois, who, though he was not able to raise himself, had yet influence enough to keep Hugo from mounting the throne. At this juncture, Atbelstan, king of the West Saxons, sent ambassadors to William, duke of Normandy, to intreat him to restore a nobleman whom he had banished to his favour, and to use his endeavours that the claim of his own, and the duchess of France's nephew, should not be over-looked by the great lords of France. William yielded to both requests, and applied himself vigorously to duke Hugo, beseeching him to consider how honourably he might gratify his ambition, by bestowing a crown, which he might find it very difficult to seize; and Hugo, without much delay, embraced the proposal<sup>l</sup>. His concurrence removed all obstacles, so that the nobility appointed a deputation, at the head of which was William archbishop of Sens, to go over to the court of Atbelstan, and invite the dowager of Charles the Simple, and his and her son Lewis, to return. These deputies having done homage to the young king, returned with him to the court of France; which put an end to the interregnum, when it had lasted five months<sup>m</sup>.

- LEWIS* the fourth, surnamed the Stranger, in French, D'Outremer, that is, from beyond the sea, landed at Boulogne, but without his mother; where he was met by Hugo, duke of France, and many of the nobility, who conducted him to Laon, and there the ceremony of his coronation was performed with great solemnity, on the twentieth of June, by Artaud, archbishop of Rheims, in the presence of twenty other prelates, and most of the great lords. As the young king was but in the seventeenth year of his age, and had been bred up in England, it was presumed that he could not be sufficiently acquainted with public affairs to direct them without assistance; and therefore it was judged expedient to assign him a tutor; to which high employment Hugo, duke of France, was unanimously called<sup>n</sup>. By his advice the young king marched with an army into Burgundy, against Hugo the Black, the brother of his predecessor, who had seized the town of Langres, and sufficiently discovered an inclination to render himself independent. Upon the approach of the king the place was abandoned; and the duke of Burgundy, plainly perceiving that he was in no condition to resist, submitted to divide his dominions with the other Hugo. The king, young as he was, disliked this measure exceedingly, and declared that he would not act by the advice of duke Hugo any longer; which, if we consider his youth, his obligation to him for setting him on the throne, and the excessive power of that potent duke, was a very singular and brisk attempt<sup>o</sup>. Hugo resigned with a good grace, reconciled himself immediately to Herbert, count of Vermandois, and put him upon taking up arms; which he did, and soon after surprised Laon, though in the hands of duke Hugo. The king, upon this, found it necessary to accommodate matters with his old tutor; by which public tranquility was restored. But Lewis, perceiving that he had little more than the title of king, invited over his mother Egiva; and, having formed a good party amongst the lords, resolved to emancipate himself, cost what it would; which, considering he was scarce twenty, and had already seen how great both the power and influence of Hugo was, must certainly appear a bold, if not a rash, undertaking; more especially if we remember how slender a domain, and how little authority, this monarch really had; so that it might be truly said, there was in this dispute a great title on one side, and over-grown power on the other, the people being squeezed between both<sup>p</sup>.

- Hugo*, duke of France, was, beyond all controversy, one of the ablest men, as well as one of the greatest lords, in France: he recalled the king out of policy, and very possibly might have no intention to depose him: but however he let no opportunity slip, either of curtailing that prince's power, or of augmenting his own. It was with this view that he entered into a league with the duke of Normandy, the count of Vermandois, the count of Flanders, and other great lords, while Lewis likewise formed a league of such as were well-affected to him, or were jealous of the power of duke Hugo. The chief of those was Hugo the Black, duke of Burgundy, Artaud, archbishop of Rheims, the count of Poitiers, and one or two more. Soon after, Gilbert, duke of Lorraine, quitted the malecontents; and detaching himself from Otbo, king of Germany, whose sister he had married, called in the French monarch, who penetrated with his army as far as the Rhine; but Hugo, duke of France, foreseeing that, if the king remained in quiet possession of Lorraine, it would afford him a great accession of power, made such a diversion as obliged the king to leave his new conquests<sup>q</sup>. Soon after, Gilbert, duke of Lorraine, being beaten by the Germans, fell into a river in his flight, and was drowned; upon which, in a convenient space, Lewis espoused his widow Gerberg, the sister of Otbo, king of Germany, though she had already two children. The confederates, after amusing the king with a vain negotiation, attacked Rheims; and, having taken it, replaced Hugo, son to the count de Vermandois, and gave archbishop Artaud some abbies by way of equivalent. Being encouraged by this success, they next laid siege to Laon, a city strong and well fortified, where the king kept his court, and indeed almost the only place that belonged to him. Lewis, being well assured the place would make a good defence, went into Burgundy to raise an army, with which he came time enough to save it; but had the misfortune to be afterwards beaten by them in battle, from whence he had much ado to escape; and retiring to prince Charles Constantine in Dauphiny, who was descended from the kings of Provence, he received him with great respect, and promised him all the assistance in his power<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time the king applied to Stephen the eighth, who sent a legate into the kingdom, with letters, requiring the great lords to submit themselves to the king, and put an end to the troubles with which the kingdom was distracted. Otho, king of Germany, consented to a truce for two months, and, under the mediation of William duke of Normandy, a peace was concluded; by which an end was put to this civil war<sup>2</sup>.

A. D. 942.

The king endeavours to deprive the young duke of Normandy of his dominions.

THE tranquillity of France was not of any long continuance; for the author of it, William duke of Normandy, being basely assassinated, by the procurement of Arnold, count of Flanders, and Herbert, count of Vermandois, dying about the same time, things wore quite a new face. Lewis had just reason to dislike that family, and this led him to think of despoiling them; but besides, the children of the deceased count being very formidable, and living in strict union with each other, they were protected by Hugo, duke of France, with whom the king would not quarrel<sup>3</sup>. On the contrary, he was so bent on gaining him to his interest, that he not only confirmed to him, in the most solemn manner, the county of Paris and the duchy of France, but likewise bestowed upon him the other moiety of the duchy of Burgundy, and thereby rendered him, beyond comparison, more formidable than himself: a thing so contrary to the rules of policy, and to the disposition of the king, that historians are able to account for it no otherwise, than by supposing he made him privy to his designs, and obtained his consent to them. If this was the truth, and there is great appearance it was so, it does very little honour either to the king or to the duke; for the design of Lewis was to deprive Richard, the son of duke William, then a child, of the country of Normandy. With this view he detached some of the Norman lords from their duty on one side, while the duke of France did the like on the other; and then, under pretence of correcting these disorders, he went in person into Normandy, and made his entry into Rouen, where he was received, with all possible submission, by Bernard the Dane, to whose care duke William had committed his son<sup>4</sup>. The king, seeing himself punctually obeyed in all things, ventured to seize the person of the young prince, which excited a general insurrection: and the king was intimidated thereby to such a degree, that he brought out the child to the populace, and assured them he had no other intention than to breed him up as his own son. Having thus put an end to the tumult, he received the homage of Richard publicly, and made such professions of kindness to the child, that the Normans suffered him to carry their young prince to Laon. He had not been long there before the count of Flanders caused it to be insinuated to him, that, this young prince once removed, nothing could hinder his re-uniting that duchy to the crown<sup>5</sup>. Black as it was, the king was too much inclined to this advice; of which Osman, who was governor to the duke, having notice, he bid the child feign himself sick; and this creating some confusion, and rendering those about him less watchful, Osman, in the disguise of a groom, bundled up the boy in a truss of hay, and clapping him on his shoulder, carried him to the stables; and, having mounted him on a fleet horse, carried him to the castle of Bernard, count of Senlis, his uncle by the mother's side, who positively refused to deliver him up either to the king or to the Normans<sup>6</sup>.

Is over-reached by the Normans, his army beaten, himself made prisoner.

IN this conjuncture, Hugo, duke of France, with several other great lords, interceded, on the behalf of the young prince, and laboured to engage the king to leave him in the quiet possession of his duchy. Lewis, on the other hand, suggested to Hugo, that, if he would consent to the execution of his scheme, he should have part of the spoil. This had its effect; the king, at the head of a body of troops, marched to Rouen, where he was received with the most profound submission, and where Bernard the Dane, and his associates, who had administered the government, did not appear averse to the king's project; but seemed to listen with satisfaction to his promises<sup>7</sup>. But duke Hugo entering with his forces into the country of Bayeux, which was to be his by the agreement, Bernard the Dane, and the count de Senlis, represented to the king, that the inhabitants of the whole duchy were willing to become his subjects, and thereby prevailed upon him to send an order to Hugo to retire; which he obeyed indeed, but with great discontent<sup>8</sup>. Soon after Aigrol, king of Denmark, made a descent on

- a the coast of Normandy. This prince, being driven out of his own dominions, had taken shelter there in the time of duke William; who having generously protected him, he now acted on behalf of his son. Bernard pretended to act zealously for the king, till, the armies being near each other, he prevailed upon him to consent to a conference: in which being betrayed, the French army was suddenly attacked, and, the Normans joining with the invaders, were totally routed, with the loss of eighteen counts upon the spot, the king himself being taken in the pursuit, and carried prisoner to Rouen<sup>a</sup>. He reproached Bernard the Dane as the author of his misfortune; who very calmly answered, that deceivers had no right to complain of deceit; and that fulfilling the will of his dead, and being faithful to his living, master, he had nothing wherewith to reproach himself. But, complaints availing nothing, the king was forced to
- b have recourse to intreaties<sup>b</sup>.

- THE queen Gerberg, in order to recover the king's liberty, applied herself first to her brother Otho, who absolutely refused to intermeddle, being highly displeased with his brother-in-law's conduct. Upon this she was constrained to address herself to duke Hugo; who not only behaved towards her with great respect, but entered very zealously into the design of procuring the king's liberty; which was effected by a treaty with the Normans, upon condition that the former grants of the duchy should be renewed and confirmed, not only by the king, but by all the bishops and great lords of the kingdom<sup>c</sup>. It was farther stipulated, that two prelates, and one of the king's children, should be given as hostages for the due performance of the treaty; and, all this being punctually executed, the Normans delivered Lewis out of his captivity into the hands of the duke of France. But he quickly found that this was only a change of prisons; for Hugo kept him a full year, nor would he restore him to freedom at last, till the county and city of Laon were delivered up to him, as a reward for the trouble he had taken in this negotiation, which he granted to the count de Chartres; and thus, at the issue of this difficult and dangerous affair, the king found himself in worse circumstances than ever<sup>d</sup>. He had all the resentment possible against the duke, but little or no power to make that resentment be felt. He carried his complaints to England and to Germany; and having prevailed upon his brother-in-law Otho to consent to an interview, he offered, in case he would enter into his views, to make a free-cession of all his rights to the kingdom of Lorraine. That prince had other reasons, though that was the avowed motive, for accepting of the proposition; for duke Hugo, having given his daughter Emma to Richard duke of Normandy, was become thereby formidable even to Otho himself; and, indeed, it was owing to the great strength of this potent lord, and to the methods he took to augment it daily, that king Lewis found himself in a condition to form a new alliance<sup>e</sup>. A. D. 946.

- ARNOLD, count of Flanders, and Conrade, king of Burgundy, entered immediately into this league, and their forces, having joined those of the two kings, formed altogether a very numerous and potent army; with which they threatened absolute destruction to duke Hugo and the Normans<sup>f</sup>. The first part of the storm fell upon the city of Rheims; which archbishop Hugo, son to the deceased count of Vermandois, very gallantly defended, but at length was forced to submit, and to surrender at discretion; and upon this archbishop Artaud was restored. The two kings, Otho and Lewis, attempted next to reduce Senlis; but the place being strong, and gallantly defended, they were obliged to raise the siege<sup>g</sup>. They next entertained thoughts of attacking Paris, after ravaging all the duchy of France; but the count of Flanders persuaded them that was impracticable, and, to gratify his private resentment, drew the confederate army into Normandy, under pretence of surprising Rouen. Finding this not to be done, they besieged it, and, what between the badness of the season, and the fatigue given them by a vigorous resistance, they were so reduced, that Otho called a council of his own generals, to propose the delivering up of the count of Flanders to the Normans, in order to obtain their permission to make a retreat<sup>h</sup>. The council rejected this proceeding, of which count Arnold had a hint. Upon this, about midnight, preceded by his baggage, his troops began to march, and the rest of the army, not having the least suspicion of it, took it for a corps of Normans advancing to the relief of the place; and, decamping hastily, made such a retreat as differed little from a downright flight, the Normans falling into and cutting off the French in their rear. The next year duke Hugo besieged Rheims, as the king did Monstreuil, both without effect; upon which followed a truce. King Lewis had also another interview with his brother-in-law Otho, on the banks of the river Kar, then esteemed the boundary between France and Lorraine, as it anciently was between the kingdoms of Austrasia and Neustria<sup>i</sup>. 947.

But, notwithstanding this, duke Hugo compels the king to make peace.

The death of Lewis, and the conduct of Hugo at that critical juncture.

THE next year there was a council held at Verdun, in which Robert archbishop of Treves presided, in order to determine the perplexed cause between Hugo and Artaud, each of them claiming to be archbishop of Rheims; where Hugo was condemned for contumacy. The pope, however, sent a legate into France, with instructions to call a general council of the bishops in that kingdom, and in Germany, to determine not only this, but the more important dispute between the king and duke Hugo. This council was accordingly held at Ingelheim, and the two kings, Otho and Lewis, assisted thereat in person; and in the end not only the archbishop Hugo, but also the count of Chartres, and duke Hugo himself, were excommunicated: the king of Germany, having furnished a considerable body of troops in support of the decrees of the council, took several places<sup>k</sup>. The next year the king surprized Laon, but was not able to take the citadel; which, at length, upon the clapping up of a peace at an interview between the duke and duke Hugo for that purpose, was surrendered into his hands. The king took the advantage of this short interval of peace to make a tour into Aquitaine, in order to receive the homage of the great lords in those quarters, and to dispose them, if possible, to a greater degree of obedience than they had hitherto shewn; but, while he was thus employed, he met with two misfortunes; the first was, that the Hungarians made an irruption into Champagne, where they committed intolerable devastations<sup>l</sup>; and the other was the elopement of his mother, the queen dowager Egiva, whom, not without reason, he had confined at Laon, and who, in his absence, making her escape, espoused, though she was forty-five years of age, Herbert count of Troyes, a younger son of Herbert count of Vermandois, who had held her husband and the king's father so many years in prison, and was the principal author of these confusions and troubles: neither was he less restless than his father<sup>m</sup>.

THE quarrels between the two archbishops, as well as those between the king and duke Hugo, were rather suspended than composed by the late hasty peace; so that they broke out again into fresh excursions. The duke, however, who saw that nothing followed from these intestine wars but common destruction, consented to leave all his claims in the hands of his consort, who was the queen's sister; and Lewis readily following his example, the two princesses made a stable and settled peace<sup>n</sup>. This left the king at liberty to resume the affairs of Aquitaine, and to take other steps for the maintenance of his authority, as well as for repressing the Hungarians, who had pushed their ravages as far as the country now called Picardy. But while he was thus employed, as he was upon the road between Laon and Rheims, and had by chance started a wolf, as he was riding in full pursuit of the beast, his horse stumbled and threw him; by which he was bruised all over in so lamentable a manner, that it proved the occasion of his death, which happened on the 15th of October, in the nineteenth year of his reign, and the thirty-third of his life<sup>o</sup> (D). He was interred at Rheims, in the church of

(D) It is justly observed by the French historians, that the surnames of all the house of Charlemagne, from the decease of that emperor, were marks of contempt, this prince and his son only excepted. We may, indeed, collect from the reign of Lewis the fourth, that he did not want either parts or courage, though, at the beginning of it, he certainly wanted prudence. There is a strange story concerning them, which some writers, otherwise of credit, have copied, though the bare relation of it is sufficient to shew it fictitious, and at the same time absurd. The king, say they, pretended to have received dispatches of great importance from his uncle Athelstan, and, having summoned his great lords together, told them, that the king desired to consult him as to the judgment that ought to be passed on a vassal; who, having invited his lord to his own house, had betrayed him. The count of Vermandois, upon this, rose up and said, Such a man, without doubt, ought to be hanged. Lewis cried out immediately, Thou hast pronounced sentence on thyself, and ordered him to be taken to a mountain near Laon, from thence, as they say, called Mount Herbert), where he was hanged upon a gibbet. Flodoart the historian, who was once his prisoner, and hated him ever, is so far from saying this, that he mentions his dying in his bed. Another historian, whose testimony is of the greatest weight, assures us, that the traitor Herbert, being seized with a violent sickness, was put in mind of the necessity of repentance, in order to salvation; and he thereupon cried out, There were twelve of us who conspired against

Charles, there were twelve, there were twelve; repeating these words till he expired. Lewis had only one consort, Gerbergh of Saxony, daughter of Henry king of Germany, and the sister of the emperor Otho the first, by whom he had seven children; Lothaire, who succeeded him; Carloman, who died an hostage at Rouen; Lewis, who likewise died young; Charles, of whom we shall have occasion to say a great deal; Henry, his twin brother, who died in his cradle; Maud, who married Conrad the first, king of Burgundy, by whom she had Conrad the second, Rodolph the third, Burchard, archbishop of Lyons, Bertha, who married the count of Blois, and Gerberg, who married the emperor Conrad: the youngest of this monarch's children was Aldrade, married to Rainald, count of Rouci. At the time of this king's death, he had but two sons surviving, Lothaire and Charles. To the latter, contrary to the customs hitherto in use, he gave nothing in partition, either because he was in his infancy, or, which is infinitely a stronger and better reason, because he perceived that this pernicious custom had been one of the many causes that had sunk the crown so low. But, whatever were his motives, his example was of such weight with his successors, though not of the same line, that they followed it steadily; so that, from his time, we meet no more with divided territories or dominions, cantoned out, like a private patrimony, to gratify the private affections of the parent, contrary to his duty as a prince, often at the expence of the family for whose sake it was done, but always at the expence of the people.

- a St. Remy, and was much regretted by his subjects. Duke Hugo, whose power was greater than ever, might easily have made an advantage of this accident; but either his virtue or his politics dictated a nobler conduct, so that, as soon as he received this news, he offered his service to the queen dowager, and promised to see the crown set upon the head of her eldest son, who was then in the fourteenth year of his age<sup>p</sup>. It is true that the late king had the precaution to cause his son to be saluted by the regal title in one of the last assemblies he held; but this would have signified little, since he had no army to support him, no treasure sufficient to raise one, and no territory in possession, comparable, in any degree, to the estates held by the duke; who was, at this time, not inferior in credit to the old mayors of the palace.
- b In discharge of the promises he had made to the queen, Hugo the Great, as he was now commonly stiled, came to Laon, attended by several great lords and prelates; and, having conducted him from thence to Rheims, caused him to be there solemnly crowned by the archbishop Artaud. The king, in recompence of this service, created him duke of Aquitaine. This gives us some light into the distinction that is to be observed in respect to persons honoured with this title<sup>q</sup>. Some, though but few, preserved it in right of the countries they held by descent, such as the duke of Gascony; but for the most part it was a title, and very often no more than a title, implying, that the person who bore it was invested with the king's authority, and was to be considered as his lieutenant in the county to which it was referred. An instance will make this plain; Hugo, of whom we are speaking, was count of Paris, and lord of many other places, in virtue of his descent; we cannot say by hereditary right, because this was hitherto contested by the crown; but he held the title of duke of France, and also that of duke of Burgundy, by royal grants; which titles the crown might at any time resume, if they were in a condition for exacting obedience<sup>r</sup>. But the transactions of the succeeding year will set this matter in a yet clearer light. Lothaire resided, as his father had done, at Laon; which was at least the most considerable domain that was left to the crown, and so much the more valuable, as it was a strong place, in which they might safely reside, without fear of being surpris'd. The king had besides some other small estates, and many royal houses scattered through his dominions, the revenues of which served to defray the expences of his court. When he had occasion for troops, they were furnished him by his vassals, that is, by such as were in a humour to furnish them; for, though they were alike bound to this service, yet if they had any private or particular war of their own upon their hands, had entered into contrary engagements, or were not disposed to obedience, they made very light of the commands of a king, who was not in a condition to punish their contempt of them. This was the case more especially of the great lords; such as the counts of Paris, of Vermendois, of Flanders, and several others, who were each of them richer and more powerful than their master<sup>s</sup>.
- c
- d

THE next spring Hugo, duke of France, came with a powerful army to Laon, in order to carry the young king into Aquitaine, to establish him in his new dignity; which hitherto had been possessed by the count of Poitiers, who opposed him, in conjunction with many of the nobility. Hugo thereupon laid close siege to the place, and made himself master of a fortress that was built to cover it; but finding the city made a stronger resistance than he expected, and being intimidated by a clap of thunder that broke over his tent, he thought fit, at the end of two months, to raise the siege<sup>t</sup>. The count of Poitiers intended, with his new-raised forces, to attack him in his retreat; of which Hugo having intelligence, shewed his military skill in disposing his troops in order of battle, and advancing to meet him. The dispute was short and bloody; but in the end the count was beat, and made his escape with great difficulty<sup>u</sup>. The next year this great man died, who, without wearing the crown, had for the best part of his life held the supreme power in France, being the son, and, as it afterwards proved, the father, of a king, and brother-in-law to three kings<sup>v</sup> (E). He left his eldest son

(E) The courage and conduct of duke Hugo, joined to his hereditary estates and illustrious descent, naturally gave him, more especially considering the times in which he lived, that extensive influence, of which the reader has seen so many instances in the text. He was the son of king Robert, who, while he held the inferior title of duke, is allowed to have fixed the Normans in France; for which reason the princes of that line had always a great affection for his family. He was slain, as some assert, by the hand of Charles the Simple; but his son, notwithstanding, obtained the victory. This duke was likewise the nephew of Eudes, or Otho, king or regent of France, in the minority of Charles the Simple. Both these kings, Eudes and Robert, were the sons of Robert le Fort, count of Anjou and duke of France, under the reign of Charles the Bald; who, as some say, espoused his sister. Higher than this the genealogy cannot be traced with certainty. Cotemporary writers, indeed, say, that this Robert was a man of great quality, and very noble by his birth, the lustre of which, it seems, made

Hugh Capet especially recommended to the care of Richard duke of Normandy, as he was then but sixteen years of age, and his other three sons were in their infancy, and under the tutelage of their mother, who was a sister to the queen dowager. This did not hinder great disputes between them, which might have been attended with untoward consequences, if it had not been for the influence of Bruno, archbishop of Cologne, brother to both these princeſſes, and uncle as well to the children of the duke of France as to the king*.

THIS great prelate was intruſted by his brother, the emperor, with almoſt ſovereign power in Lorrain; and that he might have a title ſuitable to his dignity, that of archduke was deviſed in his favour, which is the firſt time that we meet with any mention of this honour. It was by his influence over the children of duke Hugo, that the two eldeſt, as ſoon as they had attained to proper age, went to the court of Lothaire, and did homage for their lands; which was ſo acceptable to the monarch, that he beſtowed on Hugh, the eldeſt, afterwards ſurnamed Capet, the title of duke of the Franks, which his father had enjoyed, as alſo the county of Poitiers; that is, he gave him leave to get poſſeſſion of it as ſoon as he could; and intitled the younger, Henry, duke of Burgundy, in hopes of attaching them to his intereſt†. In this, perhaps, he acted wiſely; but his conduct towards the duke of Normandy does not deſerve the like commendation. Arnold, count of Flanders, and his ſon Baldwin, Thibaut, ſurnamed the Trickſter, count of Chartres, and Geoffrey, count of Anjou, perſuaded him to make a ſcandalous attempt upon the perſon of duke Richard, by inviting him to a conference, where he was to have been ſeized, that the king might have an opportunity of re-annexing that noble province to the crown; into which ſnare the duke had certainly fallen, if it had not been for two knights belonging to the count de Chartres. They meeting him upon the road, informed him of what was intended againſt him, and gave him an opportunity of retiring in time; for which he was ſo grateful as to reward the one with his ſword, and the other with the gold chain which he wore. The king, finding the plot had miſcarried, diſavowed it in very high terms, ſummoned the duke to do him homage, and laid a new ſcheme for ſurpriſing him. But Richard took ſuch precautions, that this alſo failed; and Lothaire and his confederates, perceiving that nothing could be done by fraud, had recourſe to force, and invaded his dominions, but with no great ſucceſs. In the courſe of the war, however, the duke of Normandy found himſelf ſo much preſſed, that he was conſtrained to ſend for ſuccours to Denmark; which brought a fleet and army of pagans into France, who committed moſt grievous ravages; which ſo irritated the clergy againſt the count de Chartres; who was conſidered as the author of theſe diſturbances, that they threatened him with excommunication, and endeavoured to negociate a peace with duke Richard, without aſking the king's conſent‡.

made it unneceſſary for them to be more particular; and this has plunged their ſucceſſors into the greateſt uncertainty. Some will have this Robert to have been of a Saxon family, and others of an Italian. An attempt has been made to trace his genealogy from Clodian, and conſequently from Pharamond; but, with much greater probability, he is reckoned by many to have deſcended from Childebrand, the younger brother of Charles Martel. The truth of the matter is, that, after his ſon Hugh Capet was placed upon the throne, it was thought a point of conſequence to do all poſſible honour to a line that, in reality, ſtood in no need of ſuch inventions, as being in itſelf, and beyond all contradiction, ſufficiently noble. For whether this duke Hugo did ſpring, or did not ſpring, from the brother of Charles Martel, or whether his grand-mother was or was not the daughter of Lewis the Debonnaire, it is very certain, that he was, by his mother, deſcended from Charlemagne, ſince ſhe was the daughter of Herbert, the firſt count of Vermandois, the ſon of Pepin, the ſon of Bernard king of Italy, who was grandſon of that monarch. He was alſo great in point of alliances; king Rodolph was his brother-in-law; the potent and reſtleſs count of Vermandois married his aunt, and they were couſin Germans before by the mother's ſide; the counts of Chartres and Angoulême were likewise his couſins. The great influence ariſing from theſe connections he maintained and augmented by his marriages; his firſt confort was

Judith, ſaid to be the grand-daughter, by the mother's ſide, of Charles the Bald. His ſecond was Ethelinda, the daughter of Edward the elder, and ſiſter to Athelſtan, king of the Weſt Saxons. By neither of theſe had he any iſſue. He therefore eſpouſed Hadviga, or Avoya, of Saxony, daughter to Henry the Fowler, king of Germany, ſiſter to the emperor Otho the Great, and to Gerberg queen of France. He had by her Hugh Capet, Otho, Eudes, and Henry, ſucceſſively dukes of Burgundy, and two daughters, Beatrix, who eſpouſed Frederick duke of the Upper Lorrain, and Emma, who became the wife of Richard the firſt, duke of Normandy. Nor was he leſs conſiderable in point of property; for, beſides the duchy of Burgundy, part of which, as far as the Saonne, he claimed by deſcent; he held alſo the duchy of France, which, beſides the two great cities of Paris and Orleans, comprehended the counties of Gaſſinois, Chartres, Perche, Blois, Tours, Anjou, and Maine, together with the lands of Sologne, at leaſt as much of them as lay in the Orleannois. By this means he had a great many noblemen who held immediately of him, and not of the crown; ſo that we need not wonder that he was capable of maintaining himſelf againſt monarchs, who, except the towns of Laon, Soiſſons, and La Fere, and a few country places that ſerved them for ſubſiſtence, had in reality nothing that they could, properly ſpeaking, call their own.

a THE count, however, was before-hand with them. He sent privately to duke Richard, offering to come to Rouen, upon a safe conduct from him; which, having once obtained, he readily performed, and proposing to restore Evreux, which the king had taken and bestowed upon him, a peace was very speedily concluded, and, not long after, all points in dispute with the king were likewise adjusted; yet these treaties did not produce immediately that tranquillity which might have been expected from them. The Normans, lately arrived from Denmark, formed a considerable body of troops, and had a great navy upon the coast, ready to attend their motions. They totally disapproved this conduct in duke Richard; affirming that they did not come into France purely for his service, but also for their own, and in order to carve out for themselves a settlement by force of arms. The duke made use of fair words to pacify them, and at length brought them to agree to leave behind such as were disposed to embrace the Christian religion, for whom he was in an ample manner to provide; and that the rest, before their return home, should each of them receive a considerable sum of money, in compensation of that plunder which they might otherwise have made. Thus both the kingdom and duchy were stripped of a vast sum, in order to get rid of these troublesome invaders<sup>a</sup>.

THIS war was no sooner extinguished, than there broke out another against the young count of Flanders, grandson to Arnold, from whom the king was desirous of taking a part of his lands. The duke of France, Hugh Capet, and his brethren, who were successively dukes of Burgundy, assisted the king powerfully in his expeditions, by which he held himself much obliged. At length, by the interposition of the duke of Normandy, when much blood had been shed on both sides, peace was made, and the young count of Flanders received all the places of which he had been spoiled<sup>b</sup>. The king, to strengthen himself, as well as to secure the succession, espoused Emma, the daughter of Lothaire, king of Italy, and gave his sister Matilda to Conrade, king of Burgundy, and took other steps for reviving and sustaining the house of Charlemagne; though these endeavours, as we shall see hereafter, proved but ineffectual, notwithstanding that, at this time, his power was far superior to that which either his father or his grand-father had enjoyed, the dukes of France and Burgundy adhering as steadily to him as their ancestors had been obstinate in distressing his predecessors<sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 970.

THE kingdom remained in quiet, and Lothaire, by a prudent management of the prerogatives still left in the crown, found means to augment his own authority, and to diminish the power of the nobility, by involving them in wars with each other; and, when they were sufficiently weakened, acting as a mediator. In process of time an opportunity seemed to offer for extending this sort of policy beyond the bounds of France, and Lothaire was resolved not to let it slip<sup>d</sup>. The country of Lorraine had been long in dispute between the kings of France and Germany; the lords, who were in actual possession of this great country, were more inclined to pay their homage (and that was all they were meant to pay to any monarch), to the descendents of Charlemagne than to the kings of Germany; and since the death of the archduke Bruno, and of his brother the emperor Otho, they thought themselves much more at liberty to discover their affections than before. Lothaire was very willing to encourage this, as he inherited from his mother very considerable estates in that country; and, that these might the better answer his purpose, he resigned them to his brother Charles, who, by espousing the cause of every turbulent lord in Lorraine, and setting up for the protector of those who had been deprived of their estates by the archduke Bruno, threw Lorraine into confusion, and paved the way for effecting what his brother desired<sup>e</sup>. Otho the second, who had many troublesome affairs upon his hands, discerned very clearly the purposes of both the brothers; who, notwithstanding, had been far less formidable enemies, if, in all their attempts, they had not been abetted by Hugh Capet; and, to make himself easy, and to disappoint them, Otho offered the duchy of the lower Lorraine to Charles, on no harder condition than that of doing him homage; which he readily accepted, to the irretrievable injury of his brother's affairs; for by this the point in dispute, that is, the homage for Lorraine, was given up to Otho, and the French looked upon the honour of the crown to be so much affected thereby, that their indignation to Charles grew to such a height as could never be appeased<sup>f</sup>. A circumstance which, however unreasonable, is, notwithstanding, very instructive.

LOTHAIRE, exceedingly provoked at this refined specimen of policy, by which the benefit conferred upon his brother reflected such discredit upon himself, resolved to vindicate his claim to Lorraine by arms. In pursuance of this project, which was equally acceptable to the nobility and the nation, he marched with a numerous army to Metz, the gates of which were opened on his first appearance; and, having received the homage of many of the nobility, he prosecuted his design, and marched with all possible expedition to Aix la Chapelle, where Otho kept his court in all manner of security, and where he was so near being surprized, that he left a his dinner just as it was placed upon the table. Lothaire plundered the palace of all his rich moveables, spoiled all the adjacent country, and returned home<sup>s</sup>. Otbo, breathing nothing but revenge for such an affront, entered France in the autumn with an army of sixty thousand men, and advanced as far as the gates of Paris, waisting all the country before him with fire and sword. But when he came to retire, Hugh Capet, and Geoffry count of Anjou, followed him with a considerable body of troops, harrassed his forces exceedingly, and cut off such numbers in their passing the river Aisne, that the stream, being choaked with dead bodies, overflowed the adjacent country<sup>h</sup>. The next year Otbo came to Rheims, and concluded a peace with king Lothaire, by which he was left in possession of Lorrain; but, as the French authors say, was content to hold as a fief of the crown of France. However that might be, this is very certain, that the French lords were highly displeased with this treaty, which altered the opinion they had hitherto entertained of their king, and brought them to look upon him in very near the same light as they had done his brother; who, instead of embracing this opportunity, as he might have done, of retrieving the false step he had made, ran into a still greater, by attaching himself more closely than ever to the interests of Otbo, and thereby heightening that distaste which the French nobility had conceived against him, that rose but too high already<sup>i</sup>. So natural it is, when one has once trod awry, to proceed in the same road.

A. D. 980.

The death of Lothaire, who, by some,
is thought to have been poisoned by his queen.

Otbo dying about four years after in Italy, Lothaire undertook the defence of his son, Otbo the third, against Henry duke of Bavaria, who laboured to deprive him of the kingdom of Germany. This gave the French monarch an opportunity of making a fresh irruption into Lorrain, where he became master of Verdun; it appears also, that he made an attempt upon the city of Cambray, in which he miscarried, through the opposition given him by his brother Charles, who was in arms on the side of the Germans<sup>k</sup>. This rivetted the aversion of the French against that prince, who otherwise had both merit and valour. As for the king, the prudence and spirit he shewed in the latter part of his reign had restored his credit in a great degree, and brought the great lords in his dominions to treat him with the respect due to their sovereign, and to acquiesce in his associating his son Lewis in the government. But at the time when his affairs were in the best posture, and when he was most capable of turning things to his own advantage, and to that of his family, he was unfortunately removed by death; which happened at Rheims on the second of March, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and in the thirty-second of his reign<sup>l</sup> (F). There were some suspicions of his being poisoned by the queen; which were countenanced by his brother Charles duke of Lorrain, who lost no opportunity of spreading reports to the prejudice of that prince's reputation. But there is a letter of the queen's yet preserved, addressed to the empress-dowager, her mother, which seems to destroy this story entirely; for she therein expresses so high an esteem and so tender an affection for the person of the deceased king<sup>m</sup>, that it is very difficult to believe a princess of her birth could be capable of so vile an action, or that, with so much good sense as that letter shews she had, she should be so deep a dissembler.

Short reign
and sad end of Lewis V. the last monarch
of the line of Charlemagne.

Lewis the fifth, upon whom some writers bestow the opprobrious name of Faineant, was, at the time of his father's decease, in the nineteenth year of his age, and, as the writers of those times say, committed by his father, in his last moments, to the care of Hugh Capet, who had served him faithfully during his whole reign. With his assistance he succeeded without any difficulty, and the nobility renewed their oaths of fidelity. His short reign was a continual scene of tumult and trouble. He quarrelled immediately with the queen-dowager; and upon some difference with the archbishop of Rheims, who was a Lorrainer by birth, surprized that city, not without considerable effusion of blood: he also chased the bishop of Laon out of the kingdom, whom he reproached with being his mother's gallant<sup>n</sup>. That princess was supported

(F) It is very difficult to collect the character of this king Lothaire from the writers of chronicles, and the old historians of France, as appears from the different judgments passed thereon by the moderns, after reading and reflecting on these memoirs. Mezeray says of this prince, that he was brave, active, and very attentive to his affairs; adding, that, as he was a prince of great virtues, he deserved to live in better times. The count de Boulanvilliers says, that he was active and warlike, but, at the same time, perfidious, as all the princes of that age were. In reality, what seemed to be the greatest errors in this monarch's administration, flowed from the vast disproportion between his parts and his power. His ambition was great, and his means were little. He acted, however, with more prudence than his father, since he kept the dukes of France always on his side, and had such a confidence in them, that he went to Paris, and was highly feasted there. He formed great designs, and went as far as it was possible for him to go in the execution of them; but, when he found this impracticable, as he frequently did, he was apt to make short turns, whence he came to be thought inconstant. He was generous, or rather profuse, for he gave like the old monarchs of his house, without reflecting on the scantiness of his revenues.

- a by the German court, and Otho the third was on the very point of declaring war against the monarch of France, when Beatrix, the sister of Hugh Capet, and the consort of Frederic of Alsace, duke of Upper Lorrain, interposed; and coming to pay that prince a visit at Compeign, prevailed upon him to go to Montfaucon; where, in a conference, at which were present the queen-mother, Charles duke of Lorrain, the king's uncle, Henry duke of Lorrain, and the empress-dowager, all things were for the present adjusted °. It is highly probable this pacification would have been of no long continuance, if the king had lived; but it is allowed, that the queen his wife did for him what the duke of Lorrain charged the queen-dowager with doing for his father; that is, she poisoned him, when he had reigned a year and two months (G). Some writers say, that he died on the 22d of June <sup>p</sup>; but this is not certain, any more than
- b that he bequeathed the crown to Hugh Capet, as a person to whom he had been more obliged than to any of his own family. If we could believe him so weak a prince, this would be the more probable, since it is certain that Hugh Capet had almost the entire direction of affairs during his reign, and enabled him to act in the manner he did. Be that as it will; this prince was the last of the house of Charlemagne, whence some have fancied, that the name of Lewis was ominous to that family, the last emperor of that house being Lewis the second, the last king of Germany Lewis the third, and the last monarch of France Lewis the fifth; but these are fancies unworthy of credit, and which ought never to be mentioned with any other view than to be exposed. Besides, the line did not really extinguish in him; for his uncle Charles duke of Lorrain was clearly the heir male, and as such claimed the crown of France, and died in struggling for it, as we shall see in the next section. This family possessed the throne between two
- c hundred and thirty, and two hundred and forty years (H).

° ADEM. Chron. P. FAUCHET.

P CORDEM. MEZER.

(G) It is agreed on all hands, that this Lewis V. was but a weak young prince. In his father's life-time he married a lady, whose name, some say, was Constance, and that she was the daughter of William count of Arles; but the best part of the French historians call her Blanche, and affirm that she was the daughter of some great lord in Aquitaine, which is most likely to be true. An old writer says, that king Lothaire created his son Lewis, in his life-time, king of Aquitaine, which it is not at all impossible might be true; at least it is certain, that Lewis and his new-married queen went thither, where, it is said, she left him, and returned to her family, and that upon this Lothaire went and brought them back. His mother, queen Emma, was for carrying him to the court of Germany, but Lewis did not at all relish that proposition: on the contrary, he drove out the bishop of Laon, who, according to common fame, was her gallant, in which the duke of France did not interpose, though that bishop had been formerly his friend. Charles duke of Lorrain laboured to inflame the mind of his nephew against this princess, whom he openly charged with adultery and murder: on the other hand, the partizans of the queen-mother insinuated, that Charles held intrigues in the kingdom that were prejudicial to the interests of the king, and dishonourable to the royal family. Some ascribe the moderation of the duke of France to a secret design of transferring the crown from the head of the young king to his own; but there is nothing in his conduct, or in that of his sister, which can justify this charge. Some say that Lewis bequeathed his kingdom to that lord, upon condition that he married the queen. It is not impossible that both this, and the story of her poisoning him, might be contrived by Charles of Lorrain, or his friends, to render queen Blanche and the duke of France odious; but it is very certain that Hugh Capet did not marry her, or pretend to the crown in right of the king's designation.

(H) We find in Mezeray an enumeration of the causes which brought about the gradual declension, and at length the total exclusion, of the line of Charlemagne; and as these have been approved and copied by the count of Boulanvilliers, it cannot be amiss to present them to the reader's view. They are these; 1. The division of the empire into several kingdoms, which was necessarily followed by discord and civil war amongst their brethren. 2. The unreasonable affection of Lewis le Debonnaire for his favourite son Charles the Bald. 3. The imbecility of the greatest part of these princes, there not being above four or five, amongst a great number, who had sense and courage joined together. 4. The ravages of the Normans, who, by desolating France for fourscore years together, afforded the great lords an opportunity of rendering themselves independent. 5. The many natural children of Charlemagne, whose descendents took occasion from thence to turn the estates, given for their subsistence, into so many principalities. 6. The sacrileges committed by these princes, if the ecclesiastics are to be believed, in rewarding their courtiers and captains with the possessions of the church. 7. This tree not bearing good fruit, says that historian, God was pleased to remove it, in order to make way for another, infinitely finer and more fertile, which, in its duration, shall extend to latest ages, and shall spread its glory to the ends of the earth. This is a pretty bold stroke for an author, who disclaims flattery upon all occasions. But may we not add, that the principal and unavoidable cause of the fall of this house, was the too great extent of that empire raised by the virtue and valour of Charles the Great? It is true that he framed the best and most prudent scheme that could possibly be contrived for preserving his dominions to his family, by erecting different kingdoms; and leaving the people to the enjoyment of their own laws and customs; but Providence set this aside, in a great measure, in his life-time; and the weight proving too heavy for his son's shoulders, he was reputed a weak man, not so much through his own want of abilities, as because he was not equal to Charlemagne. The very form of government which he instituted, though perfectly wise and prudent in itself, and if not the only one, at least the best, that could be framed for so vast a dominion, made way, notwithstanding, for all the inconveniences that followed. The maxim of that emperor to make a deliberate choice, and then not to change the ministers he employed, gave the governors of provinces an opportunity to establish family interests in them, to make such alliances, and to form such connections, as his successors had it not in their power to remove, and, from the circumstances of their affairs, found it frequently their interest to promote. Thus, by degrees, the constitution was changed, not in France only, but in Germany and Italy, and the rest of the countries possessed by the descendents of Charlemagne. When these princes were extinguished, or unable to maintain themselves, the supreme power became subject to election; and thus the new constitution became more thoroughly fixed, as appears from the state in which we find this kingdom at the extinction of the Carlovingian race.

The reigns of Hugh Capet, Robert, Henry I. Philip I. Lewis VI. surnamed the Fat, Lewis VII. the Young, Philip Augustus, Lewis VIII. Lewis IX. Philip the Hardy, Philip the Fair, Lewis Hutin, Philip the Long, or the Tall, and Charles the Fair.

Accession of Hugh Capet, and means by which he attained the kingdom.

THE character of Hugh Capet, and his manner of coming to the crown, appear in very different lights in the works of French historians. Some labour to extenuate his conduct with regard to the duke of Lorraine; and some, out of a zeal to what they esteem the right of succession, treat his accession to the crown as a flagrant usurpation. As we have no authority to decide, we think it imprudent to enter at all into this question, farther than to observe, that the third race of French kings supplanted the second, as the second did the first; and that there was a great resemblance in the temper and manners of Hugh Capet, with those of Pepin the Short. It seems that Hugh Capet had taken his measures early and effectually, since in a few days he caused himself to be proclaimed king at Nojon, and was solemnly crowned at Rheims, by the archbishop of that see, on the third of July<sup>a</sup>. It is observed that this was done without any opposition, and that nobody stirred on behalf of the late king's uncle Charles, the last surviving prince of the race of Charlemagne. In this there is nothing extraordinary, nor can any thing be concluded from it. Those who were in the interest of the new king assisted at his coronation; but there were many great lords who did not approve this measure, who for this reason did not assist at it<sup>b</sup>, and many more because they had not time to learn the news of Lewis's death, much less to settle in their own minds what party they should take upon this occasion<sup>c</sup>. As for the king, he brought more strength to the crown than he received from it, since the duchy of France, the counties of Paris and Orleans, were in his own hands, the rich duchy of Burgundy in those of his brother Henry, and his brother-in-law the duke of Nor-

A. D. 987.

The duke of Guienne refuses to acknowledge the new king, but is beaten and submits.

CHARLES of Lorraine might probably have succeeded better in his pretensions, if he had acted earlier, or if he had taken the precaution to have brought all his partizans to take arms at once; but the character of this prince was a certain slowness in all his motions, and a want of timing things properly, rather than any defect in parts or in courage. While he deliberated, therefore, on the measures he was to take, the new king was at liberty to proceed as he pleased against such lords as had refused to do him homage<sup>f</sup>. Amongst these, one of the most considerable was William duke of Guienne, or, as some stile him, of Aquitaine, against whom he marched with an army, and laid siege to Poitiers; but being informed that the duke of Lorraine had, by the assistance of Herbert count of Troyes, whose daughter he married, assembled a considerable army in Champagne, he raised the siege, and resolved to lose no time in repassing the Loire, in order to watch the motions of his competitor. The duke of Guienne, who lay with an army near Poitiers, endeavoured to cut off his retreat; when the king, following the example of his grandfather, disposed his troops in order of battle, and attacked those who thought to have fallen upon his rear. The dispute was short but bloody, and the victory so clearly on the king's side, that the duke submitted<sup>g</sup>. The king, who was a man of good temper and sagacity, as well as of great moderation, made the best use of this gleam of prosperity; and, in an assembly of the nobles, proposed the association of his son Robert; to which when they had consented, he caused him to be crowned with great ceremony, upon new-year's-day, at Orleans, by the hands of the archbishop of Sens, whom the late victory had brought over to his party<sup>h</sup>. By this act, having secured the crown to his family, he never afterwards wore the royal ornaments himself, or affected any extraordinary state or magnificence, but administered public affairs with great application, and with such an appearance of modesty, justice, and piety, as recommended him highly to his subjects, and more especially to the clergy; to whom he restored all the abbies he possessed, and the nobility followed his example.

the bishop whom he had represented as her gallant<sup>1</sup>. The king advanced with a numerous army, and in his turn besieged Charles in the city of Laon. The severity with which that prince treated the queen and the bishop, by committing them both to prison, had a bad effect on his affairs; for the court of Germany interposing on the behalf of the queen, and the prelates in favour of the bishop, without success, became his enemies. He gave himself the less pain about this, since, by a well-conducted sally, he cut off a great part of his competitor's army, and obliged him to raise the siege<sup>2</sup>. The king thought to balance this loss by detaching from the party of Charles his nephew Arnould, the natural son of king Lothaire, to whom he b offered the archbishoprick of Rheims, which was just become vacant. Arnould accepted it; repaired immediately to the king's camp, put in hostages, and not only swore, but subscribed an oath of fidelity, which was penned on purpose for him. Yet he was no sooner in possession of the see and city of Rheims than he betrayed it to Charles; and though at first he took the precaution of being made prisoner, as if he had been actually surprised; yet, not long after, he threw aside all disguise, and appeared at the head of his uncle's troops<sup>3</sup>. The king, upon this, applied to the pope, who did not think fit to interfere, till he saw the dispute as to the possession of the crown determined by the law of arms, that the decrees of the church might be on the side of the strongest<sup>4</sup>. A proceeding that favoured rather of human policy than spiritual infallibility. A. D. 989.
- c THE king, having a numerous army, disposed all things as if he intended to lay siege to *Laon betrayed to the king, who takes duke Charles,
his duchess,
and archbishop Arnould, prisoners.*
Rheims; and Charles, on the other side, provided in the best manner he could for the defence of it. But the king, being informed that the bishop of Laon, the most plausible and artful man of his time, had obtained his liberty, and some degree of credit with Charles, entered into an intrigue with him, and, all things being properly concerted, began his march as if he intended to have invested Rheims, but turned hastily towards Laon, which, by the assistance of that per-fidious prelate, he surprised, and made prisoner the duke of Lorraine, his consort, and the archbishop Arnould, whom he caused to be transferred to Orleans, where they were closely confined<sup>5</sup>. This put an end to the dispute; for all who had hitherto adhered to Charles, readily submitted, and did homage to the kings Hugh and Robert<sup>6</sup>. As for the unfortunate duke
d of Lorraine, he remained a prisoner at Orleans as long as he lived, together with his duchess.
His son enjoyed the duchy of Lorraine, but died without issue male, and in him, as is generally believed, the male line of Charlemagne was extinct<sup>7</sup>. 991.
- THE king, finding himself now firmly fixed in the throne, resolved to proceed against the archbishop Arnould; and with this view called a council, which assembled at an abbey not far from Rheims, in which the archbishop of Sens presided<sup>8</sup>. The priest was produced who opened the gates of the city, and he deposed, that he did it by the archbishop's order. Notwithstanding this, the president and some of the prelates were not inclined to condemn him.
The two kings, father and son, appeared in the council, for which the archbishop of Sens reproved them openly; asserting, that it was unbecoming princes to influence judges, where e themselves were parties<sup>9</sup>. At length Arnould subscribed his own confession and degradation; and upon this Gerbert, a very learned monk of Rheims, who had been tutor to the emperor Otho and the young king Herbert, was elected into the see. This, however, did not put an end to the affair; for pope John the fifteenth sent a legate into France, who held a council at Monson, where all was unravelled again, and in a second council held at Rheims, Gerbert was deposed, and Arnould restored, merely to support the papal power; for the principal reason assigned was, that the deposition of Arnould was null, as being without the consent of the holy see; but, notwithstanding this decree, the king kept him prisoner as long as he lived<sup>10</sup>, believing he might do him more mischief at liberty than he had to fear from the pope. Disturbances in France occasioned by de-posing Ar-nould, and advancing Gerbert to the see of Rheims.
- f THE government of this monarch was exactly suited to the situation of his affairs; he had no title to expect any thing more than homage from the great lords of France, and it does not appear that he sought any thing more. He suffered them to make war upon each other, as some have suggested, through policy; but, in reality, because it was out of his power to restrain them, as appears from what happened upon his interfering when the count of Anjou, one of his own vassals, besieged Tours in a private quarrel. He sent to require him to raise the siege; which he refused: the person, who carried the orders, asked him thereupon, who made him a count? Tell your master, said he, the same who made him a king<sup>11</sup>. Those who strengthen his government,

mildness and

ascribe the institution of the twelve peers to him, or to his son, are mistaken (A). Paris <sup>a</sup> became the seat of the government, and the capital of the monarchy, in virtue of its being the place of his residence, and the principal city of his hereditary estates. He fortified several places, under various pretences; and particularly, under colour of preventing the descents of the Normans, he established Abbeville, and made it a place of arms <sup>u</sup>. He conducted all things with order and circumspection, and had the singular honour of establishing a new family, and in some measure a new form of government, without any remarkable circumstances of violence, and without shedding blood. He expired on the 24th of October, in the year of our Lord 997, in the 57th year of his age, and in the 8th of his reign <sup>v</sup>, leaving his dominions in perfect quiet, and his son in the peaceable possession of the crown, by the precaution he had taken of associating him when he was very young, and shewing him to the people upon all occasions, with those <sup>b</sup> ensigns of regal dignity, from the use of which he abstained. Some have suggested, that his motive to this was a revelation, that the crown should remain in his family but for a certain number of descents; and that, by this artifice, he sought to render his own and his son's reign but one <sup>x</sup>. A notion very suitable to a monkish chronicle, but very unlikely to occupy the attention of so wise and prudent a man. The plain reason was, he knew how to maintain his own dignity by his power, and was therefore desirous, that the ensigns of it might recommend his son to the public veneration, till he should be able to establish it on the better basis of his actions <sup>y</sup>. His corpse was interred rather with decency than splendor, in the church of the abbey of St. Denis <sup>z</sup> (B).

(A) We have said in the text, that such as refer to the reign of Hugh Capet the creation of peerage or peerdoms in France are mistaken, and we say so, because they allege no authority, and the fact is in itself false; but those who carry this institution as high as Charlemagne are absolutely ridiculous, and ground their notions only upon some old romances, in which such stories are the pure effects of ignorance. Yet there were peers in the reign of Hugh Capet, and in that of Charlemagne; that is, the great officers of the crown, the governors of cities and provinces, the bishops and abbots, and, in short, all who were summoned to great courts, or parliaments, had a right to be tried in such an assembly for any crimes of which they were suspected; and, in this respect, those who tried them were their equals, or peers. Of this we have various instances, particularly that of Tassilon, duke of Bavaria (6). This maxim of being tried by their equals ran through their whole government; and from thence it was, that, in Picardy, they stiled their judges Paris Bourgeois. It is also true, that the successors of these peers, in the reign of Charlemagne, were those who attained to peerages, when they came to be dignified fiefs (7). It is commonly said, but it is not the truer for that, the new king confirmed all the great lords in their estates, and rendered them hereditary. But it appears very doubtful, whether those lords would have esteemed their titles much the better for his confirmation; very possibly not; for though it is uncertain whether he made them peers, it is very certain they made him king. In right of that dignity he demanded homage, which implied an obligation to the usual services; but this was no more than they had yielded to former kings; so that it does not appear he conferred, or they received, any thing (8). But, that we may not seem to pull down without building up, let us assume the liberty of observing, that the origin of all titles, in almost all countries, is a subject extremely dark; that prerogatives and estates commonly follow titles, and therefore it is an easy mistake, at the distance of many ages, to suppose them of equal date. We conclude from thence, that it is scarce possible to assign exactly the origin of peerages; but as for the establishment of the twelve peers of France, that goes no higher than the coronation of Philip Augustus (9).

We have observed in the text, that the great lords, who held immediately of the crown, had an inferior class of nobility, who held of them, and these were peers to each other, and were stiled the peers, not of the kingdom, but of the fief to which they belonged; thus we find peers of Champagne, who held of the counts. In point of titles they were not exact, since many of the vassals of counts were counts; and as for the title of baron, it was common to all nobility, or rather it implied nobility, for, taking them in gross, they were stiled the barons of France (1). But in process of time, when nobility multiplied, this remained a separate title to those who had none higher (2). But though the great lords had secular peers, who held of them, yet we do not find that they had any ecclesiastical peers, as the king had; and to put an end to this subject here, let it be observed, that as the pre-eminence of the king over his peers was stiled sovereignty, so that of the great lords over their vassals was stiled suzerainty, a term, says a French lawyer, as barbarous as the superiority it expressed (3). But, barbarous as it is, it is a circumstance of importance to history, that it should be defined and known.

(B) This monarch appears on his great seal, with short hair, and a long forked beard. In his right hand he holds what the French call La main de justice; i. e. the hand of justice; which is a kind of sceptre, with a little ivory hand at the top; and in his left a globe; on his head a crown ornamented with flowers; the inscription thus, Hugo Dei misericordia Francorum Rex (4). His proper character was that of an able politician, who knew very well how to spread a specious covering over the effects of his ambition, and to set proper bounds to his own greatness, by the exercise of a spirit of moderation. He fixed himself upon the throne, and entailed the crown upon his posterity by recommending himself to all ranks and conditions, by seeming to prefer their interests to his own (5). We have shewn by what means he gained the clergy, to which we may add, that he carried his piety, or appearance of piety, so high, that he converted the palace, in which he dwelt, into a church, which is that of St. Bartholomew at Paris (6). He indulged the great lords in a degree of freedom that bordered upon independency; but, by taking little or no

- a ROBERT, when he came to govern the kingdom alone, was in the twenty-seventh year of his age, and possessed, in a very high degree of perfection, all the graces of body and mind, which rendered him universally beloved. He persisted steadily in the pursuit of his father's maxims, and acted, in all public or private concerns, with the greatest mildness and moderation. It must seem strange, that, after all this, the very first year of his reign exhibited a scene of the highest trouble and confusion. He had married, in his father's life-time, Bertha, the sister of Rodolph, king of Burgundy, and the widow of Eudes, count of Blois, a distant relation of his father's, and to one of his children Robert himself had been sponsor<sup>a</sup>. The pope attacked this marriage, and Robert used every expedient to appease him. The match was merely political, and the queen without either youth or beauty to recommend her; yet he shewed the utmost unwillingness to part with her, out of regard to his own interest. The pope was nephew to the emperor Otho III. and valued himself extremely on maintaining the dignity of his see. He had directed that Arnould should be set at liberty, and restored to his archbishoprick; the queen-dowager and the queen-consort, believing that condescension in this point might render the pope more compliant in the business of his marriage, prevailed upon the king to do what his father would never have done, that is, to release Arnould, and place him upon the archiepiscopal throne of Rheims<sup>b</sup>. Gerbert, who saw himself not only deprived of his see, but also of the episcopal character, retired to the court of his other pupil the emperor Otho, by whom he was presently made archbishop of Ravenna, and in that capacity assisted at a council held the next year at Rome, in which the marriage of king Robert with his queen Bertha was declared null, the prelate excommunicated who married them, and the king commanded to leave her, and to submit to seven years penance, under pain of excommunication. The king, however, persisted in keeping his wife; and, having thereby incurred the excommunication, was abandoned, not only by the prelates and nobility, but also by his menial servants, except two, who threw the remains of what was eaten by the king and queen to the dogs, and the vessels out of which they eat into the fire; the prevailing notions of those times being that they polluted those who used them. But, at length, the clamour of the people (an interdict being spread through the kingdom) compelled him to part with Bertha, who, notwithstanding, preserved the title and the state of a queen during her life, and was much regarded for her wisdom and magnanimity<sup>c</sup>.
- d THE remark which some of the French historians have made, that if he had held out a little longer he might have saved his queen, since, upon the death of Gregory V. Gerbert ascended the papal throne, by the name of Sylvester II. seems to be erroneous; for, in the first place, it appears that Gerbert, while archbishop of Ravenna, subscribed next to the pope for annulling this marriage, and was thereby even with the two queens, who persuaded the king to give up his cause<sup>d</sup>. After he became pope he confirmed Arnould in the see of Rheims, and shewed no great kindness to king Robert; who, finding himself without heirs, thought fit to espouse Constance, the wife of William count of Arles, a princess of exquisite beauty, and of a lively understanding, but so haughty, avaricious, and insolent, that the king hardly enjoyed a quiet hour after contracting this marriage. Eudes, the second count of Brie and Champagne, having accumulated, by descent and marriage, large estates, procured the town of Melun to be delivered to him by bribing the governor, and pretending to be in love with his wife<sup>e</sup>. share in their quarrels, he maintained the strength of his own territories entire, while they were daily weakening each other. As he affected great modesty in his behaviour, and great simplicity of manners, so an exact regularity was observed in his court, and his finances managed with such frugality, that his subjects were much more at ease than their neighbours (7). This conduct, which induced the nobility to think him a mild and pacific man, and to frame, in which they were not mistaken, the same notion of his son, brought about that great point of consenting to crown him in his life-time, which he left as a secret of state to his posterity (8). As to his surname of Capet, it is but very indifferently explained; but undoubtedly it was what we now stile a nickname, signifying literally jolter-head, metaphorically a weak or an obstinate man. In the first of these senses it was applied to Charles, who is generally stiled the Simple, and perhaps in the latter to this prince in his youth (9). He had only one consort, Adelaide, who is generally said to be the daughter of William Tesle d'Etoupe, that is Mop-pate, from his having white hair, count of Poitiers, and duke of Guienne, or Aquitaine: but of this there is some reason to doubt, since the brother of this princess, supposing her so descended, was the very duke who took up arms in favour of Charles, and whom Hugh Capet, in the first year of his reign subdued (1). The writer of his son's life, who lived in those times, says expressly she was an Italian (2). By her he had Robert his successor, and three daughters, Haanwige, who espoused Renier IV. count of Hainault, and afterwards Hugh count of Dassbourg; Alice, who married the count of Nevers, and Gilette, who became the consort of Hugh, lord of Abbeville. He had also a natural son Goffelin, who was afterwards archbishop of Bourges, and a man of learning, piety, and virtue (3).

nobleman to whom it belonged applied himself immediately to the king for justice ; for which a reason the monarch went himself to the siege, and having obliged the place to surrender, hanged up the governor on the walls. He afterwards condescended to act as an umpire between this lord and his own ally the duke of Normandy, and settled a peace between them on very moderate terms, and with which both parties were exceedingly well satisfied <sup>f</sup>.

By the death of the duke of Burgundy the king obtains that rich duchy.

HENRY duke of Burgundy, the king's uncle, dying without lawful issue, his territories fell, either by descent or by will, to the king ; but, before he could enter into possession, there started up two claimants. The first of these was Eudes, natural to the deceased duke, who bequeathed him the county of Beauvais; the other was Otho-William, count of Burgundy, the son of the duchess-dowager of Burgundy, by her first husband, who pretended to be adopted by duke Henry ; and the people, who were desirous of having an independent prince, shewed a great b inclination to support his claim ; and several great lords, but more especially Eudes, count of Champagne, encouraged and assisted him<sup>g</sup>. The war subsisted for several years ; and there is some reason to doubt, whether the king could have carried his point or not, without the assistance of the duke of Normandy, who led in person an army of twenty-two thousand men into Burgundy. Eudes, his nephew, compromised matters with the king, who confirmed to him what his father had given him by will ; and this facilitated the reduction of the country, with which the king thought fit to invest his second son Henry, that he might gratify the people in their desire of having a prince of their own, and, at the same time, please the great lords, who were jealous of seeing so great a fief united to the crown<sup>h</sup>. The ending of this war gave the king great satisfaction, for he loved peace, and studied to preserve it by all methods possible. His household and his court were kept in the most exact order : he assisted regularly and frequently in his robes at chapel, and at churches on the great feasts : he composed music for the choir, and some of his responses and hymns still find a place in the public offices of the Gallican church. In short, he was, in every respect, a most incomparable prince, except that he was too submissive as a husband, to a woman who did not understand either her duty as a wife, or her interest as a queen<sup>i</sup>.

The king associates his eldest son Hugh in the throne.

SHE solicited her husband to associate his son in the government, though he was then but in the seventeenth year of his age ; and Robert, who had a great tenderness for his children, came into it without much difficulty, being, in a great measure, swayed by the example of his father<sup>k</sup>. Some of his ministers laboured all they could to prevent it, by representing d to him, that he had not the same motives which his father had ; and that the true reason which induced the queen to press it so earnestly was, that, in case of his demise, she might govern in the name of the young prince<sup>l</sup>. The king hesitated a little upon this ; but the queen bore with impatience this delay, and the king was at last forced to comply, as not knowing how to deal with a woman, who taking offence at one of his ministers who opposed her designs, caused A. D. 1017. him to be assassinated in his master's presence. The point once settled, the king proposed it in an assembly of the nobility and prelates, who, out of respect to him, consented, and prince Hugh was solemnly crowned, though the ministers, as far as they durst, expressed a great apprehension of the event<sup>m</sup>.

An insurrection headed by the young king Hugh which is speedily reduced.

THERE happened, in different parts of the kingdom, particular wars between the great vassals of the crown, of which accounts are preserved in the histories of those provinces which were interested in them : but, as the king took little or no share in them, except against Eudes count of Champagne, whom he would have hindered from reaping the succession of Stephen count of Troyes and Meaux, but failed in it, we shall take no notice of them<sup>n</sup>. Upon the report of some heresies, resembling that of the Manichees, the king, who was very zealous, called a council to examine into the matter, which was held at Orleans, where some priests were burnt alive ; the king and queen, such was the religion of those times, being present. The same year the young king Hugh withdrew from court, with some noblemen of his own age, and was guilty of some disorders. He complained that his mother behaved towards him with insupportable arrogance, and kept him to so short an allowance, that he was unable to support his dignity<sup>o</sup>. The queen was for reducing her son by force, which might have been easily done, as none of the neighbouring potentates gave him any countenance ; but the king was not at all of that mind : he knew there was some foundation for his son's complaints ; and having assured him of his pardon, and a proper allowance, the young man very readily returned to his duty, and never departed from it afterwards. Some say he granted him a larger measure of authority than before<sup>p</sup>.

The king refuses the crown of the empire

HENRY king of Germany had been involved in a long dispute with the count of Flanders and some lords of Lorraine, which, at length, it was agreed, should be left to the arbitration of the king of France. In order to this, these two great princes had an interview on the banks of a the Meuse. As all meetings of this kind are commonly perplexed with disputes about ceremonies, the interview was very near being postponed on that account; but Henry, who was so good a prince that he had obtained the surname of Saint, preferred business to forms, and passing the river early one morning, surprized king Robert in his apartment<sup>1</sup>. After this those princes saw each other as friends, and, without any state or ceremony at all, settled the affair on which they met, to the satisfaction of all parties concerned, and parted with great regret. They had agreed to go into Italy together, in order to oblige pope Boniface VIII. to consent to certain terms, which they held it necessary to prescribe. The death of the pope prevented that journey, and the very next year Henry himself died. He was succeeded in his hereditary dominions, and the kingdom of Germany, by Conrade, duke of Worms, who b expected likewise to be received as king of Italy, and to be honoured with the imperial diadem<sup>2</sup>. To this, however, many of the princes and prelates of Italy were by no means inclined: they were become weary of German masters, and had a mind to try what market they could make in some other court; and, with this view, they sent deputies to offer the imperial crown, and the kingdom of Italy, to the king of France, for himself or for his son. But Robert, very wisely considering that this must of necessity involve him in a war with Conrade: that the Italians were naturally very inconstant; and that settled peace, and the most perfect esteem of all his neighbours, would be very ill exchanged for an uncertain dominion A. D. 1023. and a pompous title, he dismissed the deputies, and declined their offer. His subjects in particular, and Europe in general, was quickly convinced that he had formed a true notion of c things, and judged right; for William duke of Guienne, who was both a wise and a powerful prince, having accepted this proposal, the greater part of those who made it deserted him on the first appearance of Conrade, who, partly by address, and partly by force of arms, obtained all that he sought, and secured to himself the kingdom of Italy; in consequence of which pope John XIX. placed the imperial crown upon his head. Robert was indeed inclined to have taken the advantage of those disputes to recover the kingdom of Lorraine, or at least the homage of the princes who held it; but finding this could not be done without a war, and perceiving that by his late success Conrade was become very powerful, he very prudently declined it<sup>3</sup>.

THE year following proved unfortunate to the king, in the loss of his eldest son Hugh, associated with him in the sovereignty, who died in the flower of his age, and when he was become both obedient and assisting to his father<sup>4</sup>. The king appeared very much chagrined, but the queen shewed but very little concern. Robert, as soon as he had recovered the free use of his thoughts, inclined to associate Henry, who was now become his eldest son, which his mother opposed with equal heat and obstinacy; so that it excited two factions at court; many, to gain the queen's favour, and from a persuasion that the king would yield at last, declaring in behalf of the younger son Robert<sup>5</sup>. But the major part of the nobility adhering to Henry, and the king, contrary to expectation, remaining firm, the queen changed her battery, and persuaded him to adopt neither, in hopes, if she survived him, to place her own favourite upon the throne. The king penetrated her scheme, and therefore, without e paying any deference to her counsels, associated, with the advice of his parliament, his eldest surviving son Henry<sup>6</sup>. Queen Constance, provoked in the highest degree, endeavoured to inflame her son Robert, and to embarrass him with his brother. In which, not finding him so ready as she expected, the affection she had hitherto shewn him turned into hatred, and she persecuted them both to such a degree, that they retired from court, and took up arms, not so much with an ambitious view to disturb the state, as that they might obtain some places in which they might live quiet. At length<sup>7</sup>, however, the flame rose so high, that the king was obliged to raise an army and march against his sons into Burgundy. An abbot interposed, with which the king was not at all displeased; and, having represented to him that the young princes did not mean to resist his authority, but merely to obtain a subsistence, f he admitted them to his presence, and compromised things to their satisfaction, employing his forces to reduce some lords of Burgundy, who had taken the opportunity of these troubles to raise fortresses on their estates, which the king would not endure<sup>8</sup>. He left the elections of bishops, in general, free: but finding it absolutely necessary, for the safety of his government, to have a prelate he could depend on at Langres, he named a bishop, whom the monks thought fit to poison; upon which he appointed another, and sent his son Henry to see him installed: and it was while the young prince was thus employed, that the king breathed his last at Melun, on the 20th of July, when he had reigned thirty-three, and lived about threescore years<sup>9</sup>. There is not any monarch in the French history more generally or more highly commended, or on whose death the lamentations of all ranks of people were louder or more sincere. The monks spoke the sense of the whole nation, when they deplored a him in these words; "We have lost a father who governed us in peace; we lived under him

" in security, for he did not oppress or suffer oppression; we loved him, and there was
" nobody whom we feared." He maintained his own authority amongst the nobility, by suffering them to exercise theirs<sup>a</sup>.

Henry finds himself in danger of losing his crown through the malice of his mother.

HENRY, at the time of his accession to the throne, was about twenty-seven years of age, and, with all the vigour of a young man, had the sagacity and prudence of one more advanced in years, which secured him from having the crown shaken from his head, almost as soon as it was placed there. His mother, who mortally hated him, and who resolved always to govern, had drawn a great many lords and bishops to her party, whom she would have persuaded to set her son Robert upon the throne<sup>b</sup>. At the head of this faction was the count of Flanders, and Eudes, count of Champagne, the author of all the troubles that France felt during his life. Their views, whatever they might pretend to the queen, was to get something for themselves; and Eudes would not so much as take up arms till he had stipulated for half the town of Sens. This being promised him, he marched with a numerous army; and having reduced Sens, Melun, and Soissons, all the rest of the places in the neighbourhood, either through fear, or the intrigues of the queen dowager, opened their gates and declared for him<sup>c</sup>. The king was so distressed, that, with his friends and servants, he made but the twelfth person when he retired to Frescamp to demand succour from Robert, duke of Normandy. He was received by that prince with all the respect possible, who assured him that the treasures and forces of his duchy were entirely at his disposal; and he kept his word; so that an army of Normans entered France on one side, while the king, when he had assembled a sufficient force, entered it on the other. Robert, though a mild and generous prince, burnt all the country before him, and gave no quarter to such as fell into his hands, from whence he obtained the surname of Robert le Diable; but, by this extreme severity, the duke soon made them sick of the war. The king, on his side, beat the count of Champagne thrice, and was very near taking him prisoner<sup>d</sup>. At length Foulques, count of Anjou, interposed; and, by his mediation, things were compromised with the queen dowager and prince Robert, to whom the king gave the duchy of Burgundy: as to the queen, she died the next year of mere vexation<sup>e</sup>. The king recovered all that he had lost; compelled the counts of Flanders and Champagne to submit; and as to the lesser nobility, he punished some, and humbled all. As gloriously as the war ended for the king, it cost the crown dear; for as the success was due to Robert of Normandy, Henry added to his duchy Gisors, Chaumont, Pontoise, and that part of the Vexin which yet remained to the crown<sup>f</sup>.

The war of Burgundy, its causes and consequences in France, and the adjacent countries.

A. D. 1033.

THE king, having now acquired the peaceable possession of his dominions, and a high reputation, thought it time to provide for his succession; and therefore contracted himself to Matilda, the daughter of the emperor Conrad, one of the worthiest princes who had worn the imperial crown since the days of Charlemagne; but it is doubtful whether this marriage ever took effect<sup>g</sup>. The death of Rodolph, king of Burgundy, occasioned a great war, of which it is necessary to say something, though the king took no share therein. Eudes, count of Champagne, looked upon himself as the undoubted heir of this kingdom, as being the nephew of the king by his sister Bertha, who, after the decease of this count's father, espoused Robert, duke of France: and it is not impossible he had succeeded, but for his own petulant temper; for insisting that the king should acknowledge him for his presumptive heir, that prince, who was despised by his subjects, and apprehended he might dethrone him, had recourse to the emperor for protection; in gratitude for which, and in consideration of his being his great nephew by another sister, he sent him, on his death-bed, the regalia of the two kingdoms of Burgundy and Arles<sup>h</sup>. Eudes, little regarding this, immediately made an irruption into the county of Burgundy, and, having long held a secret correspondence with some of the nobility, got possession of a great part of it, the emperor being embarrassed with a rebellion in the most remote parts of his dominions: but he quickly returned on the news of this event, and as quickly dispossessed Eudes of his new government. It was upon this occasion, that Humbert, count of Maurienne and Savoy, the counts in the county of Switzerland, of La Bresse<sup>i</sup>, Dauphine, and the Lyonnais, on the other side the Rhone, did homage to the emperor for their estates. Eudes, as soon as he had recruited his forces, attacked the country of Lorrain, made himself master of Bar, and might very probably have given the emperor much more trouble, if he had not been killed at a siege, which released that monarch from any farther disturbance on account of these pretensions, which might have prevailed in better hands<sup>k</sup>.

- a Eudes, at the time of his demise, left his estates to his two sons, Thibaud, count de Beauffe, Touraine, and Beauvoise, and Stephen, count of Champagne, who were exactly of their father's temper, and set out with refusing homage to king Henry, asserting that the obligations between the lords and the vassal were reciprocal; and that the king having given their father no assistance in his war with the emperor, they were not obliged to own him for their lord, or to pay him homage<sup>1</sup>. But in all probability, they had not ventured upon this, if they had not had something else in view. The king, besides Robert duke of Burgundy, had another brother, whose name was Eudes, but whether elder or younger admits of some doubt; some say that he was elder than the king, and set aside for his incapacity; others, with much more probability, that he was the youngest, that his discontent arose from his not having had some establishment assigned him<sup>m</sup>. However it was, he took arms, in conjunction with the two counts, and the war proved fatal to them all; for the king having routed their forces, took Eudes prisoner, and sent him to Orleans, where he was confined for about three years. The count of Champagne lost a great part of his lands, and Thibaud was dispossessed of Touraine, Galeran, count of Meulan, who was likewise embarked in this design, was attainted of felony, and his country united to the crown, which was the first instance of its kind, and shews that the constitution began now to be settled on a firmer basis<sup>n</sup> (C).

- THE troubles that arose in Normandy next occupied the king's thought. Duke Robert, according to the humour that prevailed in those times, thought fit to make a pilgrimage into the Holy Land, having first procured his son William, though born out of wedlock, for which he was afterwards surnamed the Bastard, to be acknowledged his heir, recommending him to the care of Henry king of France, and Alain duke of Bretagne<sup>o</sup>. This did not hinder the whole country from falling into confusion; not only the principal lords, but even those of the least consideration in the duchy, threw off almost all dependence, and committed great disorders. The duke de Bretagne came to appease their quarrels; and, after being very indifferently treated, returned home with a slow poison in his body, of which he died. King Henry, forgetting the obligations he was under to the father of the young duke, inclining to avail himself of these troubles, invaded the frontiers, burnt the town of Argentan, and took the castle of Thilleres, which he pretended had been built without his consent, and which he had therefore a right to demolish<sup>p</sup>. Soon after this disputes arose in that country about the succession; and the ministers about the person of the young duke, passing over what had happened, applied themselves to the king, representing the honour he would obtain in succouring an infant prince, in securing the affections of the Normans, and maintaining the same friendly intercourse with duke William as with his father. Henry, prevailed upon by these arguments, marched in person with a good army, and having joined the duke's forces, gave the malecontent lords battle at Val de Dunes; where, exposing himself more than was necessary, he was beaten from his horse, and very near being killed. At length, after an obstinate dispute, the malecontents were totally routed, and duke William to this victory stood indebted for the possession of his dominions<sup>q</sup>.

A. D. 1046.

- THE king afterwards had some disputes with Geoffrey Martel, count of Anjou, in which the duke of Normandy took part on his behalf: but Henry quickly compromised his share of the quarrel, and left the count and duke, who had great animosity against each other, to fight it out. This was chiefly owing to a spirit of envy in that monarch, to the insinuations of some of his ministers, or to the spirit of policy which prevailed in those times, and which induced Henry to grow jealous of the increasing power of the young duke. When therefore, new troubles broke out, and William d'Arques, count de Thoulouse, who was the son of Richard II. by a second wife, set up his title to the dukedom, in which he was powerfully supported by his brother Mauger, archbishop of Rouen, the king favoured the malecontents at first privately, and at length invaded Normandy in their favour, and in order to raise the siege of the castle of

(C) The nobility in general stood on the same foot, and held the same authority, in this as in the former reigns, paid as little submission, and put the court as often under the necessity of flattering them as ever. The wars of Normandy served only to shew the weakness of the reigning monarch: neither was this the only power in the realm, which was singly in a condition to resist; the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Guienne had the same ability, whenever prompted to it by interest or inclination. It was this engaged Henry to proceed, through his reign, with so much circumspection, and, upon certain occasions, forced him to discover how much he was awed by them. Indeed, this third race of the French kings were so visibly the creatures of the nobility, and came so lately out of their maker's hands, that any airs of superiority and distinction would not only have been very improper, but even absurd (8).

(8) AuB. supra citat.

d'Arques,

d'Arques, in which enterprize his forces received a very severe check, and the duke triumphed <sup>a</sup> over these, as he had done over his former enemies <sup>r</sup>. A peace followed, but no sincere reconciliation; for the king retained a deep sense of the disgrace he met with; and, on the other hand, the duke never forgave the assistance which Henry had given to those who would have dispossessed him of his dominions. In pursuance therefore of his old scheme, the king united himself with Geoffrey Martel; and having formed two armies, one commanded by himself in person, and the other by his brother Eudes, whom he had released out of prison, he once more invaded <sup>b</sup> Normandy, but with the same ill fortune that had attended his former enterprize; since his own army was harrassed and beaten by repeated disadvantages, and that of his brother totally defeated at Mortemer in the Paix de Caux, which constrained him to make peace upon such terms as were agreeable to the duke: but the rancour between them never ceased, and was <sup>c</sup> in reality the latent cause of that implacable aversion, which, for a long series of years, produced perpetual quarrels between the kings of France and the Norman princes, when possessed of the realm of England. A rancour equally fatal to both realms <sup>d</sup>.

The king causes his son to be crowned, and soon after dies of poison.

THE king finding his health decay, though he was far from being old, judged it expedient to provide as well for the security of the kingdom, as for that of his family. He had married a second time a princess of Russia, by whom he had three sons; and the eldest of these, Philip, then about seven years of age, was, with the consent of the whole assembly, crowned by the archbishop of Rheims, on the feast of Whitsunday, with much solemnity, for many great lords assisted there in person, and others by their deputies; but there is nothing clearer than that as yet the twelve peers of France did not exist <sup>e</sup>. There is still remaining a copy of the oath, taken by the young monarch, which is but short, and of which three-fourths regards the clergy, their privileges and immunities; at the close he promises the people, that he will employ the authority conferred upon him to the maintenance of the laws. At the same time the king declared Baldwin earl of Flanders tutor and guardian to the young king, in case he should die before he came of age: and this was a wise and well-timed precaution; for on the fourth of April following he departed this life; some writers say by taking a dose of physic, and drinking after it, contrary to the express direction of his physician; but others seem to think that the physician was not altogether innocent, but that, under the name of a medicine, he administered poison <sup>f</sup>. He deceased in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and in the thirtieth of his reign. In his time pope Leo IX. came into France, and held a council at Rheims, in which several canons <sup>d</sup> were made against incestuous marriages, simony, and other crimes, which, in spite of the seeming piety, or rather superstition of that age, were but too frequent; and some bishops were also deposed, not much to the king's good-liking, who had been better pleased if the pope had remained at home; and, therefore, when pope Nicholas II. entertained thoughts of making a like visit, the king opposed it with such firmness, that he was obliged to desist from the design <sup>e</sup>. This monarch was of an active disposition, intrepid in time of danger, and very generous. He was desirous of maintaining and extending his authority, in which he was not unsuccessful; but his attempts to the prejudice of the duke of Normandy were alike fatal to his quiet, his honour, and his interest (D).

Philip accedes to the throne, under the tuition of the count of Flanders.

KING Philip, at the time of his accession, was about eight years of age; and it might have <sup>e</sup> been supposed that either his mother, or his uncle would have been called to the regency, and intrusted with the care of his education; but, as we before observed, the king his father thought it prudent to make another choice. He knew the queen was very unfit for such an office. She had weak parts, and strong passions; and, being a foreigner, was without respect, and had but few friends amongst the nobility. Her conduct after his demise sufficiently justified her exclusion, though she made some struggle to prevent it, but without effect; the very opposite reasons induced the king to decline placing any confidence in the duke of Burgundy: he was rich and powerful, too nearly allied to the young king, had great interest amongst the French lords, and besides had once set up a claim to the crown: but Baldwin V. surnamed the Pious, earl of Flanders, to whom he committed the care of his son, and who was his brother-in-law, <sup>f</sup> had all the qualities that could recommend him to such a trust; he was brave in his person, but mild in his behaviour, and very cautious in his conduct; vigilant, but not suspicious; tender

(D) Henry distinguished himself chiefly by his moderation, which was so much the more commendable, as it was purely the effects of his good sense, and not at all the effect of a heavy and phlegmatic constitution. This appeared particularly, when Tibaut, count of Champagne, did homage to the emperor Henry III. for when, upon his complaint, this monarch received a cold, and, as he thought, a disrespectful answer, he made no scruple of replying by a challenge; and, as the emperor was a gallant prince, it produced in him a high opinion of the king's merit, and, in consequence of it, a right understanding.

- a of the prerogatives of the crown, but more so of the welfare of the people; sincerely religious, and a man of strict honour<sup>x</sup>. He gave his pupil an education suitable to his rank and birth. He kept the nobility in awe, without giving any of them just cause of offence. He maintained peace by remaining always armed; and having intelligence that the people of Aquitaine were disposed to revolt, he, under pretence of repressing the Saracens, entered their country so suddenly with an army, that he prevented their design, by putting it out of their power to pursue it<sup>y</sup>. In a word, he governed with dignity and reputation, insomuch, that history scarce furnishes us with an instance of a minority more quiet, and none more happy than this. An example the more memorable, as the conjuncture was extremely delicate.
- b THE only colour that count Baldwin gave for censure was in his conduct towards duke William of Normandy, who, under the specious pretence of being called to the succession by Edward the Confessor, in prejudice to Eagar Atheling, who had a better title to the crown than himself, was preparing to invade England. The count gave him leave, upon this occasion, to raise forces throughout France and Flanders, which, from the event, was judged impolitic. Yet the duke, being his son-in-law, he could not, with a good grace, deny him; but the French own that there was another more powerful motive. The Norman was so enterprising and so fortunate, that Baldwin was afraid of his resentment, being justly apprehensive, that, if he had crossed him in his design, he might have entered France with that army which he had raised against England, where he succeeded more speedily, and with greater facility, than could possibly have been expected. But, to balance as far as possible this increase of his power, an offensive and defensive alliance was concluded between the crowns of France and Scotland; which, though it did not prove effectual, was, notwithstanding, the only remedy that was left. Soon after this great event took place, count Baldwin died, and left the young king, his nephew and pupil, in the peaceable possession of his dominions, when he had attained the fifteenth year of his age, and had some able ministers about him<sup>z</sup>.
- c THE king, as we observed, had been perfectly well educated, and was not at all deficient in point of capacity; but his mind had a wrong turn, which appeared in all his actions from first to last, though at the beginning of his reign he was as eager and active as he was indolent and passive during the greatest part of it. Geoffrey Martel, count of Anjou, having no children of his own, left his estates to the sons of his sister; the elder, Geoffrey, surnamed le Barbu, was an honest worthy man; but the younger, Foulques, was of quite a different character, and from thence received the surname of le Rechin, which implies morose and cruel. Under pretence that he had not his full share of the succession, he made war upon his brother; and, having corrupted some of his principal officers, who betrayed him into his hands, put him into prison, where he was so ill treated, that it made a great noise, and many of the nobility, and even the king, threatened Foulques, in case he did not set him at liberty. He thought it more expedient to sacrifice the Gastinois to the king; and Philip, having a share in the spoils, troubled himself no farther about the unfortunate Geoffrey<sup>a</sup>. This in itself would be too minute a circumstance for our notice, if it did not afford us a perfect notion of this prince's character, and of that subtilty and want of sincerity which ran through his whole conduct. He had a strong propensity to interfere in all quarrels and disputes amongst his neighbours, under colour of mediating between them, or of supporting the distressed; but, in reality, he meditated only the aggrandizing his own power, and procuring either a recompence for his assistance, or a consideration for being quiet. He gave the strongest proof of this in a case where, of all others, it ought least to have appeared. His tutor Baldwin earl of Flanders left behind him two sons, Baldwin, who succeeded him in his dominions, and Robert, count of Frize. The elder made war upon the younger; but being killed in battle, Robert possessed himself of Flanders, and constrained the widow of the deceased to retire with her two sons, Arnold and Baldwin, to Paris, where they were received with all possible testimonies of respect, and had the strongest assurances given them of being restored to their dominions<sup>b</sup>. King Philip entered Flanders accordingly, with a numerous army: but, having the misfortune to be totally beaten near St. Omers, and the young count Arnold being unfortunately killed by his uncle, Philip soon after abandoned the widow and the orphan, who had recourse to the emperor Henry III. for his protection; and, in all probability, had recovered their dominions, if the monarch of France had not entered into the interests of count Robert, who, to bind him faster, engaged him to espouse Bertha, the daughter of the counts of Frize, by her first husband, which obliged count Baldwin to content himself with the county of Hainault, and to make a cession to his uncle Robert of his hereditary dominions<sup>c</sup>. This did not give the French any high idea of their monarch; who, though he was so unfortunate in his foreign expedition, was haughty and oppressive at home, and governed his subjects as if he had thought the regal title gave him a power to oppress; and at the same time, took from those who felt the weight of his oppression the right of complaining, as well as of redress; and the circumstances of the times were such as permitted him to do this, without meeting with any remarkable check <sup>d</sup>.

Engages in a war with William the Conqueror, in which he meets with success.

It is no great wonder that a prince of such a disposition should not be very careful of commerce, or pay a deep respect to the law of nations: and it appears that this was the case, since some Italian merchants were plundered in his dominions, and, upon their report, the then pope, Gregory VII. took the affair very high. He made it a pretence to enquire into the general character and conduct of the king; and finding these such as they really were, he took from thence occasion to write to the duke of Aquitaine, exhorting him and the other great lords of France to remonstrate to the king, whom he stiles monster, wild beast, and tyrant, against his proceedings, promising to second their reproofs with the thunder of the church <sup>e</sup>. This did not immediately produce the effect that was intended; the great lords in France saw that the king was diminishing his own power, by harrassing and impoverishing his subjects; and as to those vices and crimes imputed to him by the pope, they were not so innocent themselves as to desire to see such precedents introduced: and the pope having the deposition of an emperor upon his hands, had not leisure to blow the coals long enough to raise a rebellion in France, which was very happy for the king <sup>f</sup>. He was no less fortunate in his first war against William surnamed the Conqueror, who came over from England with an army, in order to reduce Hoel duke of Bretagne, who refused to acknowledge him for his lord. The first fury of his arms was spent against Del, to which he laid siege, and from before which he was obliged to rise, with the loss of his baggage, by a numerous army commanded by king Philip in person; and soon after, this quarrel being composed, a peace was concluded, which heightened the presumption of Philip, who thence concluded in favour of his forces and fortune <sup>g</sup>.

Enters into intrigues with Robert, eldest son to William, who revolts against him.

This tranquillity did not, indeed could not, last long, considering the situation of things, and the opposite dispositions of the two monarchs; for William was open and violent, Philip malicious, which, however, he knew well how to conceal. He held a close correspondence with Robert, the eldest son of the Conqueror, a prince as ambitious of authority as he was incapable of executing it <sup>h</sup>. He had been the author of all the disturbances in Normandy; and at length, pretending to resent a childish action in his younger brothers, retired from court, and broke out into open rebellion. Philip not only encouraged as he had excited this behaviour, but also gave to Robert the town of Gerberoi, in Beauvoisin, a place of some strength, and very well situated for the purpose of disturbing Normandy. King William followed his son thither with an army, and besieged him <sup>i</sup>; but the fortress, being well provided, made a good defence, and prince Robert, who, with all his faults, was one of the bravest men of his time, in a sally wounded and unhorsed his father, but without knowing him, till his voice discovered who he was in his fall. Robert then raised him up, threw himself at his feet, and set him upon his own horse; which contributed somewhat to another peace, but never to a thorough reconciliation, the father being as little disposed to forgive as the son was to be quiet: and Philip, who affected upon all occasions being the mediator, was equally an enemy to both <sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 1081.

A new war with Normandy, which is ended by the death of the conqueror.

SOME years elapsed before things broke out again into a flame; and even then William, who never sought quarrels, would not have entered France, if the flippancy of the king's tongue had not provoked him to a reply, which made it necessary. The English monarch, who was a very unweildy man, being indisposed, kept his bed for some time; upon which Philip said often to his courtiers, "Though William is so long lying in, I doubt, when he comes abroad, he will be as big as ever." Which being reported to that prince, he said to those about him, "It will not be long before I go abroad, and let him know that so many lights shall be carried at my churching (for the custom then was, upon such occasions, for women to carry a torch) as shall enlighten all France, and make him repent his jest <sup>l</sup>." In execution of this threat he besieged the city of Mantes, ravaged the country round about, and, having taken the place, burnt it; but was so excessively heated by approaching too near the fire, that turning his horse to retire, and finding a ditch in his way, he, in leaping it, received a contusion from the pomel of his saddle in his stomach, of which he died not long after at Rouel, leaving behind him three sons, who were upon the worst terms possible with each other, and consequently stood alike exposed to the efforts of their enemies <sup>m</sup>.

- a claim to the realm of England, while his brother William was taking possession of it ; which not only frustrated his own designs, but brought William over with an army into Normandy <sup>n. treats a prince, who he pretends to espouse.</sup> Robert, suspecting his brother Henry to be secretly embarked in his design, despoiled him of the Cotentin, and then had recourse to Philip for his assistance. The king made great professions, and entered Normandy with an army which might have made these good ; but William slackened his pace by the help of money, and, by the repetition of this argument, detached him from the cause that wanted it. Robert was forced to consent to a peace ; by which William kept what he had conquered, Henry was restored to what he had lost, and the unfortunate prince first mentioned was at the expence of all <sup>o</sup>. The politics of Philip were right for the present, which is the rock that cunning splits on ; true wisdom would have taught him to support
- b Robert, and to have placed his security not in the division of the duchy of Normandy, but in preserving it for the lawful duke, and thereby making him his friend <sup>p</sup>. This was one false step ; he quickly committed another. He was grown weary of his wife, though he had by her two sons and a daughter. He recollected that she was related to him, though at a great distance ; or, perhaps, his flatterers forged a pedigree to make this probable. However it was, he found churchmen to divorce him, and sent her to Montreuil ; where, in process of time, she died of ill treatment and a broken heart. He then demanded in marriage Emma, the daughter of count Roger, brother to the duke of Calabria ; who, consenting to it, sent over the lady richly adorned with jewels, and with a large portion in ready money. The Italian writers A. D. 1092, say this was done purely to deprive her of them ; the French historians deny the intention ;
- c but, if the fact be certain, it signifies little what was the design <sup>q</sup>. As to the apparent reason, why the king did not espouse her, that arose from another slip in the king's conduct ; which, as it was one of the foulest, so it was also the most fatal he ever made, and the effects of which pursued him to his grave.

- FOULQUES LE RECHIN, count of Anjou, whose character we mentioned before, though far in years, and though he had two wives already, having heard of Bertrand de Montfort, a young lady esteemed the handsomest in France, was bent on marrying her, and, not without some difficulty, brought it about, her family sacrificing her to their own interest. This woman, tired of an old, gouty, and surly husband, and hearing that the king had parted with his wife, privately invited him to come and see her. Upon this he framed some pretence for going to
- d Tours, where the count of Anjou received him with all possible duty and respect ; in return for which he seduced his wife to elope, and follow him to Orleans <sup>r</sup>. He was not satisfied with the possession of this woman, but he resolved, at all events, to marry her, and to this end a divorce was procured between her and her husband ; but when this bar was removed, none of the bishops of France could be prevailed on to celebrate this marriage, or even to be present at it. He contrived, however, to get it done, with some kind of solemnity, by Eudes, bishop of Bayeux, brother by the mother's side to William the Conqueror, in the presence of the bishop of Senlis, and the archbishop of Rouen, all Normans <sup>s</sup>. This did not hinder pope Urban the second from causing the whole matter to be closely examined, in a council held at Autun, where the king was excommunicated in case he did not part with this woman, whom
- e he styled his wife. Some have pretended that his subjects were released from their obedience, and the kingdom put under an interdict ; but in this there is no truth, all the effects of the excommunication were, that he did not hear divine service in public, and that he did not wear his crown or robes of state. It is true, the pope threatened to proceed further ; but the king, promising to submit, obtained a stay of the censure. However, as he broke his word, the pope summoned another council at Clermont, in which he was excommunicated afresh <sup>t</sup>, the clergy of France making no manner of opposition.

- It was in this council that the first croisade was published for the recovery of the Holy Land ; it was about this time also, or rather a little before, that Henry of Burgundy went, with other French lords, to the assistance of the Spaniards against the Infidels, which procured that young prince a marriage suitable to his rank, and the county of Portugal in dowry with his wife ; but these examples wrought nothing on the king. His brother Hugo, indeed, took the cross, and his friend Robert duke of Normandy ; but as for Philip, though he humbled himself so far to the pope as to procure an absolution, yet wanting alike the fortitude of a prince and the true principle of a penitent, he relapsed into his former scandalous manner of living with the countess of Anjou, and was excommunicated a third time. His conduct, so unworthy of a prince, exposed him justly to the contempt of the people <sup>u</sup>. Too many of the nobility followed his example, and at the same time despised his authority ; not only making war upon each other, but spoiling and robbing his subjects with equal impudence and impunity. All this time Philip was soliciting and cajoling the court of Rome, till at length he prevailed with a pope Paschal to cause the whole of his affair to be reviewed in a council held at Poitiers, which, notwithstanding all the efforts that could be made by the populace, excited by his partizans, terminated in a new excommunication <sup>w</sup>. But notwithstanding this, the queen being dead, and the old count of Anjou offering, for a large sum of money, to give whatever assistance might be requisite to procure a papal dispensation for the king's marriage, he renewed his instances at Rome, offering at the same time to submit to whatever penance should be enjoined; and in the end, by the influence of presents and prayers, obtained absolution <sup>x</sup>.

Lewis his son, and heir apparent, associated with him in the government.

BUT though this quieted in some measure, his domestic affairs, yet, in respect to his authority, it was so far from being re-established, that the nobility affected more and more a degree of independency, utterly incompatible with the respect due to him by the constitution, as it then stood. Some of them, indeed, such as William duke of Aquitaine, and even the count of Anjou, behaved in a very different manner; but this arose from their own notions of things, and particular connections, and not from a principle of obedience, or any awe they stood in of his power: for the lesser nobility, and even his immediate vassals, insulted him every hour, plundered his subjects, and cut off the communication between Paris and Orleans. All this did not rouse Philip from that idle and indolent course of life which he had led for many years, and, rather than it should, he associated his eldest son Lewis, or at least declared him, with the consent of his nobility, his successor <sup>y</sup>. This young prince was the very reverse of his father, active, vigilant, affable, free from the vices incident to youth, and in all respects one of the bravest and worthiest men this country ever produced. It may be the vices of the father, and the consequences of these vices, might be the best lessons to his son. He saw that, in a corrupted state, there was nothing to be done but by force; he kept therefore continually in the field, with a small body of troops about him, and these he employed against such as would not listen to the dictates of justice and equity, and even treated the laws of their country with derision. He demolished their castles, he compelled them to restitution, he forced them to abandon the estates of which they had deprived the bishops and the clergy; and he did this in so disinterested a manner, and with so indisputable a zeal for the public welfare, that, after a few victories gained, and some unavoidable instances of severity, he brought things into tolerable order, and at the same time gained the affection of the better part of the nobility, and the reverence of the people in general so absolutely, that all historians agree he saved the state from destruction, and the monarchy from being absolutely subverted <sup>z</sup>. A service so great, that it merited a return very different from that which it met with.

His mother-in-law first compels him to fly to England, and then poisons him.

BERTRADE, who now stiled herself queen of France, saw, with infinite chagrin, the good fortune of Lewis, and the universal respect that was paid him, notwithstanding that she could not but be sensible that Philip could scarce have preserved himself upon the throne, if Providence had not raised him up such a support. She had two sons by the king, and had the succession in view; to which she thought Lewis the only obstacle, his brother Henry being dead <sup>a</sup>. This induced her to practise all her arts, and none of her sex had more, to strengthen her own party, and to distress and disturb the young king. He was not at all of a temper capable of returning such usage; and therefore, when he found the realm in some degree of quiet, he thought it better to retire out of the reach of the storm than to run the risk of supporting it. It was chiefly with this view that he made a voyage to England; though probably with some plausible pretence, since it was with the consent of king Philip, and was received by Henry with the greatest testimonies of kindness and esteem <sup>b</sup>. He had not been long at court, before the English monarch received, by an express, a letter from king Philip, signifying that, for certain important reasons, he should be exceedingly obliged to him if he closely confined his son, or removed him altogether out of the way. Henry, instead of executing so infamous a request, shewed the letter to Lewis, gave him his best advice, and, having loaded him with presents, sent him home with all the marks of honour and regard possible. At his return, Lewis demanded justice for this attempt; at which the king appeared much amazed, as having in reality no concern in it <sup>c</sup>. But Bertrade, whose fear was now as strong as her ambition, thinking there was no time to be lost, no means to be left untried, procured poison to be given him; which wrought so violently, that the ablest physicians thought it impossible to save him. A stranger, however, undertook the cure, and succeeded in it, only a paleness remained in his countenance during life, notwithstanding that he grew afterwards so corpulent as to be surnamed the Gross <sup>d</sup>.

- a UPON this new and flagrant act of violence, Lewis was on the point of coming to extremities, and of having recourse to the same methods for obtaining justice in his own cause, which he had so often employed to procure it for others. But the king, unable to part with Bertrade, and as unable to protect her, had recourse to the pity of his son, to whom he obliged her to make the most humble submissions; and it was upon this occasion that she shewed the utmost extent of her address, insomuch that it still remains undecided, whether she feigned or felt that penitence by which she totally disarmed Lewis of his resentment<sup>c</sup>. We may the less wonder at this, since we are informed, that she had such an absolute command over the morose Foulques le Rechin, that he passed whole days at her feet like her slave; and it is certain, that he entertained the king and her at Angiers with all the pomp and magnificence possible, and waited
- b on them in person at table. After this reconciliation, she shewed upon all occasions the most profound respect for Lewis, acknowledged that he merited the crown he had saved, and placed all hopes in providing for the safety and subsistence of her children in recommending them to his favour<sup>f</sup>.

WE meet with nothing after this, that can be styled memorable, in the reign of Philip, see the death of Philip, and the circumstances of his family. their does it clearly appear whether, with all his submissions to the see of Rome, by which he disgraced himself so much in the eyes of strangers and of his own subjects, he obtained a full confirmation of his marriage; that is, such a confirmation as the pontiffs assumed to themselves a power of giving. It is, however, generally speaking, held probable that he did; since, towards the close of his reign, the historians give her the title of queen, and speak of her children as rendered capable of the succession<sup>g</sup>. Yet Mezeray suspects this, and says, with great freedom, that the bishops of France flattered the king's infamous adultery, by bestowing on it the honourable title of marriage<sup>h</sup>. But, however this might be, he remained as much attached to her as ever, to the last hour of his life. He died at Melun, on the 29th of July, A. D. 1108, in the 50th year of his reign, reckoning from his coronation in his father's life-time, and in the 47th from the decease of that prince<sup>i</sup>. There were many great actions performed by the French nation while he sat upon the throne, though there was little done by him; but as these actions must be treated of in other places, it would have been to no purpose to distract the thread of our narration by short and imperfect accounts of them, merely because they fell within this period of time (E).

- d LEWIS the sixth, called by the old historians Lewis Thibaut, and, from his size in the latter part of his reign, surnamed Lewis the Gross, assumed the sole administration of affairs on the demise of his father, when he was entering the 30th year of his age. The first thing he thought necessary was his coronation, notwithstanding, as most writers say, he had been actually crowned in the life-time of his father, and in this he met with some difficulty<sup>k</sup>. There was at this time a schism in the church of Rheims; and therefore, by the advice of the bishop of Chartres, who was one of the most respectable prelates in France, the king caused himself to

(E) Philip, though he had few virtues, had many good qualities; he was courteous, generous, and compassionate, to persons in distress; which rendered him easy in private life, and in a great measure abated that hatred, which otherwise would have been excited by his vices(6). In his time it became a custom for the great officers of state to witness charters and other instruments of a public nature. Under his reign began the religious orders of the chartreux, cisteaux, and canons regular of St. Augustine. He took advantage of the first croisade to unite to the dominions of the crown the county of Bourges, sold to him by its lord to raise money for his equipage. The great indolence of his temper promoted that expedition, which a prince of a higher spirit would, perhaps, have prevented, and under an active king the great lords of France would have been less forward (7). His ancestors had done much towards reforming the morals of the people; in his time they became very corrupt, which was owing to several causes, but chiefly to his own bad example, and the luxury of his court, the restraining priests from marriage by a decree of the council of Troyes, and by the effects of the croisade. By his queen Bertha, who died of a broken heart at Montrcuil, he had his successor Lewis, Henry, who died young, and Constantia, who married first Hugues, count of Troyes, and, being divorced from him, on pretence of consanguinity, Beaumont prince of Antioch. His children by the famous Bertrade, who is said to have died a penitent, were Philip count of Mante, whose estates were confiscated for rebellion, and who died without issue, Florence, who left only a daughter, and Cecilia, who was twice married, first to Tancred, prince of Antioch, and next to Pons de Toulouse, count of Tripoli (8). Philip, by his own desire, was buried at Fleury, which is the same monastery now known by the name of St. Bennet on the Loire. He reigned longer than any of his predecessors except Clotaire, and than any of his successors except Lewis the fourteenth (9).

be crowned at Orleans by the bishop of that city. This, being done with great solemnity, might probably add some weight to his authority; but it was very far from procuring him that tranquillity which he expected. This disturbance did not arise from the great lords, who had an affection for his person, and had not the least cause to be jealous of his power; but from the insolence of his immediate vassals, who justly apprehending that he would put an end to those exorbitancies which they had hitherto committed with impunity, confederated together to give him all the trouble in their power. In order to conceive this, and without a clear conception of it what we have to say will be unintelligible, it is requisite to observe, that the domain, that is, the territory actually in possession of the king, consisted only of Paris, Orleans, Etamps, Compeigne, Melun, Bourges, and a few other places of less consideration<sup>1</sup>. Amongst the lords then in arms the principal were the lords of Corbeil and Mante du Puiset,<sup>b</sup> in Beauce, de Couci, de Montfort, de Monilherre, de Rochefort, &c. Their fiefs lay so intermixed with the king's domain as put it out of his power to assemble, on any occasion, the whole of the little force he had, gave them the most favourable opportunities of making diversions, when any of them were attacked, and in short embroiled him in such a manner, that, though he had the lofty title of king of France, he had scarce the strength of a duke of Burgundy. Of this a more flagrant instance cannot be given, than his being obliged thrice to besiege the little castle of Puiset. The first time he was disappointed for want of provisions; at the second he was beaten by the confederates, and forced to raise the siege; but at last he became master of, and demolished, it. He treated in the same manner other fortresses, as soon as he reduced them; but what he chiefly relied on were the laws, with the execution of which he charged himself by force of arms; and acting in this matter with an impartial spirit of justice, he gained the respect of the clergy, and the love of the common people, whom he protected upon all occasions, not only against the oppressions of their lords, but also the officers of the crown and army, according to his own excellent maxim, that a king ought to have no favourites but his people<sup>m</sup>.

Finds a very formidable enemy in Henry I. king of England.

It was not till he had reduced most of these malecontents, of whom he left very few in a capacity to give him farther trouble, that he began to take notice of his capital enemy, without whose encouragement those lords durst not have stirred, and but for whose assistance they must have been quickly subdued: this was Henry king of England, one of the ablest, and at the same time one of the most ambitious, princes of that age; who, while he held fair correspondence, and professed the utmost kindness and friendship for the two kings Philip and Lewis, held, nevertheless, a close correspondence with the malecontents, and encouraged them to remain in arms to the very last, that he might have nothing to fear for his duchy of Normandy; and that, by wasting and harrassing each other, their strength might be so far reduced, as to afford him an opportunity of making certain acquisitions, upon which he had set his eyes, to these his favourite dominions<sup>n</sup>. The point upon which Lewis demanded satisfaction, was the demolition of Gisors on the Epte, which had been stipulated by treaty; but which, by various pretences, Henry had hitherto eluded. When their armies were on the point of coming to a battle, Lewis proposed an accommodation; and, when that failed, offered to decide the dispute by a single combat; at which Henry smiled, and said, that he could but keep the place if he was victorious, which was already in his hands without fighting; so that the king of France staked his life against a place of importance, whereas he was to stake his life, and that too, against nothing<sup>o</sup>. A battle ensued, in which the Normans were beat, and not long after a peace was concluded, and William, the only son of Henry, did homage to king Lewis for the duchy of Normandy: which the king his father constantly refused to do, as thinking it inconsistent with the dignity of a crowned head, or rather of so potent a prince<sup>p</sup>.

His vessels give him fresh trouble, and oblige him to remain almost always in the field.

This war was scarce ended, before the king found himself again involved in fresh broils with his vassals, against whom he was continually fighting battles, with various success, and very frequently at the great hazard of his life<sup>q</sup>. It may seem strange that a king of France, able to lead numerous armies into the field, and maintain them against the English monarch in Normandy, should not be able to crush the little lords in his own dominions, whose own insolence was the sole ground of their quarrel, and the single object they had in view plundering the poor people<sup>r</sup>. But this difficulty will be solved, by observing, that, in his wars with Henry Lewis was assisted by the great vassals of the crown, particularly by Robert count of Flanders; who with their forces served at their own expence, not only because it was their duty, but because they were as jealous of the power of Henry as Lewis himself: but, in the war against his own vassals, they took no share at all; or, if they did, it was by way of conse-

a deracy with the king, and then the opposing party had their confederates likewise. This also A. D. 1110. accounts for the encouragement given by kings to those repeated expeditions into the Holy Land, which depopulated their dominions, and deprived them of their subjects, but delivered them at the same time from those mutinous noblemen, who, if they had not been thus fighting abroad, would have been continually embarked in rebellions at home<sup>1</sup>.

THE count de Blois, likewise styled count of Champagne, who was nephew to the king of England, quickly revived the war between the two kings, though it was carried on in his name; and Lewis, to shew that he could negotiate as well as fight, drew in Foulques count of Anjou, the son of Foulques le Rechin and Bertrade, to refuse homage to Henry for the county of Maine, which he had acquired by marriage; but this war did not turn at all to his advantage, since his army was not only totally defeated by that of the count of Blois, but also the gallant earl of Flanders trampled to death<sup>2</sup>. Soon after the king of England arrived in Normandy, and having got Robert de Belesme, one of the lords who revolted from him, into his hands, sent him to prison, from whence he was discharged only by death, and so frightened the rest of the malecontents, that they speedily submitted; and, the two kings meeting at Gisors, a peace was concluded, entirely to the king of England's honour and interest, to whom not only the count of Anjou did homage for the county of Maine, but also Alain the third for his duchy of Bretagne; and, what strengthened him still more, he married one of his daughters to Conan, the son of that duke, the other being already married to the emperor Henry the fifth, and at the same time his son William espoused the daughter and heiress of the count of Anjou<sup>3</sup>. The king, after this peace, thinking it high time to settle himself, and to secure the succession, espoused Alix, or Adelaide, the daughter of Humbert count of Maurienne, or of Savoy, for whom he had a strong and lasting affection during his whole life. This marriage did not, indeed, add any immediate strength to the king; but the new queen rendered herself so acceptable to the nobility, and acted on all occasions with so much wisdom and discretion, as proved of great use to Lewis during the remaining part of his reign<sup>4</sup>.

THE misfortunes of the last war chagrined this monarch exceedingly, and therefore he readily listened to the intercession of a young prince, who, after traversing several other courts, though a perfect youth, came at last to take shelter in his. This was William, the son of Robert duke of Normandy, and grandson to the conqueror, who earnestly pressed him to intercede for his father's liberty, and for the restitution of the duchy of Normandy, which he claimed as his right. The king advised him to form as strong a party as he could in Normandy; to engage the counts of Flanders and Anjou in his interest; and that, whenever they were ready to act, he should not find him backward. In this William succeeded to his wish; and, when all things were perfectly ripe, he signified to Henry his desire that an end might be put to duke Robert's imprisonment<sup>5</sup>. This being peremptorily refused, the king and the earl of Flanders entered Normandy; upon which the nobility began every-where to rise, and proclaimed William their duke. In his whole reign Henry was never so much embarrassed; a conspiracy broke out in his court, which alarmed him more than all the rest. The earl of Flanders advanced to the very gates of Rouen, and burnt the suburbs; some places of strength were taken, others revolted, and his affairs fell very low; yet he made no overtures of peace. On the contrary, he disputed every inch of ground, brought over forces from England, and kept his fortified places well garrisoned and well supplied, till the duke of Bretagne and the earl of Champagne marched to his assistance<sup>6</sup>. Lewis, with his victorious army, acted with great vigour, and marching to reduce Nojon, were surprised to find Henry in their way ready to give them battle; the action was very brisk, though not very bloody; the kings were respectively very near being killed or taken; but at length, through the military skill of Henry, Lewis was totally defeated, and forced to fly on foot, and with much difficulty arrived at Andely<sup>7</sup>. Soon after pope Calixtus the second held a great council at Rheims, at which king Lewis assisted in person, where he made great complaints of Henry; upon which the pontif undertook to mediate a peace between them: for which purpose he went to Gisors, where he conferred with the king of England about his own affairs, as well as those of Lewis; but found him equally firm as to both. This pontif had, in the council, excommunicated the emperor Henry the fifth, on the subject of investitures, and threatened the English king with the same treatment, but to no purpose. Besides, Henry had bought the count of Anjou, Baldwin earl of Flanders was dead of the wounds he received in the last battle, and most of the Norman lords were either ruined or reduced; so that Lewis was once more obliged to make peace with him upon his own terms. The joy of Henry, however, was quickly qualified by the loss of his two sons, and a great multitude of his nobility, who were ship-wrecked in their passage to England, through their own ill-conduct, and the drunkenness of the seamen <sup>a</sup>.

A war with the emperor, in which Lewis brings a prodigious army into the field.

THE king of France, considering that Henry had now no issue male remaining, supplied duke William, the son of Robert, with large sums of money, and enabled him thereby to renew his intrigues with the nobility of Normandy; who, looking upon him as the last heir of their antient dukes, notwithstanding all they had suffered, had a very strong affection for him. The count of Anjou, seeing his daughter a widow, and without children, by the death of prince William of England, gave his second daughter Sybilla to that young prince, with the county of Maine <sup>b</sup>. Charles of Denmark, who had succeeded his cousin Baldwin in the earldom of Flanders, embarked likewise in this design, and the confederacy grew so strong, that at length they made but little doubt of carrying their point; but the prudent and fortunate Henry disappointed them once more. He had espoused the cousin of the pope, and by that means gained him so much to his interest, that, upon exhibiting the pedigrees of duke William and the daughter of the count of Anjou, their marriage was declared null, and that unfortunate prince left once more without any other support than his merit and birth; and coming in person into Normandy, before things were settled, he seized some of the malecontents, cajoled others, and defeated the rest <sup>c</sup>. It remained to complete his revenge to humble the king of France, and with this view he excited the emperor Henry the fifth, who quickly assembled all the power of Germany; giving out, that he would burn the city of Rheims to the ground, in resentment of the excommunication pronounced against him in the council held there. Lewis took advantage of this declaration, and summoned all the vassals of the crown to send their forces to Amiens at a short day, when it clearly appeared how different a thing it was to attack the kingdom and the king of France; for when Lewis put himself at the head of the army, it consisted of two hundred thousand men, and, on their beginning to march, the emperor abandoned his design; and dismissing the army he had raised in Lorraine, retired into the heart of his own dominions <sup>d</sup>. The king, willing to make use of so irresistible a force, would have led them immediately into Normandy, in order to establish duke William, to whom he had given another wife, with a considerable territory, on the frontiers of that duchy. His great vassals, however, told him plainly, that they would do no such thing; for that they assembled to defend the territories of France from the invasion of a foreign prince, and not to extend his power by destroying that balance which arose from the king of England's possessing Normandy, which they looked upon as necessary to their safety <sup>e</sup>. On this occasion we first hear of the oriflame, which was, properly speaking, the banner of the abbey of St. Denis, being a crimson flag fixed to a gilt lance, from whence it derived its name; and from its being borne, on this occasion, before the king, came in after-times to be considered as the royal standard of France. At this time, however, every abby had its standard, and some lord who was its advoyer, or protector, who commanded their tenants and men of war, whenever, according to the strange custom of that age, they happened to have any quarrel with their neighbours, which they were inclined to decide, as all points of controversy were then decided, by the law of arms <sup>f</sup>.

William, the son of Robert duke of Normandy, declared count of Flanders, and killed there.

THE drawing together this amazing force inclined, and the death of the emperor, which happened soon after, made it necessary for, the king of England to conclude a peace, to which king Lewis was not at all averse; so that it was quickly settled upon easy and equal terms, and, which is somewhat extraordinary, was much better observed than any treaty between these two princes had hitherto been; and yet, under pretence of assisting their allies, these monarchs, from time to time, gave the world sufficiently to understand they were far from being reconciled. Charles earl of Flanders, being assassinated by some discontented subjects, Lewis entered that country with a small army; and, having surprized the offenders, punished them as they deserved. After this, the question was, how to dispose of the dignity, to which there were many pretenders, and amongst them Baldwin earl of Mons, whose grandfather had been deprived of the earldom by Robert count of Frize, and Thierry count of Alsace, who was sister's son to that count of Frize <sup>g</sup>. The king set them all aside to make way for William, the son of Robert duke of Normandy, which answered two purposes; it gave the king a right to resume what he had bestowed upon this prince, till he could obtain for him some establishment, and it put it much more in his power to support his claim to his father's duchy than hitherto it had ever been. Henry, on the other hand, resolving at any rate to gain the count of Anjou, married his only daughter, the empress dowager, to Geoffrey Platagenet, the son of that count, though a boy; and not long after the count himself, partly at the king's persuasion, and partly from ambition, went into the Holy Land, to receive the crown of Jerusalem <sup>h</sup>. Having thus secured himself a from all apprehensions on that side, he directed his old ally, the earl of Champagne, to support Thierry of Alsace against his nephew count William, in which contest, however, that young prince had the better; but, receiving a wound in the hand, a gangrene seized the arm, of which he died. This gave his competitor an opportunity to make himself master of Flanders; upon which the king received his homage; which prevented Henry, who waited all A. D. 1128. this time in Normandy to see what turn the war would take, from breaking openly with France. A thing which he studiously avoided, unless secure of some advantage<sup>i</sup>.

b As peace was now restored, the king thought it expedient to place the crown upon the head of his eldest son Philip; which was accordingly done, with all the usual solemnities, at Rheims. This being over, he thought himself more at leisure to correct many inconveni-

c encies which had gradually crept into different parts of the kingdom, and which, in those times, could be done no other way than by force; and if, in these his good endeavours, he met with opposition from some of the great lords, he was assisted and supported by others: so that, by executing the decrees of his supreme courts of justice, he rendered appeals frequent, and, with an apparent zeal for the public good, extended his own authority<sup>k</sup>. Pope Innocent the second, finding himself constrained to leave Rome by his competitor, retired into France, where he was received with great respect, and kept his Easter with great splendour at Paris. But the joy of the court was quickly turned into mourning by the fall of the young king Philip from his horse, of which he died on the 3d of October. Before the close of the month a general council was held at Rheims, in which the king as well as the pope d was present, and there the crown was set upon the head of Lewis, his eldest surviving son, at that time about twelve years of age. The suddenness of this coronation, after so unlucky an accident, is accounted for by an old historian, who reports, that a party was forming amongst the great lords and prelates for transferring the crown to another family, if the king, with the assistance of pope Innocent, had not prevented it, in the manner that has been related<sup>l</sup>. With all his excellent qualities, and the more candid of the French historians acknowledge him the best of their kings, he had a failing, if it may be called so, which raised a secret dislike to him, and increased with his years. This failing consisted in a certain freedom of speech; honest, sincere, and well-meaning himself, he despised flattery, and he hated falshood; pious, without hypocrisy or superstition, he treated very roughly such of the prelates as acted inconsistent with their character; obedient to the laws himself, his zeal for justice had led him to correct such of the nobility as acted tyrannically, with a degree of rigour that made them secret enemies to him and his family. But, while they meditated the humiliation of both, Providence placed the crown upon the head of the young Lewis, in the sight of four hundred prelates, assembled from different parts, the major part of the nobility, and the ambassadors and deputies of several foreign nations, with general applause<sup>m</sup>.

e By long experience the greater vassals of the crown began to perceive, that the king's views were very honourable, and that, though he was very quick, he was no less steady in his resolutions; and therefore Thibaut, count of Champagne, and other great lords, reconciled themselves to him; so that all the arts of his rival could never detach them again from his interest. But, in the midst of his prosperity, he fell into a languishing state of health, being in a manner overwhelmed with fat. As his strength wore away, he prepared for death, by setting his affairs in order; and, when he thought it so near as to receive the sacraments of the church, he drew his signet ring from his finger, and put it upon that of his son, with these words: "By this sign I invest you with sovereign authority; but remember that it is Admirable advice given to his son by king Lewis in his declining state.
 "no other than a public employment, to which you are called by Providence, and for the exercise of which you are to give a strict account in the world to come<sup>n</sup>." He grew better after this, but he would never use any of the ensigns of royal authority; but whenever he appeared abroad on horseback, he was surrounded by vast crowds of people, who, by loud acclamations, testified their zeal for his government, and their affection for his person<sup>o</sup>.

f An accident contributed not a little to the revival of the king's strength. William the tenth, duke of Guienne and Aquitaine, resolving to make a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James of Compostella, bequeathed his extensive territories to his daughter Eleanor, upon condition that she married the young king Lewis; and he dying in that pilgrimage, the king sent his son, most nobly attended, to Bordeaux, where the marriage was celebrated with great pomp, and the young princess solemnly crowned queen of France, and the young king was inaugurated as duke of Aquitaine and Poitiers<sup>p</sup>. In the mean time Lewis le Gros, unable to support the heat of the dog-days, died at Paris, on the 1st of August, in the 30th year of his reign, and 60th of his age<sup>q</sup>. historians say he might have made a better king ; but, they allow, a better man never graced a their throne : posterity perhaps may think this no diminution of his character.

Lewis VII.
perplexed by the remains of the faction formed against his father.

LEWIS, at the time of his father's demise, was eighteen years of age, and, as all writers agree, was surnamed le Jeune. If this was only to distinguish him from his father, then we ought to stile him Lewis the younger ; but a certain writer tells us, that this surname was given him on his separating from his wife Elcanor, and giving her back the duchy of Guienne ; and then it has quite another signification, and implies, that Lewis was always a young man<sup>r</sup>. The same troubles that perplexed the beginning of his father's, disturbed also the entrance of his reign ; that is, several of the nobility indulged themselves in great excesses, which, as we have already shewn, were no otherwise to be suppressed than by force. The king, therefore, having put good garrisons into the fortresses of his new dominions, returned to Orleans ; where, upon his attempting to assemble troops, the commons, who owed all their privileges to his father's favour, revolted : but Lewis quickly reduced and chastised them, as he likewise did the lords<sup>s</sup>. It is remarked, and it deserves to be remarked, that he did not follow his father's example, in being crowned a second time. Eustace, the son of Stephen earl of Bologne, who had seated himself in the English throne, had done homage to Lewis the Gros for the duchy of Normandy ; the king, to fix him more effectually to his interests, gave him his sister in marriage ; which, however, made no impression upon Thibaut earl of Champagne, elder brother to the English monarch, and uncle to Eustace, who began to renew his old practices, and to form intrigues against a prince whom he thought too tenderly educated to lead the life his father had done, who was almost always in arms, and whose experience he thought insufficient to deal with one who had made the framing such kind of confederacies almost the sole business of his life. But in this he found himself exceedingly mistaken, and this notwithstanding he was more in the right than perhaps he had ever been in his life<sup>t</sup>.

ALBRIC, archbishop of Bourges, dying, the chapter of that see elected Pierre de la Châtre, without having the king's permission ; upon which Lewis swore he should not be archbishop, commanding the chapter to proceed to a new election, leaving them at full liberty to elect whom they pleased, Pierre de la Châtre only excepted, which they refused to do ; and the pope declaring in favour of the new archbishop, he retired into the estates of the count of Champagne, and excommunicated the king's domain within the bounds of his archbishoprick. Lewis, upon this, pushed Thibaut so hard, that he was on the point of coming to terms, when a new accident excited still greater disturbances<sup>u</sup>. Rodolph, count of Vermandois, who was the king's chief minister, and his near relation, obtained a divorce from his wife, under pretence of their being related, and married Petronilla, the queen's sister ; but his first wife being nearly related to the count of Champagne, he solicited the pope to send a legate into France to review this divorce, who presently declared it null, and excommunicated Rodolph, in case he did not leave his second wife, and take back his first<sup>v</sup>. This so provoked the king, that he made another expedition into Champagne ; where having taken Vitri, he caused the church to be set on fire, in which thirteen hundred people were either choaked or burnt. But when he came to reflect on this cruel action, he not only admitted the archbishop, and made peace with the count, but resolved to expiate his offence by going to the Holy Land.

Clairvaux, and Suger, abbot of St.
Denis.

IT is necessary here to enter into the characters of two ecclesiastics, upon whom at this juncture the fate of the king and kingdom absolutely turned. These, though different in other respects, agreed in the singular qualities of unfeigned piety and absolute disinterestedness. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, was, for those times, learned, naturally eloquent, austere in his life, irreproachable in his morals, zealous in the highest degree, and withal inflexible. He had long before gained the reputation of a saint, he was heard as an oracle, and revered as a prophet<sup>x</sup>. Suger, abbot of St. Denis, was a man of another kind, mean in his birth, and meaner in his aspect ; he was so distinguished by his merit, that he had a great share in the administration during the former reign, and, which was not a little strange, was equally respected and beloved in his convent for his humility and strict manner of life, and admired in the council for his prudence and penetration. Lewis the Gros loved him for his sincerity ; Lewis le Jeune respected him as his father. Thibaut count of Champagne, the most artificial man of his time, set so high a value on the friendship of the abbot of St. Denis, that he seldom refused him any thing, and never attempted to deceive him<sup>y</sup>. Bernard earnestly pressed the king to make the expedition against the infidels in person ; Suger persuaded him to contribute men and money, but to remain at home, and govern his people wisely. Bernard carried his point by his vehemence ; and Suger, though he submitted, retained his own opinion, and made no scruple of foretelling the inconveniencies that would attend this measure ; while

- a Bernard, as if inspired, magnified the honour that would result from it, and made himself in a great measure answerable for its success<sup>2</sup>.

A GREAT council of the nobility and prelates was called at Vizila in Burgundy, that a matter of this importance might not seem to be undertaken without the consent of the nation. Hitherto such assemblies had been stiled, by historians who wrote in Latin, Conventus, or Placita; but we find this denominated Magnum Parliamentum, which is the first time that we meet with this word; and from hence the reader will form a just notion of the parliaments of France, which, however altered or fallen from what they were, are all that is left of these ancient parliaments<sup>3</sup>. As there was not in Vizila a church capable of holding even a small part of so great a number of people, the assembly was held in the open air. The abbot

Lewis, at the influence of St. Bernard, assumes the cross, and, in imitation of him, great part of the nobility.

- b Bernard read the letter of pope Eugene the third, which he seconded by a vehement declamation. The king rose up, and received from his hand the cross which had been sent him from Rome, and then made a discourse of the like kind. His queen followed his example; and then Alonso de St. Gilles count of Toulouse, Thierry d'Alsace count of Flanders, Henry, son of the count of Champagne, Guy count of Nevers, Renaud his brother, count of Tonnere, Robert count of Dreux, brother to the king, Yves count of Soissons, William count of Ponthieu, William count of Varenne, cousin to the king, Archambaud de Bourbon, Enguerrand de Couci, Geoffrey Rancon, Hugues de Lusignan, William de Courtenai, and many other lords, spoke to the same purpose, the multitude of persons of inferior rank, who entered into the same engagements, almost exceeded computation<sup>4</sup>. The abbot Bernard, after appointing
- c another assembly to be held before Easter, went to preach the crusade in Germany; where, by the force of his irresistible elocution, he prevailed on the emperor Conrad the third, Frederic duke of Suabia, who was afterwards emperor, and an infinite number of all ranks, to embrace the same design<sup>5</sup>.

- An expedition of this nature could not be undertaken with too much deliberation, and therefore there were two more assemblies held before the king left France, in which Rodolph count of Vermandois, and Suger, abbot of St. Denis, were chosen and confirmed regents of France during the king's absence<sup>6</sup>. The forces assembled upon this occasion were suitable to the extent and grandeur of the French monarchy, though the writers of that age do not very exactly agree; the most authentic affirm, that it was composed of fourscore thousand horse, the
- d infantry was very numerous besides, and their very sutlers and attendants might have made a considerable army. There were many reasons which might have deterred the emperor, as well as the king of France, from taking the route of the first crusade by land, and by the way of Constantinople; but there were other motives so strong as to prevail over these, or rather the impossibility of transporting such armies by sea was so apparent, that they were in a manner compelled to overlook objections that could not otherwise have failed to deter them<sup>7</sup>. The emperor, with his troops, marched first through Hungary into the territories of the Greek emperor, and, passing over the streights of Constantinople, entered into Asia. Lewis followed him, and was received with great complaisance, and the highest testimonies of respect, by the Greek emperor Manuel Comnenus. On his arrival in the neighbourhood of Nice, he
- e found the emperor Conrad with the miserable remains of his army, the far greatest part of which had perished by the swords of the Turks and the treachery of the Greeks; and it was not long before the king had his full share of the like misfortunes; at least so we find things represented by the historians of those times<sup>8</sup>.

The emperor and the king of France march by land to Constantinople. A. D. 1147.

- THE history of the crusades belongs to another part of this work, and therefore it is our intention to say nothing more here than is absolutely requisite to render the history of this reign coherent. Without entering, therefore, into any discussion of what some writers have charged upon the Greeks, or of what they have advanced in defence of themselves, we will proceed in our narrative, and inform the reader, that, after defeating the infidels on the banks of the river Meander, and being not long after beaten by them, and in great danger of
- f losing his life, Lewis at length arrived at Antioch, where Raymond de Poitiers, his wife's uncle, was then prince<sup>9</sup>. He was received with all possible demonstrations of kindness and politeness, his troops furnished with every thing necessary, and, by the arrival of succours from Italy, by sea, his army was once more become very respectable. This gleam of prosperity lasted not long. The king quickly found that the prince of Antioch had merely his own interest in view, and was desirous of employing the French troops in extending the bounds of his principality, by reducing several considerable places seated on his frontiers. Lewis grew likewise uneasy as to the behaviour of his wife, whose gallantries began to make a great noise ; and on the other hand the prince of Antioch induced the queen to pretend some scruple <sup>a</sup> of conscience as to their nearness in blood, though in truth the king and she were hardly cousins. These, and other subjects of chagrin, at length determined the king to quit Antioch, and to repair to Jerusalem, where the emperor Conrad was already arrived. But the queen, who was very well pleased with the fine country in which they were, and still better with the prince to whom it belonged, was not in such haste <sup>b</sup>. However Lewis took a proper opportunity, and, seizing one of the gates in the night, marched out with his forces ; and, having assembled those that lay in the neighbourhood, sent her before him to Jerusalem, where Baldwin the third, who then governed that kingdom, received her very respectfully. On the king's arrival several councils were held, in order to fix upon some expedition worthy of so puissant a force, and of monarchs of so distinguished rank, and in such high esteem for their <sup>b</sup> personal qualifications <sup>1</sup>.

He is determined, by the disgrace of raising the siege of Damascus, to return home.

THE siege of Damascus was at length resolved upon, as the reduction of that important place would be attended with great advantages to all the Christian princes in the east, it having proved long an equal curb on the king of Jerusalem, as well as the princes of Antioch and Tripoly. This city was held to be very strong, though without any fortifications, even according to the mode of these times ; but being surrounded on all sides with gardens, and those being well walled, and having a numerous garrison, it was expected, and the event justified their expectation, that it would make a very obstinate defence ; but the gardens being gradually forced, it must have fallen, if the oriental Christians had not most scandalously entered into intrigues with the infidels, from an apprehension that, when taken, it would have been given to the count of Flanders <sup>c</sup>. To prevent this, they altered the manner of the attack, suffered convoys of provisions to be surprised, and in the end brought the army into such distress, that the emperor and the king of France, detecting their perfidy, and despairing of success, raised the siege, and made the best dispositions they could for returning into their own dominions. The king, embarking at one of the ports of Syria, returned safely to Calabria, and taking Rome in his way, that he might confer with the pope, came at length, after this disastrous expedition, into his own dominions <sup>1</sup>. His brother, the count de Dreux, arrived there a little before him ; and had thrown out strong insinuations, that the losses sustained abroad, and the discredit reflected from thence on the armies of France, were chiefly owing to the king's incapacity ; by which he meant to raise his own reputation, and not without some view, as many have suspected, upon the crown. But the abbot Suger, who had governed as wisely and happily at home as the king had done indiscreetly and unfortunately abroad, rendered these intrigues abortive ; upon which the count de Dreux, on his brother's arrival, laboured all he could to render that great man suspected ; but the king found his territories in so good condition, and the general voice of the nation was so loud in behalf of the minister, that the king treated him with all the respect and kindness imaginable, and afforded him all the marks of esteem and confidence that his great merit deserved <sup>m</sup>, who had preserved peace and plenty in his absence, and presented him with a full treasury at his return.

A. D. 1149.

Takes a weak and fatal resolution to repudiate queen Eleanor, and restore Guienne.

IT had been happy for France if that excellent person had survived longer ; for so long as he lived, the king was prevailed upon to dissemble his discontents with regard to the queen, <sup>c</sup> and had even consented to a reconciliation. But after his decease, growing more and more dissatisfied with her conduct, he pretended to scruples of conscience in regard to the lawfulness of their marriage ; submitted the case to an assembly of his prelates ; and, in consequence of their sentiments, repudiated that princess, who gave all the assistance she could to the divorce, and restored to her the dominions which he had acquired by their marriage <sup>n</sup>. It has been surmised, and not without great probability, that, before things came to this extremity, she had entered into a correspondence with Henry duke of Normandy, count of Anjou and Maine, son to Geoffrey Plantagenet and the empress Maud, so that he was presumptive heir to the crown of England ; and her espousing him in six weeks after the divorce rendered this suspicion so much the more probable <sup>o</sup>. This marriage, which the wise abbot of St. Denis foresaw, mortified the king extremely, and procured him the surname of Le Jeune, as we before <sup>f</sup> observed. By this great alliance, Henry, to the duchy of Normandy and the estates of the house of Anjou, added the county of Poitou and the duchy of Guienne ; so that he was at least as powerful in France as the king himself. Lewis, to correct this false step, entered into a league with Stephen king of England, received the homage of his son Eustace count of Bologne, in quality of duke of Normandy, and drew over to his party Geoffrey the brother of Henry, who had once a project of running away with queen Eleanor himself <sup>p</sup>. In consequence of this league, count Eustace attacked Normandy, and made a considerable progress a there; which might have been fatal to duke Henry, if his abilities had not been superior to his fortune. At the age of twenty he was a great captain and a greater politician, and took so much pains to sooth and to flatter Lewis, that, contrary to all the rules of policy, he concluded a truce with him; which afforded Henry leisure to transport himself, and his mother the empress, into England, where they created Stephen a great deal of trouble; and count Eustace dying, a treaty was concluded between them, by which the crown was left to Stephen during his life; and, having no children, he consented that Henry should be declared his successor; the more willingly no doubt, if, what some writers say be true, that the empress assured him he was the fruit of their amours in the life-time of her husband <sup>1</sup>.

As soon as the truce expired, Lewis invaded Normandy, where he made some progress; but the death of king Stephen, and the accession of Henry to the throne of England, quickly induced the king to make peace. He certainly wanted not abilities to discern the danger he was in, not only from the great power, but from the great talents of Henry, who inherited all his grandfather's spirit, and was invested with much more authority; but, though he knew his danger, he had not sagacity enough to devise, and, it may be, wanted the firmness to apply, the proper remedies <sup>2</sup>. But how much soever he fell short of being great, was supplied in being a good prince. His subjects adored, and his nobility loved him, insomuch that, at their persuasion, he married Donna Constantia, daughter to Don Alonso, king of Castile; and soon after, from motives which have been explained in another place, made a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. James at Compostella, which gave him an opportunity of conferring with his father-in-law, and with Sancho, king of Navarre <sup>3</sup>. At his return he held a council at Soissons, where he engaged his nobility to swear a peace for ten years; that is, they precluded themselves, during this space, from deciding their quarrels by the sword, which was their common method <sup>4</sup>.

AMONGST these great lords the count of Flanders was the most considerable; who going, not long after, into the Holy Land, committed his son and his dominions to the care of Henry, king of England; which was a new mortification to Lewis, who found himself in a manner blocked up on every side by this too powerful neighbour, yet Henry omitted no arts to mitigate his jealousy and apprehensions <sup>5</sup>. His queen had sufficiently instructed him in the temper of Lewis; and he managed him with such address, that he had scarce any pretence given him on which to found a quarrel: for Henry was continually writing to him, and sending him presents; treated him with the highest marks of deference and esteem, and proposed a marriage between his son Henry and the princess Margaret, the king's daughter by his second marriage, tho' they were but infants <sup>6</sup>. But at length a rupture happened; for Henry, unsatisfied with the great dominions he already had, surmised that the county of Toulouse belonged of right to his wife, as being not given, but mortgaged only by a duke of Aquitaine to the ancestor of the then count: he offered therefore the sum that he supposed to be due, and that being refused, marched with a great army, composed of all nations, and blocked up Toulouse <sup>7</sup>. The place was not strong by situation, nor was it fortified: but the count, brave in his person, and having a numerous army, made a gallant defence. He had married Constance, the widow of Eustace, count of Bologne, and sister to king Lewis, who immediately armed, in support of his brother-in-law; and having left a competent force under the command of his brother the count de Dreux, on the frontiers of Normandy, marched with the rest directly to Toulouse, where, having forced one of the posts of the besiegers, he threw himself into the place with the flower of his troops. Henry, perceiving it would be very difficult, if not impracticable, to carry the town, sent a compliment to the king, importing, that he would not commit hostilities against any whom he had undertaken to protect, and thereupon raised the siege. This, however, did not put an end to the war, which continued two years longer, and then ended in a peace, on terms that were tolerably equal. Henry did homage to the king for his duchy of Normandy; his son Henry did the like for the counties of Anjou and Maine; and it was agreed, that his second son Richard, already contracted to the daughter of the count of Barcelona, should quit her, espouse one of the king's daughters, and have the duchy of Guienne <sup>8</sup>. In this peace the count of Toulouse was included, but without any discussion of the point upon which the war began; for peace was necessary to Lewis, and Henry was resolved to keep his old claim in reserve <sup>9</sup>.

THE same year died the queen Donna Constantia; and the nobility being very urgent with the king to marry again, as he had only two daughters by her, he accordingly espoused Ade-laide, the daughter of Thibaut, earl of Champagne, by which alliance he gained all the princes of her family <sup>10</sup>. At this juncture a schism in the church was very near plunging the most considerable powers of Europe into a war: the kings of France and England supported Alexander III.; the emperor Frederic maintained the cause of Victor IV. went so far as to arm on his behalf, and threatened France with an invasion. Lewis, provoked by his behaviour, levied troops likewise, and the king of England marched a powerful corps to the frontiers of Normandy, that they might be in readiness to join the French, if it was necessary; and, upon this occasion, Alexander III. had the satisfaction of seeing Lewis on one side, and Henry on the other, at his stirrups, on foot, while he rode slowly to a magnificent tent prepared for him in the French camp, and held afterwards a council at Tours with great splendour<sup>b</sup>. It was not long before new differences arose between the two monarchs, chiefly on account of Thomas à Becket, chancellor to king Henry, who, having raised him to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, found him less pliant than he expected, and therefore disgraced him. On this he retired into France, where he was received and treated with great respect, notwithstanding all the representations made by his master. From this discordance in sentiments, both kings fore-<sup>b</sup>saw that it would not be long before they came to an open rupture; and this at length happened, notwithstanding the empress Maud, so long as she lived, exerted her utmost endeavours to prevent it<sup>c</sup>. In the prosecution of this dispute, several places were taken on both sides; some vassals of the crown of France took up arms for king Henry, and, on the other hand, most of the lords of Poitou armed on behalf of Lewis<sup>d</sup>. At length, both parties, weary of seeing their countries destroyed to little purpose, and having other motives to wish for the return of quiet, amongst which was the birth of a son to Lewis, a treaty was set on foot, which, after a long negotiation, produced the peace of Montmirail, where Henry did homage in person for Normandy, his son Henry for the counties of Anjou and Maine, Richard for the duchy of Guienne, and prince Henry a second time for the county of Bretagne, which his brother Geoffrey was to inherit, in consequence of his marriage with the heiress of that country, and for which he was to do homage to him as presumptive heir of the duchy of Normandy, and he to Lewis, as Bretagne was a remote fief of the crown of France<sup>e</sup>. In this we have been so much the more particular, as it serves to explain the titles to these countries, and the tenures then in use; points of such utility in this period of history, that it cannot be understood without being versed in them.

A. D. 1168.

King Lewis drives over the seas and even the consort of Henry, who, never the less, prevails.

THE situation of affairs between these two princes was such, that, though they often made peace, they were never reconciled; and the intermarriages between their families, instead of contributing to their own and their subjects repose, served only to furnish fresh pretences for disturbing both. King Henry having caused his eldest son to be crowned in England, while his consort was in France, Lewis, to revenge the affront done to his daughter, invaded Normandy; but Henry, too wise to quarrel about a mere matter of form, promised the coronation should be performed over again, as it accordingly was<sup>f</sup>. On the return of the young king to his father in Normandy, Lewis desired that his son and daughter might come and spend some time at his court, which was granted; and there such notions were put into the young prince's head, as, after his return, produced great heart-burnings between him and his father. At length the young king, pretending that he thought his person in danger, fled privately out of England into France, and was received with open arms by Lewis, who was now grown as thorough a politician as Henry, and believed the time was now come, in which he might revenge himself for all past affronts<sup>g</sup>. He knew the pope was angry with the king of England; and that he was also odious to a great part of his subjects, on account of the assassination of archbishop Becket: he farther knew that the king was much feared by his neighbours, and that the disputes ran high in his family; so that he flattered himself that he should gain equal advantages by fraud and by force<sup>h</sup>. The young king Henry, who served him zealously, drew his two brothers, Richard and Geoffrey, into the confederacy against their father; and, which is almost incredible, embarked his mother queen Eleanor in the same scheme. At the same time the king of Scots was in motion, and rebels and malecontents started up in almost all parts of the king of England's dominions<sup>i</sup>. Henry, being surprised at this, offered fair terms; but finding this rejected, raised an army, and quickly restored his affairs at home and abroad. All this time he amused the king of France with negotiations, and at length consented to a peace, but it was upon his own terms; and though these were in appearance honourable enough for king Lewis, and very advantageous for the princes who had put themselves under his protection, yet the king of Scots, the earl of Leicester, and the earl of Chester, who had been made prisoners, being left at his mercy, shewed plainly that he was victor over this formidable league<sup>k</sup>.

Lewis and Henry are on better terms than in any part of their

BOTH kings were now thoroughly weary of war; Lewis was afraid of suffering by that good fortune which constantly attended his rival; and Henry had so much reason to fear his own family at home, that he had no stomach to quarrels abroad. Lewis, however, conceived in his own mind, that he had good grounds to be offended with the conduct of the mon-

<sup>a</sup> arch of England, on account of his daughter Alice, whom the king retained at his court, respectively without marrying her to his son Richard. In order to obtain satisfaction, he applied himself to the pope; and his legate having expostulated with Henry, that prince very roundly declared he would have caused the marriage to be celebrated, but that Lewis had promised to give the city of Bourges in dowry with his daughter, as he had likewise promised the French Vexin, when the princess Margaret espoused the young king Henry. As the facts were controverted by Lewis, the decision of their difference was left to the pope<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time all the antient treaties were renewed; and the two kings, to shew their cordial affection for each other, undertook to make a croisade together, the preparations for which were likewise settled, notwithstanding which neither of them went; Lewis being strongly dissuaded by his consort, and by the principal nobility; and Henry finding his affairs still so embarrassed, that his presence was more necessary than ever in his own dominions<sup>m</sup>. Some have attributed the making and the breaking this treaty to policy; but it is more probable that Lewis was very sincere, and made the first proposition of it to Henry, who could not but give his consent, having entered into an engagement with the pope to take the cross, whenever he thought it expedient, in order to expiate the murder of Thomas à Becket<sup>n</sup>; and we shall hereafter see, that, though this treaty was not executed by these princes, yet it was not altogether without its effect.

As the peace of the kingdom, as well as the continuance of the royal line, depended on the life of the young prince Philip, it is not at all strange that the king should be extremely alarmed at an accident which brought him to the very brink of the grave. He was but just able to ride, when his horse ran away with him in the wood of Compeigne, in which he continued all night, and returned in the morning, so extremely frightened, that he fell into a grievous fit of sickness<sup>o</sup>. This induced the king his father, according to the mode of those times, to resolve on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas, that is, the tomb of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury. He was received there with great pomp by king Henry, made his offering, and returned back in the space of a week; but whether the fatigue of the journey, or the agitation of his mind was the cause, so it fell out, that he was struck with an apoplexy at his return; and tho' he recovered from this, by the help of his physicians, yet he continued paralytic on the right side<sup>p</sup>. This induced him to hasten the coronation of his son, which was performed with great solemnity by the cardinal archbishop of Rheims, the queen's brother, on the first of November. On this occasion, the young king Henry of England assisted, as duke of Normandy; and Philip, count of Flanders, carried the sword of state. At this time also the right of the archbishop of Rheims to perform the ceremony of the coronation was confirmed<sup>q</sup>. Soon after the marriage of the young king Philip, with the niece of the count of Flanders, who now governed all, was settled<sup>r</sup>; and the king, having languished about a year under this grievous malady, breathed his last on the 18th of September, in the sixtieth year of his age, and in the forty-fourth of his reign<sup>s</sup>, being esteemed a pious and chaste prince; but as the English, as well as the French, historians observe, less a politician than was requisite for the conjuncture in which he lived<sup>t</sup> (F).

(F) The wisdom of his ministers preserved him, in his youth, from the inconveniences that might have otherwise resulted from a temper so pliant and so mutable as that of Lewis VII. In his advanced years experience taught him to govern with more steadiness; so that from being the dupe, he became the formidable rival of Henry II. of England, which is in itself a great character, since Henry was one of the ablest princes of this age (6). He shewed himself, in the beginning of his reign, very jealous of his authority; it may be, tho' no historian has suggested it, he resented the insult offered him by the cabal against his coronation in his father's life-time; and, contrary to the custom of his predecessors, he did not take the precaution of being crowned again (7). His divorce from his first wife Eleanor, the heiress of Guienne, might be impolitic; but his behaviour towards her was honourable and equitable, beyond that of most of the princes of his time. That princess died on the last day of March 1204, more than sixty-seven years after her marriage with Lewis (8). He had by her two daughters, Mary and Alice, the former married to Henry, count of Champagne, and the latter to Thibaut count of Blais, his brother. The second consort of Lewis was Constantia, daughter of Alonso king of Castile, by whom he had also two daughters; Margaret, who espoused Henry the younger, king of England, and duke of Normandy, by whom she had no children, and, after his demise, Bela the third, king of Hungary. Becoming a widow the second time, she resolved, according to the devotion of those times, to spend the remainder of her days in the Holy Land, and died at Acon in 1197 (9). Her sister Alice died unmarried, in a short time after their mother (1). Lewis married, a third time, Adela the fifth daughter of Thibaut, count of Champagne, a princess of great beauty, prudence, and spirit, by whom he had his successor Philip II. and two daughters :

Philip Augustus ascend: the throne, and governs from the beginning with great prudence.

PHILIP, surnamed the Gift of God, from the time of his birth, the Magnanimous, and the Conqueror, during his life-time, and, as if these had fallen short of his merit, stiled Augustus after his decease, was, in truth, one of the most extraordinary princes that ever sat upon this or any other throne, as giving very early marks of a great genius, and yet exceeding in the flower what he had promised in the first buddings of genius<sup>u</sup>. He assumed the government from the time the crown was placed upon his head, though but in his fifteenth year: and though the count of Flanders is, by some writers, stiled regent of the kingdom, yet that was but courtesy; for notwithstanding the king took his advice, and probably did nothing without it, yet all was executed, not only by his authority, but by himself<sup>w</sup>. He was jealous that his youth, and want of experience, might expose him to contempt; and, therefore, the first instance he gave of his authority was, in ordering jesters, jugglers, and buffoons, to quit his court, and he took care to be obeyed<sup>x</sup>. He found the people complain loudly of the Jews, who had got into possession of one-third part of the lands in his dominions; and as, on the one hand, he found they had exercised the most oppressive usury, and, on the other, by choosing proper patrons, were powerfully supported by the nobility, he obliged them to quit his territories, allowing them to carry away their personal estates. This chagrined the great lords, but it pleased the people, and the king was obeyed<sup>y</sup>. From this, which was a very difficult and disagreeable undertaking, he proceeded to another that was still more so. The mercenary soldiers, who had served his father and the king of England, being disbanded, and without means of maintaining themselves, assembled together in great bodies, and committed most enormous outrages. They were distinguished by the several names of Cottreaux, Brabançons, Routiers, and Taverdins, nesting themselves in different parts of the kingdom, and laying the country under contribution where-ever they were. The king directed the great towns to make head against them, assisted them with his own troops, and in one action cut off nine thousand; so that by degrees he either extirpated or expelled them all<sup>z</sup>. He then directed the inhabitants of every great town, that held immediately of him, to surround it with walls, and to pave the streets; which, as it was expensive and troublesome, was not at all relished; but, however, the king making a circuit in person for that purpose, it was performed. Some of the nobility, taking the advantage of his father's infirmities, had committed excesses, more especially against the clergy, which the king redressed in person, and by force of arms; holding his grandfather's maxim, that the royal authority was to be extended by a zeal for justice, and by supporting the weak against the strong. As these great things required time to accomplish, so, as he began them early, he, until they were complete, made them the constant objects of his attention.

Factions, cabals, and insurrections, in the beginning of his reign, suppressed and subdued.

THE queen mother, the cardinal of Champagne, and the rest of the princes of her house and faction, laboured all they could, before and after the death of king Lewis, to ruin the credit of Philip, count of Flanders, with the young king, and more especially to prevent his completing his marriage with his niece Isabel, but without effect. That count was the king's godfather, from whom he received his name, and in those times this was considered as a sort of kindred; besides, he had adopted the young lady as his daughter, and bestowed upon her in dowry the county of Artois, and all the country along the river Lys<sup>a</sup>. When the queen, and those of her party, found this, they quitted the court, and, having the young king of England with them, prevailed upon him to go over to his father to demand his protection. In the mean time, the king caused himself and his queen to be crowned at the abbey of St. Denis, by the archbishop of Sens, which piqued the cardinal archbishop of Rheims extremely<sup>b</sup>. Henry king of England came over with his son into Normandy, extremely well pleased with daughters: Alice, who created so much dissension between the realms of France and England, and who, after having been for many years contracted to king Richard, married William count of Ponthieu; she deceased in 1195: the second daughter, Agnes, at the close of her father's reign, was contracted to Alexius Comnenus, son to the Greek emperor Manuel, and was sent to Constantinople, when she was scarce ten years of age. The marriage was solemnized the year following with great magnificence. Three years after, her husband being murdered by Andronicus I. who succeeded him, he also married her, but she had no issue by him; and he being deposed and murdered in 1185, she, instead of returning to France, espoused Theodore Bramas, lord of Adrianople (2). Lewis was interred at Barbeau on the Seine, in a monastery of his own foundation, where his widow, queen Adela, caused a magnificent tomb to be erected to his memory. Charles IX. caused this tomb to be opened, and found his body intire; he had a gold cross hanging at his neck, and three or four rings upon his fingers. Charles made a present of the cross, and wore the rings himself, in honour of his predecessor (3). As for his relict queen Adela, after governing the kingdom as regent, during her son's expedition into the Levant, she died at Paris, June 4th, 1206, being upwards of threescore, and was buried at the abbey of Pontigny (4).

- a this opportunity of interfering in the affairs of the king's family ; but Philip, and the count of Flanders, marching directly towards him with a numerous army, Henry, who was unwilling to come to extremities, demanded a conference, which did great honour to the abilities of the young king ; for as, on the one hand, he remained firm in the measures he had taken, notwithstanding all the address of this wise and great prince, so, on the other, he would not listen to the arguments used by the earl of Flanders, to reject absolutely all propositions of peace. He professed great duty and respect for his mother, offered to pass by all that happened, with respect to the lords of her faction, and to receive them again into his favour ; which they thought fit to accept<sup>c</sup>. It was not long before the count of Flanders began to take this in a wrong light, and to form intrigues in his turn, into which, amongst the first that entered,
- b were the cardinal of Champagne and one of the queen dowager's brothers ; the duke of Burgundy also, tho' a prince of the blood, embraced the same party, and the avowed motive to their confederacy was the young monarch's popularity<sup>d</sup>. Philip, not caring to trust the nobility that still remained about him, raised an army with his own money, took one of the principal fortresses of the duke of Burgundy, and in it his son, on which the duke demanded pardon, and the rest, following his example, submitted<sup>e</sup>.

- THE death of the countess of Flanders caused new disturbances. She was a princess of the royal blood, and the heiress of the count of Vermandois. The king, as she died without issue, was for annexing her estates to the crown ; but the count pretended, that the late king had made him a grant of this succession, which Philip had confirmed : the king owned this, but affirmed the grant to be only for the countess's life. However, both parties took the field ; the emperor threatened to take part with the earl of Flanders, who appeared to be highly irritated, and laboured to engage the nobility to make it a common cause, pretending the king had nothing else in view but to unite one fief with another<sup>f</sup>. Philip pressed him so vigorously, and his friends assisted him so faintly, that the count first demanded a truce, and at length at was glad to make peace, the king leaving him the towns of Perron and St. Quintin for his life, and annexing the rest of the county of Vermandois to the crown. The young king Henry of England, dying in France, expressed, in his last moments, great regret for the continual disturbance he had given his father, which affected Henry so much, that he appeared inconsolable for his death<sup>g</sup>. The same year he had a conference with king Philip,
- c who insisted upon the restitution of the town of Gisors and the Vexin, which had been given in dowry to his sister Margaret, on her marriage with the young king. In order to gain the affection of Philip, and prevent this restitution, the king of England did homage to him for all the lands he held in France, and, at the same time, promised, that in case the like dowry was given to the princess Alice, his son Richard, who was now become his heir apparent, should espouse her without any farther delay ; to which Philip assented, and the two kings parted, in all appearance well satisfied<sup>h</sup>.

- THIS harmony did not last long. Henry had it not at all in his intention that his son Richard should marry Alice, for whom he was thought to have a strong passion himself, to which the French writers ascribe the jealousy of queen Eleanor, and the king's keeping her as he did a prisoner for twelve years before his death. Geoffrey, duke of Bretagne, Henry's second son, and by much the best of them all, quarrelled with his father, because he would not add the country of Maine to his dominions, and went thereupon, in great discontent, to Paris, where, being thrown from his horse at a tournament, he died of the bruises he received ; king Philip retaining under his protection his widow, his daughter Eleanor, and his posthumous son Arthur, with which Henry was much offended<sup>i</sup>. The count of Flanders and the emperor gave the king some disturbance, but his firmness and good fortune soon extricated him out of these, as it had done out of former difficulties ; but on the side of the king of England he was able to procure no satisfaction. At length, therefore, he declared war ; and, having taken some places of less consequence, besieged Chateauroux, in which were the two princes of England, Richard and John ; but they made so good a defence, that Henry had time to come to their relief ; upon which Philip raised the siege, and marched to give him battle<sup>k</sup>. At this juncture arrived a legate from the pope, to intercede with the two kings, and to engage them to lay aside their private quarrels, and take the cross in favour of the Christians, from whom the famous Saladine had taken Jerusalem. Henry having solemnly promised, that, at their return from this expedition, all things should be adjusted to the satisfaction of Philip, the two kings, and, moved by their example, the most of the great lords in both armies, took the cross, which, of his own free will, prince Richard had taken before<sup>l</sup>.

A new quarrel between the kings, in which Richard, count of Poitou, sides with Philip against his father.

KING Philip, in order to defray the expences of such a war, laid heavy taxes upon the clergy, at which they murmured exceedingly, but which the king, nevertheless, caused to be raised, and to which in those days they gave the name of the tax of Saladine. But while the king was thus employed, prince Richard, when it was least expected, made a furious irruption into the territories of Raymond, count of Thoulouse, in pursuance of the old quarrel, which, as we observed, Henry kept open, on purpose to afford colour for such incursions. The monarch of France was no sooner informed of this, than he made a diversion in favour of count Raymond, by invading the territories which Henry possessed in France<sup>m</sup>. The monarch, with an alacrity little suitable to his years, advanced with an army to their relief; but his success was not equal to his spirit, and therefore demanded a conference, at which he desired, that, instead of Richard, the princess Alice might espouse his son John, which was rejected, there being a secret understanding between Philip and the prince of England<sup>n</sup>. The pope's legate interposed upon this, and went so far as to threaten Philip with an excommunication; but the king told him, that he held his crown from God, and not from the pope, who had no right to prescribe how he should behave to his vassal; insinuating at the same time, that the legate's zeal was prompted by king Henry's gold. As for Richard, he was so much incensed, that he was very near killing the legate upon the spot, and, being hindered, shewed his resentment by doing homage to king Philip, and retiring to the French camp; so that these broils, which had been so lately appeased, were now more inflamed than ever<sup>o</sup>.

Peace once more restored, which is immediately followed by king Henry's death.

THE king, with prince Richard, as soon as they were able to assemble troops sufficient, attacked the city of Mons, which, though it was the strongest place in all Henry's French territories, was taken in the space of three days, by an accident; for the governor having given directions for burning the suburbs, this was performed in such a hurry, that the flame caught the town. King Henry, who was there in person, escaped with difficulty, being warmly pursued by Philip and Richard. He retired to Chinon, where he determined to defend himself to the last extremity; but, before things were brought to this pass, the count of Flanders, and other great lords, represented to king Philip, that they could not, with a safe conscience, serve him against a monarch who had taken the cross, and thereby impede the recovery of Jerusalem, which constrained him once more to admit of a conference<sup>p</sup>. The two kings discoursing together on horseback, were parted by a dreadful clap of thunder, which fell between them. However, they came together again, and, after three hours conversation, the terms of the peace were settled; the places taken from the king of England were to be restored, king Philip was to have a large sum in ready money, Richard was to be crowned as his brother Henry had been, and then to espouse the princess Alice; but this solemnity was to be deferred till their return from the Holy Land, and, in the mean time, the princess was to be put into such hands as Philip should approve. When all was adjusted, Henry observed to Philip, that princes had a common interest against traitors; and insisted so passionately to see the association, by which he had been invited to invade his dominions, that at length he did<sup>q</sup>. But as soon as Henry saw his favourite son John's name at the head of it, he flew into a transport of passion, which affected him in such a manner, that he was carried back to Chinon, and died there speedily, rather of discontent than disease<sup>r</sup>. By this means Philip lost a dangerous and implacable enemy; and his friend Richard, whom he had always supported against his father, acquired that crown he had so eagerly pursued, tho', in some measure, at the expence of his reputation, the world in general condemning his conduct.

Philip and the young king of England prepare to go to the Holy Land against the infidels.

THE two kings seemed to be equally satisfied and at ease. Philip had considerable claims on Richard, on account of the succours furnished to him in his father's time; but, upon his declaring frankly that it would be very inconvenient for him to comply with them at that juncture, Philip very generously passed it by. They then concluded an alliance as kings, and swore perpetual fidelity as friends, without considering that their manners were too much alike for any oaths to restrain, or leagues to bind them. They were in their persons tall, well made, and robust men; active, brave, magnificent, free in their discourse, and full of a sprightly kind of wit, that however bordered upon levity: their vices also were much the same, for they were ambitious in a supreme degree, hasty in their tempers, addicted to women, avaricious, or rather greedy of money, that they might squander; and, in fine, immoderately fond of praise, and ready to run any hazard to acquire it. The expedition to the Holy Land appeared to these princes an enterprize that was to cover them with immortal glory; and having once entertained this notion, they could neither of them be brought to consider it in another light<sup>s</sup>. Some of the wisest men in his council laboured to undeceive Philip, and to dissuade him from going in person; but his mother, and the cardinal of

- a Rheims, out of an ambitious desire of governing in his absence, frustrated their intention. He took, however, the precaution of limiting their authority by an instrument, to which he gave the name and form of a Testament, and appointed overseers to look to its execution, which they did not expect. Before his departure he received the homage of the queen dowager of England for the duchy of Guienne, which she held in her own right; and, to defray the expences of this prodigious armament, exposed to sale the great charge of his household, the domain of the crown, and whatever else would fetch money. All things being adjusted, the two kings marched with their armies as far as Lyons; and there Philip took the route of the Alps, in order to embark at Genoa; and Richard proceeded to the coast, in order to meet his fleet, which was appointed to rendezvous at Marseilles, under a solemn engagement to meet again in Sicily, and to proceed from thence, in conjunction, to the coast of Syria <sup>1</sup>.

- TANCRED was at this time in possession of that island, with the regal title; but he was held to be an intruder in prejudice to Constance, the wife of the emperor Henry, with whom Philip was in close alliance: on the other hand, he held the queen dowager Joan close prisoner, who was king Richard's sister, and consequently had no great reason to be fond of such guests. Philip arrived first, and was tolerably well treated, and behaved civilly on his side. When Richard arrived, he demanded that his sister should be presently sent him, and full satisfaction for the large legacies left to his father by the deceased king of Sicily, which Tancred laboured to decline. Upon this Richard attacked the city of Messina, and was very near coming to a rupture with king Philip, who, with part of his forces, was in the city when it was attacked. He consented, however, to admit of his mediation, and, by the decree of the French king, Tancred was to be left in peaceable possession, and to pay king Richard forty thousand ounces of gold in full satisfaction for his claims <sup>2</sup>. Tancred, who had flattered himself with the French king's protection, was so much vexed with the disappointment, that he made his court to king Richard, and produced to him a letter, whether forged or genuine is not very clear, in which Philip encouraged him to attack the English, and particularly their king, with a promise to assist him with all his forces. This produced, as he expected, a very high quarrel between these princes; Richard charged Philip with having attempted against his life, and Philip accused Richard of insisting upon a forged letter, and publishing many falsehoods <sup>3</sup>.
- d But, after all, their interests obliged them to be friends; and they therefore thought it best to discuss the real dispute between them, which was the marriage of the princess Alice, a point which Richard without ceremony rejected for reasons before-mentioned, and because his mother was treating of another marriage for him in Navarre; but very honourably offered to restore the places that had been so long detained for her dowry. The treaty being, without much difficulty, adjusted, a new misunderstanding happened; for Philip insisted that Richard, with his forces, should depart with him, which the king of England declared to be impossible, because he had a mind to wait for his young wife, whom his mother had promised to bring thither. Philip, afraid that he should return into France, and attack his dominions in his absence, laboured all he could to induce the French lords that followed Richard to proceed with him; and, having engaged the greatest part of them, sailed for the coast of Syria, and left the king of England in Sicily <sup>4</sup>. These transactions are related with many more circumstances, and not a few variations, according to the disposition of the authors who committed them to writing. The nature of our plan requires we should be succinct; and therefore we have represented these facts with as much clearness and impartiality as was in our power, and with the least interruption that might be to the thread of our narration.
- e AT the time of his arrival, Philip found the affairs of the Christians in a very untoward situation. They were engaged in the siege of Acon, or Ptolemais, having lain before it more than a year, which in reality was no great wonder, considering that, for the best part of the time, the army without was scarce equal to the garrison within. As if these difficulties had not been enough, the Christians were upon bad terms with each other, and this on account of a divided title to the kingdom of Jerusalem, which city was in the hands of the infidels. Guy de Lusignan had been acknowledged king in right of his wife, who was the eldest sister of the last monarch: but this princess being dead, without leaving any issue, the marquis of Montferrat claimed the crown in right of the youngest sister, who was his consort; whereas Guy insisted, that, having once been invested with the regal dignity, he was king for life <sup>5</sup>. When king Richard landed, after conquering the island of Cyprus by the way, he augmented the confusion, for he took part with Guy de Lusignan, who was his subject; and perhaps it was chiefly for this reason that Philip took part with the marquis of Montferrat. With much difficulty things were so far compromised, as to suspend all proceedings till the place was taken,

which being vigorously attacked, was quickly yielded by capitulation. As soon as Acon was a in the hands of the Christians, Philip took a resolution of returning into his own dominions, because the climate was prejudicial to his health; and, which perhaps weighed with him more, that he might not remain in the same country with Richard, who, if the French historians are to be believed, was continually raising new quarrels, and always in the wrong; and, if we listen to other authors, these practices ought not to be ascribed to Richard, but to Philip<sup>z</sup>. It is very probable they might be both in the wrong, but it is very certain they could never agree, and therefore Philip's resolution of leaving the army might not be so injurious to the common cause as it is generally represented. At parting he left a considerable body of French troops under Eudes of Burgundy, with orders to obey Richard, to whom also he promised, A. D. 1191. with a solemn oath, not to attack his dominions, or to dispossess any of his vassals. But how b sincerely he acted in this matter may appear from hence; that, landing in the kingdom of Naples, he took Rome in his way home, and earnestly solicited pope Celestin III. to absolve him from the oath which he had taken to Richard, but without effect<sup>a</sup>. He landed in France about Christmas, and was received with great joy by his subjects, tho' the manner in which he had left the Holy Land did not raise his reputation with other princes, who apprehended his taking advantage of Richard's absence.

Philip espouses Ingerburge, a Danish princess, in hopes of ally- ing them against Eng- land. It appeared soon after his return, that he had an implacable aversion, and, at the same time, a deep dread of the English monarch. The marquis of Montferrat had been slain in the midst of the city of Tyre, by some of the Assassins; a bold and barbarous nation, from whose prac- tices this word has been adopted into most languages. Philip no sooner heard of this, than, c remembering that Richard was the enemy of the marquis, he conjectured that he had applied to the Old Man of the Mountain, so the prince of those wicked men was stiled, and had pro- cured from him these instruments of his vengeance; from whence he deduced this consequence, that, being no less hated by Richard, he might be in as much danger. Upon this, by the advice of his council, he formed a particular corps of guards, armed with iron maces, whom he had about his person night and day, and who suffered no stranger to approach him<sup>b</sup>. He likewise dispatched ambassadors, with rich presents, to pacify the prince of the Assassins; but, when they came to his court, the Old Man of the Mountain told them plainly, that he had no resentment against their master; that he had never been solicited by the king of England to his prejudice; and that he had caused the marquis of Montferrat to be killed, because he looked d upon him as his enemy, and without having any correspondence with Richard<sup>c</sup>. Philip in the mean time had his head full of intrigues, entered into a close alliance with John, the brother, but the mortal enemy of king Richard; and his own queen Isabella being dead in his absence, he resolved to marry Ingerburge, the daughter of Waldemar, and the sister of Canut king of Denmark, without any other portion than the transferring to him the whole claim of the Danes upon England, and affording him the assistance of a fleet; but the court of Denmark declining this proposition, he was content to take this princess with the small fortune that they offered; yet, before her arrival, the marriage was not very acceptable to the French<sup>d</sup>, tho' her merit procured her afterwards the esteem of the whole nation.

Philip enters into an alli- ance with John against his brother king Richard. It seems that Richard had intelligence of these proceedings in Syria; and on account of e them, as well as because of a grievous fit of sickness, he determined to return; but in his passage home he was shipwrecked on the coast of Dalmatia, and endeavouring to pass in disguise through the country of Leopold, duke of Austria, whom he had highly offended at the siege of Acon, he was discovered and taken prisoner. After much ill usage, the duke sold him to the emperor, Henry VI. who was of a harsh disposition, necessitous, and avaricious. He gave notice of this as an acceptable piece of news to king Philip, who offered him a large sum of money for his prisoner, which he refused<sup>e</sup>. The king and prince John now entered into a new bargain, by which the latter was to deliver up several places, and to leave the king at liberty to despoil Richard of what he thought proper in Normandy, while himself used his utmost endeavours to get possession of the crown of England. And in order to give these dis- f honourable measures some kind of colour, Philip sent to denounce war against Richard in his prison, and then assembled an army to invade his territories. The nobility of France obeyed him very unwillingly; they put him in mind of his oath, of the scandal of attacking a prince who was still under the cross, and the inhumanity of making war upon one who was in no condition to resist him. Philip pretended that he had no intention to spoil Richard of his dominions, or to take any thing but what of right belonged to himself, insisting chiefly on the treaty that had been made between them in Sicily, in which Richard had stipulated to deliver up the town of Gisors and the Vexin: he added, that he was bound to deliver up his sister,

- a who was kept prisoner in the citadel of Rouen<sup>f</sup>. He quickly regained the places which he claimed, and afterwards made himself master of Evreux, which he gave to prince John, the castle excepted, into which he put a strong garrison. He also besieged Rouen without effect. There is no doubt that this usage must have irritated Richard, who, notwithstanding, found himself obliged to dissemble; for having discovered that the emperor was inclined to sell him to Philip, or at least to take money to keep him in prison, he directed William, bishop of Ely, his chancellor, to pass over into France, and apply himself to king Philip to desist from these intrigues, and to allow him to make the best terms for himself he could; to which, out of A. D. 1192. mere shame, and to avoid the reproaches of his nobility, the king consented, and the old queen dowager, with infinite difficulty, procured him the best part of his ransom; but we may judge of the true disposition of Philip by the message he sent to prince John, when he heard that king Richard was at length released, "Take care of yourself, for the devil is unchained;" language unworthy of so great a man, much more of so great a king<sup>g</sup>!

- TREATIES made by force, or with no just intention, seldom subsist long. Richard had prevailed upon the emperor, and the most considerable princes in Germany, to threaten Philip with an invasion, if he did not surrender all the places he had taken. Upon which the king, considering this as a declaration of war, invaded Normandy, and besieged Vernueil; and, as soon as he had the news, Richard passed with an army, and a fleet of upwards of a hundred sail, from England, and debarked at Barfleur, from whence he marched with great rapidity to give Philip battle<sup>h</sup>. His brother John, who saw himself now at his mercy, resolved, if he could, to recover his favour, and if possible his confidence. The method he took was singular, as well as perfidious. He invited the French officers at Evreux to an entertainment, and, when they had drank plentifully, caused them to be cut to pieces, to the number of three hundred, and placed their heads upon stakes along the wall; which so far had its effect, as it convinced the king his brother that a reconciliation would never be in his power. Philip no sooner received this news, than, leaving his camp in the night with a choice body of troops, he marched with such expedition, that he easily surprised Evreux, put all the English he found to the sword, with most of the inhabitants, and burnt the place to the ground<sup>i</sup>. His revenge cost him very dear: his army, not being in the secret of the expedition, finding the king gone, and having intelligence that Richard was very near, abandoned their camp and their baggage, and dispersed to their respective homes. There followed upon this a negotiation, which came to nothing, because Philip insisted upon an indemnity for those who had taken arms against Richard, to which he would not consent<sup>k</sup>. Philip being again in the field, the English monarch laboured all that was in his power to bring him to a battle: and, at length, finding him in the neighbourhood of Vendosme, encamped so near that it could not well be avoided. Philip made use of an artifice, which failed him: he sent a message to Richard, that, if he remained on the same ground, he would give him battle; to which the king of England returned for answer, that he would find him ready, and that if he failed he would come the next day and attack him. The design of the king of France was to retire, which Richard penetrated, and began to advance as soon as the messenger returned, attacked and routed the army on their march, and took the French chancery which then attended the king; so that, by this unlucky accident, all the titles of the crown fell into the possession of Richard, to the irreparable loss of the French nation<sup>l</sup>. Philip, notwithstanding, made an irruption, not long after, into Normandy, with success; and though the pope's legate made great efforts to bring about a treaty, yet they produced only a truce, which lasted but a little time, which was owing to a chimerical project of the emperor, who, with the assistance of king Richard, proposed to render the realm of France a fief of the empire<sup>m</sup>. Upon this Richard recommenced hostilities, which were now carried on with unusual fury on both sides. In a little time, however, both kings perceived that wasting their country, and destroying their people, must necessarily turn to their mutual loss, without rendering either of them great; and therefore, in the month of November, they concluded a truce, and the next year a decisive peace, upon equal terms; by which the princess Alice recovered her liberty, and soon after espoused the count of Ponthieu, after being the source of so much discord and bloodshed between the two nations<sup>n</sup>.

THE peace of Louviers, as it was called, from the place where it was made, seemed to promise a lasting tranquillity to the dominions of the two kings; notwithstanding which it was broke in six months. Philip pretended to take offence at king Richard's having dispossessed one of his vassals, and raised his fortrefs; and, without making any application for redress, renewed the war by besieging Aumale. Richard was very soon in the field, and hostilities were carried on for some time with a variety of success. The English monarch, whom a experience had taught caution, and his frequent mistakes address, managed his affairs at this time in a way very different from what he had hitherto done. He detached the count of Tou- louse from the party of king Philip, by giving him his sister Joan in marriage, the widow of William king of Sicily; he brought over the Bretons to his interest, by insinuating to the young duke Arthur, or rather to his ministers, that he might render him his successor; and he engaged Baldwin earl of Flanders in his alliance, by suggesting that it was the only way to recover the rich country of Artois, which, in virtue of his first marriage, Philip had re-annexed to the crown. By these treaties, and by receiving all who were aggrieved, or thought themselves aggrieved, by Philip, he caused him to be attacked on every side, and brought b him into very great difficulties. Philip, however, brought himself into greater; for, giving a loose to his resentment, and relying upon that good fortune which hitherto had attended him in his exploits, he exposed himself like a young man, without any consideration of the numbers he attacked, or was attacked by; which, tho' not fatal to himself, proved exceedingly so to the best of his troops, and to the nobility most attached to his person. Hearing that Arras was besieged by the count of Flanders, he turned his whole forces on that side, and marched against him with a very numerous army. The count, knowing his inferiority, raised the siege, and retired: the king, hurried by his passions, followed him till he found himself so entangled in a country full of marshes, dykes, and inclosures, that he was unable to advance, or to procure provisions for his army. In these circumstances he was constrained to c treat with the count, and, by fair promises, procured his leave to retire. Upon this Bald- win became a mediator between the two kings, and laboured assiduously to make peace. His good intention was not followed by the success that he expected; and all that it produced was a truce for a year, when the war broke out again with greater fury than ever, till at length, A. D. 1199. pope Innocent the third interposing, the two kings consented to a truce for five years. It was on the point of being broken almost as soon as it was made, if it had not been prevented by the activity and address of the cardinal legate, who managed several conferences between the two kings, and at last brought them to relish a plan for a solid peace; but, before it could be concluded, Richard was unfortunately slain before an inconsiderable castle, which he besieged, in hopes of taking from one of his vassals a great mass of gold, which he had found hid in d the earth.

King Philip compelled to return to queen Ingerberge, and the death of his mistress.

THE death of king Richard was one of the most fortunate events that could have fallen out for king Philip; but, before we enter into any detail of the events that followed it, it may be requisite to give a succinct account of the troubles that happened in France from the king's second marriage. We have shewn the motives upon which it was concluded; and tho' In- gerberge was a princess of great beauty and merit, yet the king was so disgusted the first night of their marriage, that he separated from her immediately, and would have sent her home again; but, as she appeared very averse, he contented himself with placing her in a monastery, where she had a handsome allowance, and where her modesty, piety, and patience, gained her universal esteem. This, however, did not hinder some of the bishops of France from gratifying the king, on the old pretence of alliance in blood, made out from a pedigree not over c well founded, with a divorce; in virtue of which he thought himself at liberty to espouse, three years after the marriage of this princess, Agnes de Merania, daughter to the duke of Dalmatia; but, upon the complaint of the king of Denmark to pope Celestin, he caused an inquiry to be made into this matter, and declared the second marriage null. Philip solicited pope Innocent for a reversion of his sentence, which was granted; yet it served only to create delay; and at length the cardinal legate intimated the pope's sentence, "that he was to put away Agnes, and take back his queen." The king not complying, the pope proceeded to an interdict, which subsisted about seven months; at which Philip was so provoked, that he seized the temporalities of the bishops, imprisoned the canons of cathedral churches, laid impositions on the inferior clergy, and at length taxed his lay subjects in a most oppressive man- f ner; all which it was in his power to do, because, contrary to the custom of his predecessors, he kept up a standing army of mercenary troops. All this having no effect, he grew tired of living in such a state of violence, and, applying to the pope, promised intire submission, in case he would suffer the divorce and the second marriage to be once more reviewed. This was accepted, the interdict removed, and a council appointed at Soissons to examine every thing afresh. Thither Philip repaired, and finding, in spite of all his authority and address, that a decree would be pronounced against him, he sent the legate word, that he had settled the affair himself; and then leaving Soissons, having first taken Ingerberge out of her convent

there,

a there, carried her behind him on horseback to Paris, where he owned her publicly for his queen; for grief of which Agnes soon after died<sup>u</sup>. But the son and daughter he had by her were legitimated by the pope; which an historian of that time says was but ill received in France, where they were by no means satisfied with the pontif's intermeddling in their affairs in such a manner, and more especially by pretending to regulate the succession<sup>w</sup>.

ON the death of his brother, John mounted the throne of England, and took possession likewise of his French dominions, in prejudice to his nephew Arthur, who at the beginning, however, claimed only Anjou, Maine, and Touraine. The old queen dowager Eleanor was still living, and, by doing homage for Guienne, prevented that country from becoming the seat of war. She sided with her son against her grandson, out of pique to his mother Constance, who was, like herself, a princess of a very high spirit<sup>x</sup>. Philip, under colour of protecting Arthur, invaded Normandy, which John came in person to defend; however, from the fickleness of his nature, he grew desirous of making peace at any rate; and Philip no sooner perceived this, than he set accommodation at too high a price even for John to purchase, notwithstanding the count of Flanders, who charged him with breaking his word, had deserted him, and taken part with the king of England. At length the old queen dowager devised an expedient, which proved satisfactory to Philip<sup>y</sup>. She proposed, that his son and heir apparent Lewis should espouse Blanch, the daughter of Alonso king of Castile, and the niece of king John; who, in case he died without heirs, was to entail the succession to his estates in France on the issue of that marriage, and in the mean time was to make a cession of the county of Evreux in Normandy, with the Vexin and other territories, the rights of which had been long contested, to the king. These terms once accepted, the old queen went into Spain to fetch A. D. 1200. the princess, who was to be the seal of this treaty; and the marriage being celebrated in Normandy, Arthur, whose cause was in some measure abandoned, did homage to his uncle for the duchy of Bretagne: and thus for the present, not without a great mixture of injustice, tranquillity was restored<sup>z</sup>.

KING John, who was a very voluptuous prince, had repudiated Havise, the daughter of the earl of Gloucester; and having seen Isabel d'Angoulesme, who was contracted, if not married, to Hugues le Brun, count of March, caused her to be carried away from his house, and, by the consent of her father, married her. As this lady was nearly related to king Philip, he carried her to Paris, where they were treated with the utmost magnificence, and dismissed with all possible demonstrations of the most cordial affection<sup>a</sup>. This situation of things very suddenly changed; the count of March, resenting the injury done him, and drawing many of the nobility to whom he was allied in blood to his party, began some troubles; which John, with great severity, suppressed. Complaints were made upon this to king Philip, who wrote in strong terms to the king of England; who promised to render justice more readily than he performed it<sup>b</sup>. From these small sparks a great flame ensued. Philip, who had mighty things in view, encouraged the young prince Arthur to set himself at the head of the malecontents, conferred upon him the order of knighthood, and furnished him with a large sum of money to raise forces. The first exploit this young prince attempted with his half-formed army, was the siege of Mirebeau, where his grandmother the old queen dowager resided. King John, already landed in Normandy, marched with great forces to her relief, routed those of his nephew, and took him prisoner<sup>c</sup>. This success, which might have been highly advantageous to his affairs, proved his ruin; for having first transferred the poor young prince to Falaise, and from thence to the castle of Rouen, when he found it utterly impossible to detach him from the French interest, either murdered him, as some historians say, with his own hand, or caused him to be murdered, as almost all writers agree. This cruel act rendered him justly odious to all his subjects in France; and his mother applying herself for justice to Philip, who summoned him to appear and answer to this charge before the court of peers at Paris; and, upon his refusal or delay, declared him, according to the ordinary course of justice, convicted of felony, and all the lands he held as fiefs from the crown of France confiscated<sup>d</sup>. King John was at this time in a most deplorable situation; the old queen his mother lately dead, most of his nobility in arms against him, some of his ancient allies employed in the fourth croisade in Syria, some dead, and the rest detached from him; so that Philip had the fairest opportunity, as well as the most plausible pretence, for depriving him of Normandy, and the rest of his dominions in France, under colour of executing the sentence of the court of peers; and he was not a prince capable of letting slip even a less promising occasion<sup>e</sup>. he did nothing precipitately ; he took care to have all the forms of law on his side, and, while a he was taking these precautions, he assembled a numerous army, with which he undertook the conquest of Normandy.

Methods used by Philip to extend the power of the crown at the expence of the great vassals.

It is not our business to enter into a detail of the campaign, it is sufficient for our purpose to say, that, in less than six months, he either obtained, by intelligence of the principal inhabitants, or reduced by force, all the great towns in Higher Normandy, while John remained at Caen in such a state of inaction, as not only amazed that but all succeeding ages. The strong fortrefs of Chasteau Gaillard made a gallant defence ; and John, as if he had waked out of a sleep, assembled a strong fleet and army for its relief ; but a concurrence of unfortunate accidents rendering his efforts ineffectual, he, in a fit of distraction, returned to England, and seemed to abandon all<sup>f</sup>. Philip, taking advantage of this, reduced all Lower Normandy with the same facility ; insomuch that John had nothing left but the city of Rouen, the inhabitants of which, from a true spirit of loyalty and independency, defended themselves bravely ; neither did they surrender, till, acquainting John with their distress, he returned them for answer, that, being able to afford them no relief, they must make the best terms for themselves they could : and thus, after a separation of three hundred years, Normandy was again united to the crown of France<sup>g</sup>. This success, far from satisfying, served only to raise and inflame the ambition of Philip, who carried the war into the countries of Maine, Anjou, and Touraine, the best part of which he subdued with the same ease that he had done Normandy. He saw clearly the superiority he had, and resolved to press it to the utmost. The count of Flanders was in Syria, the count of Champagne a child under his tutelage, the count of Thoulouse embarrassed with the court of Rome, who treated him as a heretic ; in short he was free from all the restraints by which his predecessors were in a manner tied down, and he thought the best use he could make of it, was to transmit that liberty which himself enjoyed to his posterity and successors<sup>h</sup>. The only error he committed was shewing his sentiments too plainly, and behaving towards some of the nobility as if that was already done, which was only in a fair way of being done ; a thing inexcusable in a politician ; but after all, even wise men are but men. Guy de Tours, who was become duke of Bretagne by the marriage of Constance the mother of prince Arthur, and the heiress of that duchy, had, during her life, acted as warmly as any against the English ; but that princess being dead, and perceiving plainly what was the intention of Philip, he laboured as much as in him lay to make king John sensible of the weak part he had acted, and to persuade him not to desert such of his subjects as yet remained faithful, and were willing to risque all to preserve what was still remaining of his dominions in France<sup>i</sup>. Moved by these remonstrances, and encouraged by his promises, that monarch came with a fleet and army to Rochelle ; but the fortune of Philip prevailed. John received at the beginning various checks, which made him glad to accept a truce for two years, and the duke of Bretagne, being left to the king's mercy, was forced to make peace upon the best terms he could obtain ; which was an event highly acceptable to Philip, who desired nothing so much as an opportunity of punishing or humbling his vassals<sup>k</sup>.

In the midst of these transactions, a new and very extraordinary scene opened itself in France. The popes having found a way to raise armies when, where, and against whom they pleased, by the preaching of a few hair-brained furious monks, resolved to make trial of it in Europe against those they stiled heretics, as they had done in Asia against the infidels. Raymond count of Thoulouse, who was a man of free principles, permitted persons of all opinions to reside in his territories, provided their morals were sound, and they did nothing against the public peace. These heretics, as they were stiled, did not agree intirely in sentiments, and it was no wonder, since, in reality, they were driven out of the church of Rome by a clear sense of her corruptions, or were the remains of the ancient Gothic churches, who were never infected with them<sup>l</sup>. To these people, because they lived about Albi, they gave the name of Albigois ; against whom, at the instance of Dominic and his disciples, pope Innocent the third published a croisade, in order to exterminate with the sword such as would not be converted with preaching<sup>m</sup>. This pious commission was offered to king Philip, who refused it, but connived at the execution of it, or perhaps durst not oppose it. Eudes duke of Burgundy, and afterwards Simon de Montfort, were at the head of these miscreants, who stiled themselves the army of the church, and most blasphemously intitled God to all the sacrileges, robberies, and murders, which they committed ; desolating all the fine provinces in the south of France, destroying not only those they stiled heretics, but also the catholics that lived amongst them : upon all which Philip looked with silence, believing that the miseries the a people suffered, and the destruction of the nobility in those parts, would pave the way for extending his authority, the only object of which he never lost sight <sup>a</sup>.

THE pope, having once got this new weapon in his hand, imagined himself to be invincible, and was consequently for employing it where-ever he found the least resistance. John king of England had refused to admit cardinal Stephen Langton in quality of legate from the holy see, because he looked upon him as a man wholly devoted to France; and this provoked the pope to such a degree, that he put the kingdom of England under an interdict <sup>b</sup>. This brought a furious persecution on the bishops who obeyed it, inasmuch that they were obliged to take refuge in France. Pope Innocent, upon this, resolved to keep no farther measures, excommunicated the king, and gave his dominions to the first occupier, assigning the same indulgences to such as fought against this prince, as if they had taken the cross against the infidels. The legates from Rome having proposed this expedition to Philip, he readily accepted it, knowing that some time or other an attempt would be made to wring Normandy from him, believing it rather his interest to carry the war into England than to expect it at home; and besides, being desirous to employ his son prince Lewis, who, without his knowledge, and contrary to his intention, had taken the cross against the Albigensis; which, he supposed, might be dispensed with by his service against the English <sup>c</sup>. Many of the great lords, either out of vain-glory, the desire of obtaining estates in that island, or out of pure caprice, applauded his design, and promised to follow him. Philip spent much time in forming an army suitable to so great an undertaking, and in preparing a vast fleet, which, if the French authors are to be credited, consisted of no less than seventeen hundred sail. The king of England, on the other hand, made also great preparations, gathered together an army of sixty thousand men, and had also a formidable fleet at Portsmouth, upon which he might have relied; but either from his own suspicions or the fidelity of his subjects, or from the natural fickleness of his temper, he changed his scheme on a sudden, made the meanest submissions to the pope in the person of his legate cardinal Pandolph, by which he procured absolution; and when Philip expected all the assistance that the authority of the see of Rome could give him, he was threatened with an excommunication if he proceeded in his attempt; but this was not the motive that induced him to desist <sup>d</sup>.

THE great peril he was in had awakened so much sense in king John, that, with great secrecy and much address, he had negotiated a league upon the continent for the destruction of France, and, as it was perfectly well concerted, they had proceeded to divide the bear's skin; Ferdinand count of Flanders was to have the city of Paris and the Isle of France, the count of Bologne the Vermandois, John himself the provinces beyond the Loire, and his nephew the emperor Otho Burgundy and Champagne <sup>e</sup>. Raymond count of Toulouse, and the rest of the princes who had been so ill treated by the croisade, had likewise promised to make a diversion on their side. Philip was no sooner acquainted with this confederacy, than he turned all his forces against the count of Flanders, ravaged all the flat country, and laid siege to Ghent; to facilitate which, he ordered his fleet to repair to the port of Dam. He was quickly obliged to raise the siege, by the news that the squadrons of king John had taken three hundred of his ships laden with all sorts of ammunition and military stores, sunk a hundred more, and blocked up all the rest in the haven and canal <sup>f</sup>. They had likewise the boldness to debark a small body of troops, which, marching directly towards the French camp, Philip surprised and cut the best part of them to pieces; which trivial success could not console him for the loss he had already sustained, and much less for that which followed; since, having no other way to keep them out of the hands of the English, he was constrained to order all the rest of his fleet to be burnt <sup>g</sup>. King John, animated by this little gleam of prosperity, transported a considerable army to Rochelle, where he no sooner landed than the Poitevins revolted in his favour; he afterwards made himself master of Angiers, the fortifications of which had been demolished, and were by him repaired: in fine, he ravaged all the country as far as the frontiers of Bretagne <sup>h</sup>. Philip, foreseeing the ill consequences that might attend this unexpected diversion, sent his son Lewis with a considerable force to oppose him. Some of the French historians say, that, upon his approach, king John decamped so precipitately, that he left his heavy baggage and engines of war behind him; but others assure us there were faults on both sides, that the Poitevins, afraid of being treated as rebels, abandoned the field; and that a great part of the French army, being seized with the like panic, behaved as ill; but, however this matter passed, it seems to be certain, that king John retired to his castle at Partenai, resolved to wait there for the event of the campaign in Flanders, where the best of his own troops were, and indeed the combined forces of the whole confederacy, under the command of the emperor in person: and as there never was a campaign of more importance to France than this, we shall be obliged to treat it more particularly, tho' at the same time as succinctly as possible <sup>w</sup>.

The important victory at Bouvines.

A. D. 1214.

KING Philip believing it more honourable, and not at all more dangerous, to meet than to expect his enemies, advanced as far as Tournay, with an army of fifty thousand men, the flower of his forces, and commanded by the principal nobility of France, such as Eudes duke of Burgundy, Robert count of Dreux, Philip his brother, Peter Courtenai count of Nevers, all, in the modern stile, princes of the blood, Stephen count of Sancerre, John count of Ponthieu, Gaucher count of St. Paul, twenty-two other lords carrying banners, twelve hundred knights, and between six and seven thousand gens-d'armes <sup>x</sup>. The emperor Otho, on the other side, had with him the earl of Salisbury, bastard brother to king John, Ferdinand count of Flanders, Rainald count of Bologne, Otho duke of Limburgh, William duke of Brabant, Henry duke of Lorrain, Philip count of Namur, seven or eight German princes, thirty bannerets, and an army superior in number to that of Philip. The two armies met near the village of Bouvines, on the 27th of July<sup>y</sup>. The emperor laboured to outstretch the French line, giving the command of the right wing to the earl of Flanders, the left to the count of Boulogne, and remained himself in the center, encircled by his great lords. The army of France was disposed in order of battle by brother Guerin of the order of the knights hospitallers, and bishop elect of Senlis; and to the excellent disposition he made cotemporary writers ascribe the fortune of the day. The king was in the center, the duke of Burgundy commanded the right, and the count de St. Paul the left. The right was broke in the beginning of the action, but rallied and recovered their ground; the left sustained the attack of the allies, without giving way; but the heat of the battle was in the center, where the emperor was once taken, but rescued; Philip wounded in the throat, dragged from his horse, and in the same instant of time exposed to the most imminent danger of being cut to pieces, taken, or trampled to death, if the brave men who were about him had not delivered him. This engagement lasted from noon till about five o'clock, when the allies were totally routed, chiefly through the misfortune of having the sun all the time in their eyes, whereas the French had it on their backs. The counts of Flanders and Bologne, three other great counts, four German princes, and twenty-five bannerets, were taken prisoners. Philip returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph, the two counts of Flanders and Bologne following in chains<sup>z</sup>. He afterwards advanced towards Poitou, with an intent to crush John and his adherents to pieces; but upon the interposition of the pope's legate, the submission of John by Randal earl of Chester, and a present of sixty thousand pounds sterling, he was prevailed upon to admit of a truce for five years; for which he is exceedingly blamed by the modern French writers, who are amazed that he should lose so fair an opportunity of completing the re-union of all that John held in France. The character of this prince considered, who was one of the best statesmen, and one of the most ambitious princes the French ever had, is sufficient to persuade us that he had reasons for acting as he did, and a sufficient attention to certain facts that lie scattered in the old writers will enable us to distinguish what these motives were<sup>a</sup>. He was sensible before the battle of Bouvines, that it was his own power, rather than any regard for the king of England, that had raised so powerful a confederacy; he knew they had intelligence throughout his dominions, and even in his very camp; nay, he was so suspicious of some about him, that, when he heard divine service before the action began, he caused a crown of gold to be placed upon the altar, and told all the lords present, that, as they fought not for him but for the honour and independency of France, if they knew any one amongst themselves more worthy to wear it, he was ready to place the crown upon his head, and to fight under his command; which generous proceeding extinguished all disaffection on that important day: but, after his return to Paris, he came to know so distinctly how dissatisfied the bulk of the nobility were at the increase of his power<sup>b</sup>, that he thought it an improper juncture to augment it, and chose rather to amass money that might enable him to pay an army of his own, than to risque his person any longer in one, where the troops of the crown bore but a small proportion to those of his vassals, whose army it was in effect more than his own. <sup>f</sup>

Lewis, heir

Philip, is in-

THE war being thus ended, the king suffered his son Lewis to perform his vow, in marching with a body of troops against the Albigens, who by this time were almost intirely reduced; so that he rather inspired with jealousy Simon de Montfort, who commanded the crosses, than did them any real service<sup>c</sup>. While he was thus employed, a new occasion offered for gratifying his own and his father's ambition; the barons of England had taken up arms against king John, and had declared him as a tyrant fallen from his regal dignity; but as he had a good

- a army and fleet at his devotion, they found it not so easy to reduce him to the state of a private man as they expected, and therefore they judged it expedient to set up another king; with which view they invited prince Lewis, on the report, as they said, of his virtues, to come and accept of the crown<sup>d</sup>. The French historians insist, or rather dream, of a legal right, derived from his wife, who was the grand-daughter of Henry the second; forgetting that, besides king John and his family, the princess Eleanor, sister to Arthur, and daughter to Geoffrey, duke of Bretagne, was living. But election was a sufficient right for this purpose; and therefore Lewis, in the flower of his age, and full of heat, readily accepted the offer. How to furnish him with forces for this purpose was a point not easy to be solved, even by king Philip<sup>e</sup>. It was likely to revive the jealousy of his nobility, it was a direct breach of the truce, and it was a
- b step that could not fail of provoking the pope. Philip, therefore, had recourse to a very strange expedient; he disclaimed having any thing to do with his son, he forbade him to meddle with the affairs of England, but furnished him at the same time with a good army and a numerous fleet. This address was altogether ineffectual; for his nobility were not deceived, the truce was plainly violated, and the pope threatened an interdict. However, Lewis went to England, landed in Kent, took Rocheſter and other places, proceeded to London, and was received there as king; but he committed a great error in leaving Dover castle behind him, which was very ill provided, and which king John immediately re victualled, augmented the garrison, and repaired and enlarged the fortifications<sup>f</sup>. His father Philip having admonished him of his error, Lewis besieged the place, but without effect, as he did Windsor also with
- c the same want of success. While his forces were thus employed, John marched through the kingdom with his army, and took a severe revenge of his enemies, ravaging their lands, and demolishing their castles, till surprised by a sudden death<sup>g</sup>. In the mean time the pope had excommunicated both Lewis and Philip, and had commanded the bishops of France to put the kingdom under an interdict; which though they refused to do, upon the king's declaring he took no part in this war, yet he was so much afraid of assisting his son, that Lewis was constrained to make a truce with the young king Henry the third, that he might have time to pass over into France, in order to obtain succours, without which he saw it was impossible to support his daily declining party<sup>h</sup>. It may be remarked, that at this time a minority proved of singular advantage to England.
- d THE terror of the papal power was at this time so great, that king Philip refused to see his son, at least publicly, while he remained in France, and so many precautions were used in furnishing him with supplies, that he received no great benefit from this voyage; while in England the defection became greater and greater, occasioned chiefly by a report, that the viscount of Melun had declared upon his death-bed, that Lewis looked upon the barons as traitors, and resolved, as soon as it was in his power, to rid himself of them at any rate<sup>i</sup>. At his return, Lewis attacked Dover again with the same ill fortune; and though his army afterwards reduced the city of Lincoln, yet, while they were engaged in the siege of the castle, they were surprised and defeated by the earl of Pembroke, who, in this action, took no less than fifty-two persons of distinction prisoners; which so enfeebled the party of Lewis, that, in order to preserve
- e the city of London, he was obliged to shut himself up there with all his forces<sup>k</sup>. In this distress he redoubled his applications to his father for relief; which Philip, not daring to assist him in any other way, recommended to the care of his consort Blanch, who very speedily raised a body of troops under the command of Robert de Courtenai, and embarked them on board a strong squadron commanded by Eustace Le Moine. But the English fleet attacked them at the mouth of the river of Thames, and, having taken the admiral, caused his head to be struck off, because he had been formerly in the English service; which so intimidated the rest, that, crowding all the sail they could, they returned into the French harbour<sup>l</sup>. This left Lewis no other means of saving himself than by a treaty, which he made in person with the young king Henry, the legate, and the earl of Pembroke: the terms were, that Lewis and
- f the lords with him should take an oath to stand to the judgment of the church; to return quietly into France; to use their endeavours to procure the restitution of Normandy, and the rest of the countries possessed by king Philip; and, in case they should not succeed, to restore them whenever Lewis became king<sup>m</sup>. On the other hand, the barons were restored to all their liberties and privileges, and the prisoners taken in the battle of Lincoln, and at the route of the French fleet, were to be set free. The legate, upon the execution of this treaty, absolved prince Lewis; who thereupon returned to France, where he was again absolved by the pope's legate with much ceremony<sup>n</sup>.

But in the close is obliged to capitulate, and so it the kingdom upon terms.

Is sent against the Albigeois. A. D. 1219. AT the expiration of the five years truce, which had been concluded with king John, and which Philip affected to maintain, he sent his son Lewis to besiege Rochelle, which he reduced; but, upon the coming over of the earls of Kent and Salisbury, the truce was again renewed for four years more, and the city of Rochelle restored<sup>o</sup>. By this time, the cruelty of the crosses, under the command of Simon de Montfort, had so wore out the patience of the people in the south of France, that they had restored the old count of Thoulouse, and Simon, besieging him in that city, was killed before it; upon which pope Honorius the third earnestly solicited king Philip to send Lewis once more against the Albigeois, and the monks were ordered to preach again the croisade<sup>p</sup>. The king, after much intreaty, consented; Lewis took the command of the army, but made no great progress, either through want of zeal in himself, or in virtue of secret instructions from his father, who at length, in tenderness to his reputation, thought fit to recall him<sup>q</sup>.

THE principal motive to the recalling prince Lewis was to have him present at a great council of the nobility and prelates, which was to be held at Paris, to consider of the offer made by Amauri de Montfort, the eldest son of Simon; who, furnishing that Lewis had carried on the war against the Albigeois so coldly because the crown had no immediate interest in it, proposed, out of his zeal against the heretics, to resign to the crown his rights to the duchy of Narbonne, the county of Thoulouse, and all the lands that had been so liberally bestowed upon his father by pope Innocent the third in the council of Lateran. The king also returning out of his new conquest for the same purpose, fell ill of a fever at Mante, where he died on the fourteenth of July, in the forty-fourth year of his reign, and the fifty ninth of his age<sup>r</sup>. He is allowed to have been the greatest monarch that reigned in France from the time of Charlemagne, and that very deservedly, in whatever light he is considered. As a politician, he did more towards restoring the authority of the crown than all his predecessors, and indeed as much as could be expected; for at the time of his demise the balance between the crown and its vassals was destroyed, and the great check of the English power removed. As a captain, he was the first who introduced regular troops in his own pay; who reduced war to a system; encouraged the invention of military engines, and introduced a regular method of defending and besieging towns. As the patron of letters, he revived and augmented the privileges of the university of Paris<sup>s</sup>; laid the foundations of the castle of the Louvre; caused most of the great towns in his dominions to be walled and paved; and, in the latter end of his life, expended the immense treasure he had amassed in making great roads, building bridges, and in constructing other edifices for public use; which shews that his laying up money did not arise from a spirit of avarice, but from a view to public utility, otherwise he would never have parted with it, more especially in his old age. But that for which he is most celebrated by the French historians, is, the re-uniting to the crown Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, Auvergne, Vermandois, Artois, Montargis, Guienne, &c. so that he left the kingdom of France twice as large as he received it, and by this means made re-unions twice as easy to his successors<sup>t</sup> (G).

(G) This famous monarch was of a middle stature, well proportioned, had regular features; but the misfortune to have two specks on one of his eyes. He was affable, and easy in his manners, had the general good of his subjects at heart, and, from a consciousness of this, acted sometimes a little bluntly towards the nobility and the peers. He loved decency in every thing, but was an enemy to gaudiness and useless expence, as appears by his prohibiting the use of scarlet and rich furs during the time of the croisade. His first queen was Isabel, daughter of Baldwin the Brave count of Hainault, whom he espoused the 28th of April 1180. Three years after, he banished her to Senlis for having spoke to him a little too warmly in behalf of the cardinal of Rheims. She died at Paris, March 15th 1190, in the 21st year of her age, in childbed of twins, leaving behind her only one son Lewis, who succeeded his father. He espoused at Amiens, August 12th 1193, Isenburge, or Ingelburge, sister to Canute the sixth, king of Denmark, whom he repudiated, and procured a divorce, as we have shewn in the text, under pretence of consanguinity. He had afterwards some thoughts of espousing Joan queen dowager of Sicily, and in June 1196 married Agnes, the daughter of Bertold the fourth, duke of Merania, whom many historians call Mary. She died at Poissy, in 1201, of grief at his being obliged by the pope to take back his former queen. By her he had Philip Hurspel, that is, the Rude, created by his father count of Clermont in Beauvoisis, but who, in right of his wife Matilda, or Maud, became count of Dammartin and Bologne, and gave great disturbance to the queen regent in the minority of St. Lewis. He had also by the same princess a daughter Mary, promised in marriage to Alexander prince of Scotland, afterwards to Arthur count of Bretagne, but married neither. In 1206 she espoused Philip count of Namur, and, after his decease, Henry duke of Brabant. These children were legitimated by the pope, and Philip had so good an opinion of his own birth, that he secretly aimed at the crown. But notwithstanding the king, to prevent an interdict, took back queen Ingelburge, and was seemingly reconciled, yet he very soon after sent her to Estampes, where she remained twelve years, and then, when it was least expected, he sent for her to Paris, lived with her the remaining ten years of his life in great tranquillity, and.

- a LEWIS the eighth, surnamed the Lion, was crowned with his consort queen Blanch, on the eighth of August, at Rheims, by the archbishop of that city, in the presence of the titular king of Jerusalem, and the principal nobility of the kingdom. Henry of England, instead of coming in person, or sending any to represent him at this solemnity, demanded by an embassy soon after, that the king, in pursuance of his treaty and oath, should restore to him the dominions which his father had possessed in France<sup>1</sup>. But the times were changed, and Lewis answered roundly, that he looked upon his title to the forfeited dominions, which his father united to the crown, as incontestible; and that, with respect to his own treaty, he looked upon it to be void, because he was informed the English barons were not restored to all their privileges, and that the French prisoners had been obliged to pay ransom<sup>2</sup>. As it was pretty evident a war would ensue as soon as the truce expired, the king renewed his treaty with the emperor Frederick, and soon after made another with Hughes count de March, who had married the queen dowager of England. These precautions taken, Lewis resolved to prosecute his father's design, which was the total expulsion of the English: he raised for this purpose a numerous army, with which he besieged Niort: the place was defended by Savari de Mauléon, who had hitherto been the chief support of the English interest in Poitou. He made a gallant defence, but was at length obliged to capitulate, and retire with his garrison to Rochele. Lewis next made himself master of St. John d'Angeli, and afterwards marched his victorious army to Rochele. Savari, who had the reputation of being one of the greatest captains of that age, behaved in a manner suitable to that character, and solicited continually relief from England, more especially in money; but, being deluded with fallacious promises, and a quarrel arising between the garrison and the inhabitants, he was obliged to capitulate, and was permitted to embark himself and his garrison for England; where looking upon himself as very ill treated, he returned into France, and entered into the service of king Lewis<sup>3</sup>. All that the English now possessed was the city of Bordeaux, and the country beyond the Garonne. To preserve this, Henry sent a stout squadron, with a considerable corps of troops on board, commanded by his brother Richard, whom he made a knight, and created earl of Cornwall and count of Poitou, upon this occasion<sup>4</sup>. This had an extraordinary effect; the nobility, clergy, and people, naturally inclined to the English, were so pleased to have a prince of the royal blood amongst them, that they enabled him to make such efforts as induced king Lewis to make a truce for three years; for which he is, by some writers, very much blamed<sup>5</sup>.

Lewis VIII. Uplately executed the treaty of London.

A. D. 1224.

- e THE apparent motive of the king's conduct was his being warmly pressed by a legate from the pope to take the cross, and to march against the Albigois, with which he at length complied. He accepted, upon this occasion, what his father had refused, that is, the cession of the rights of Amauri de Montfort, to whom he promised the high post of constable of France, when it should become vacant. While he was preparing for this expedition, a very extraordinary affair happened. There appeared in Flanders a man who stiled himself Baldwin emperor of Constantinople, and consequently the natural sovereign of that country, and as such he was joyfully received by the people<sup>6</sup>. The countess, who had governed from the time of her husband Ferdinand's imprisonment, finding it impossible to resist, had recourse to the protection of king Lewis; who summoned this emperor Baldwin to attend him at Peronne. The man came thither with great intrepidity, related the manner in which he had fallen into the hands of the Bulgarians, the great hardships he had endured in his captivity, and the way by which he made his escape; but when they questioned him as to things that had passed before he left Flanders, he answered sullenly, that he would say nothing before such a multitude; whereupon the king dismissed him, but with a safe conduct, till he was out of his dominions. Upon this the people abandoned him, and, being seized by some of the countess's adherents, she caused him to be tortured to death as an impostor, which did not hinder her subjects from reproaching her with her ambition and avarice, that had instigated her to treat in this manner a person she knew to be her father<sup>7</sup>. After this, the king having assembled his army, and the cardinal
- f legate having paved the way, by thundering out an excommunication against the young count of Thoulouse (which the world in general, and many bishops in particular, thought very unjust), marched directly to Lyons, and from thence, along the banks of the Rhone, to Avignon;

and, besides her jointure, left her, by will, ten thousand livres, as a mark of his affection. She died at Corbeil, in 1236, in the 60th year of her age, and was buried in the priory of St. John, at the place before-mentioned, of her own foundation; but the king her husband was interred at St. Denis. It is necessary to observe, that, though no notice is taken of it by most historians, yet he had certainly a bastard son, whose name was Peter Carlot, to whom William la Breton dedicated his poem, and, being his preceptor, he wrote also a poem in his honour, stiled Carlotes. This young prince became afterwards treasurer of Tours, and bishop of Nojon, where he died in 1249.

where the people would have submitted, but that they were afraid of being plundered. The king refusing to give them any assurance of the contrary, they shut their gates, and he immediately invested the place with an army of fifty thousand men<sup>c</sup>. As the people were driven to despair, they made a very long and very obstinate defence, till at length the king, who had with him the principal nobility of France, forced them to yield to a capitulation; but found his army so much diminished, and in so miserable a condition, that he was constrained to defer the siege of Thoulouse, which he had likewise meditated, to the next year; and, retiring from thence into Auvergne, in his passage from thence to Paris he was seized with a violent distemper, of which he died in a week at Montpensier, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and fourth of his reign. Some writers say, that his physicians thought he might have recovered, if he would have taken a woman to his bed; but that he chose rather to die than to commit a mortal sin<sup>d</sup>. An English historian, however, who had reason to be well informed, and no reason to conceal the truth, gives a very different account of his death. He affirms, that it happened before the place surrendered; that the count of Champagne, who was amorous of queen Blanch, went to the king and told him, that, having served the full term of forty days, he would continue no longer at the siege; that thereupon Lewis threatened him, if he departed, he would lay his country waste with fire and sword; to prevent which the count caused him to be poisoned; and that the cardinal legate concealed his death till the place was taken<sup>e</sup>. Thus much is certain, that the day on which he died is not exactly fixed; but, from various circumstances, it appears to have been some time in the beginning of November. He is thought to have foreseen the troubles that happened upon his death, by his requiring the oaths of the prelates and nobility that were about him, that they would place the crown upon his son's head; and though it is farther said, that he took this promise under their hands and seals, yet they were not very forward to observe it<sup>f</sup>, having long expected such an opportunity of setting up what they esteemed their own rights against those of the crown.

LEWIS the ninth, commonly called St. Lewis, was about twelve years of age when his father died; and some of the prelates, who were near the person of that monarch, having deposed, that he declared his consort tutorefs and regent, the queen dowager immediately took upon her the title and power, got together what forces she was able, and resolved to carry her son to Rheims, though the see was then vacant, in order to be crowned: others speak very differently of this princess; for some make her a miracle of beauty and piety; others assert, that she was rather agreeable than handsome, and that, if she had her virtues, she had her weaknesses also<sup>g</sup>. That she was beloved by Thibaut count of Champagne was the common rumour of that age, grounded upon the songs and poems written by him in her praise. In answer to the objection, that her lover was one of the first who declared himself a malcontent, it is said, that he did this from jealousy, the queen being wholly directed by the advice of the cardinal legate, who was suspected to love the queen, and who it was also suspected was not hated by her<sup>h</sup>. But it is very probable these are but calumnies, since Blanch was at this time towards forty, and the count of Champagne little more than half as old; so that his passion was to be regarded rather as vanity, with which the queen ought to have been offended, and so at first it seems she was, since she gave express directions for arresting him, in case he had come to Rheims; but afterwards her affairs taught her to make another use of his folly, which, as we shall see, her son knew how to chastise. In the mean time, perceiving the disaffection of the nobility, she caused her son to be crowned by the bishop of Soissons, tho' there were only three counts, the great officers of the crown, and a few prelates, present at that ceremony; which was one of the wisest steps she could take<sup>i</sup> (H).

(H) The coronation of the young king was a point of so great importance, that, as we have hinted in the text, the king, on his death-bed, had exacted the strongest assurances from the chief lords who were about him, that it should be performed without delay; but, when they found this inconsistent with their interest, they judged that it gave them a right to perform their promise. The peers, it seems, thought that their presence was so essential, as that this ceremony could not be performed without them; and from this persuasion they stated their demands, which, when complied with, they were content to perform their functions in that solemnity. But the queen had two able statesmen about her, who gave her right advice; the one was the cardinal legate Bonaventure, who, proceeding on the general maxims of policy, told her that the inauguration of her son could not be too speedily performed; and the other Guérin, bishop of Senlis, and chancellor of France, the same who won the battle of Ecuvin for Philip Augustus, and who had raised his post of chancellor to be the first civil employment in the state; and he told her what was requisite according to the laws of France. The late king Lewis, in 1224, had procured a decision of the peers in favour of the great officers of the crown, by which it was decreed, that the chancellor, the constable, the butler, and the chamberlain, had time immemorial sat, and of right

<sup>a</sup> THE true state of the matter is, that the great lords, perceiving how much their power had been lessened, and their authority restrained, by the two last kings, thought this minority, which was the third from the death of Hugô Capet, a favourable opportunity to recover both; and therefore they made certain demands, which they insisted should be granted before they rendered homage to the new king. The chiefs of this confederacy were, Philip count of Boulogne, the son of Philip Augustus, who was suspected to have a design upon the crown: Joanna countess of Flanders, who bore an irreconcilable hatred to the queen regent; Peter de Dreux, second son to Robert count of Dreux, and grandson of Robert, fourth son to Leopold the Great, who, by the marriage of Constance, the daughter of the heiress of Bretagne by Guy de Thours, held that country with the title of count, and who was very desirous of rendering himself independent of the crown; Thibaut count of Champagne, out of vanity and pique; Raymond count of Thoulouse, in hopes of recovering and securing his dominions; Berenger count of Provence, from the strict alliance he had long held with Raymond. The points upon which they insisted, were, that as the queen was a stranger, she ought to give them some security that she would not violate the laws; that she should restore the estates of such as had been confiscated during the last kings reigns; and that she should release such as were prisoners, particularly Ferdinand count of Flanders; all which she peremptorily refused<sup>k</sup>. In order to secure herself, and to make them sensible of her resentment, she marched immediately with an army against the count of Champagne, having with her the count of Bologne, who had not as yet declared for the malecontents. Some writers say, that she compelled Thibaut to pay homage to the king, and to acknowledge his indiscretion; but others say, that she only signified to him that she had a mind to see him at court, and that thereupon he quitted his party, and went to throw himself at her feet. There is certainly the greater probability of this from her conduct towards the rest; for having twice summoned them to answer before the parliament, she at length condescended to treat with them all, and by a proper distribution of favours to them, and of money to their favourites, drew them gradually to submission<sup>l</sup>. In one instance she shewed great dexterity: the countess of Flanders, whom the populace reproached with the murder of her father, and who, by pretending she could not raise his ransom, had left her husband Ferdinand so many years in prison, was now inclined to get that marriage dissolved, with a view of marrying the count of Bretagne. To prevent this, the queen set count Ferdinand at liberty, upon such easy terms, that he remained ever after attached to her service. It is also said, that she prevented Henry III. of England from coming to the assistance of the malecontents, by attacking the weak side of his minister the earl of Kent, who, with many heroic qualities, loved money too much, and for a large sum suffered the expedition to fail for want of a fleet<sup>m</sup>. Yet, when she thought all quiet, she found herself in the greatest danger.

THE old count of Bologne, who was taken at the battle of Bouvines, had been all this time in prison; and finding he was to remain there, when the count of Flanders was discharged, delivered himself, in a fit of despair, of life and chains together. The king's uncle, Philip, who had been restrained by the fear of the queen's setting his father-in-law at liberty, now joined the malecontents. Their first scheme was to seize the person of the king in his passage from Orleans to Paris; but the queen, being informed of this by the count of Champagne, carried the king to a strong fortress upon the road, and having given notice of his danger to the people of Paris, they came with a force sufficient to conduct him in safety to his capital<sup>n</sup>. This, tho' it disconcerted, did not dissolve the confederacy, except in appearance; for having taken their measures with the count of Bretagne, they separated, as if they had given all for lost. The count of Bretagne broke out into open rebellion; and the king having named the place of rendezvous on the frontiers, all the malecontents, with high professions of loyalty, promised to repair thither; and they did so, but with so slender a force, that the count might easily have made the king prisoner, which was what they designed: but the count of Champagne, right ought to sit and vote with the peers. This gave them great weight; himself as chancellor, Matthew de Montmorency then constable, with the rest of the great officers, Peter de Dreux, a few other noblemen and some prelates, resorted to Rheims; where James de Baisoch, bishop of Soissons, crowned the king on the first of December. The countesses of Champagne and Flanders were also present, and contended, on the part of their husbands, for the right of carrying the sword, which they at length consented should be borne by the king's uncle Philip count of Bologne, without prejudice to their respective claims; and thus, as it will ever happen in such cases, the peers, who were absent, not only lost their point, but with it, in a great measure, their principal prerogative, for till this time there had been some shew of an election preserved; but henceforward the coronation became a mere ceremony, in which, tho' the peers sometimes contended for precedency and their particular functions, yet these contentions were about their own rights, and those of the king were intirely out of the question.

pagne, whom they had trusted in this as in the former plot, arrived, when they least expected it, with so great a force, that the count de Bretagne, instead of triumphing, was forced to submit, and to make the best terms with the king and queen regent that he could<sup>o</sup>. The queen also having, by the assistance of the cardinal legate, drawn an immense subsidy from the clergy in France, assisted the army of the church so powerfully, that the count of Thoulouse, being reduced to extremity, made a peace on the hardest terms, and consented to give his daughter to the king's brother Alonso, and declare her sole heiress of his estates, by which they were afterwards annexed to the crown. So that the maxims of the late reign were thoroughly understood, and with great fortitude pursued in this<sup>p</sup>.

A. D. 1228.

In the mean time the malecontents had drawn the count of Champagne back to their party, by offering to him the daughter of the count of Bretagne; yet the king, being informed of it, broke it by a letter sent to the count, when all things were prepared for its celebration, which so incensed the malecontents, that they sent for the queen of Cyprus, who had a claim to this country, and on her behalf entered Champagne with an army, which induced the revolt of a great part of the count's vassals; but the king came to his relief with a powerful army, and obliged his enemies to retire<sup>q</sup>. At length the claim of the queen of Cyprus was compromised for a sum of money, which the king advanced, by the sale of a considerable part of the count's territories; so that, upon the whole, the crown was the greatest gainer by this whole transaction. A strong proof of the steadiness and prudence of their counsels, rather than their generosity<sup>r</sup>.

king or king-

In the course of her regency, the queen gave repeated proofs of her firmness and address. She made use of the earl of Flanders to curb the count of Bologne when in arms; and at length, she totally detached him from the party of the malecontents, by convincing him he was deceived by them; and that, while they affected to flatter him with hopes of the crown, they in reality designed it for Enguerrand de Coucy, a nobleman of great merit and parts, but weak enough to believe that they were sincere in these propositions, and would be strong enough to effect it, by which he was wretchedly deluded<sup>s</sup>. But Philip, count of Bologne, wisely accepted a good pension, and reconciled himself to his nephew and his mother. In short, she applied the money she received from the clergy so prudently, that very often those who appeared to be the most zealous amongst the malecontents were but her spies; and if there were any who refused her money, she gave out positively that they had accepted it; so that they were in continual disputes and jealousies of each other, and, except the count of Bretagne, though they had the best inclination in the world to rebellion, were never in a condition to attempt it<sup>t</sup>. As for that count, he could do nothing without the king of England's assistance; and the queen's liberalities were so acceptable to his ministers, that sometimes she hindered him from succouring the count, and rendered his expeditions fruitless when he did; so that, after taking one of the count's principal fortresses, in a manner under the king's eye, she forced the former to submit, and the latter to consent to a truce for three years: and thus the troubles of her regency were ended, without the least prejudice to the king's authority or domain<sup>u</sup>.

Yet exposes

sure, which,
however, she treated with

AFTER all this she was far from escaping censure, and the great pains she took about the king's education was made the subject. Those to whom she entrusted it were chiefly clergy, who took more pains to impress on his mind sentiments of religion than politics, and who though they were attentive enough as to his exercises, were very strict in point of diversions. The courtiers, who were by no means pleased, gave out very different stories; some deplored the fate of the kingdom, the monarch of which was like to have no other abilities than those of a monk; while others whispered, that the young king could dissemble as well as his mother, and that, notwithstanding his modest appearance, he had privately his mistresses, with which the regent was not unacquainted, but that she was willing he should indulge other passions, while she indulged her ambition<sup>v</sup>. The queen, being informed of this, took it in a right light; and to prevent their rendering that a truth which was at present a calumny, she resolved to marry the young king, in his nineteenth year, to Margaret, the eldest daughter of the count of Provence; and, executing that project without difficulty or delay, she kept the young king, and his younger wife, so much under her eye<sup>w</sup>, and in such awe, as furnished materials for fresh stories, which, though not altogether groundless, she treated with contempt, and continued to take her measures according to her own sense of things, and without giving herself much pain about what was thought of them by others: and, indeed, considering how happily she conducted her administration in times of such danger and perplexity, we need not wonder that many historians have sounded her praises so high, and taken so much pains to apologize for her high spirit, and strong inclination to power, since they were the instruments a of so much good to the king her son, and contributed so apparently to the welfare of the state, and to the tranquillity of his subjects<sup>y</sup>.

THE count de Bretagne remained still in the same mutinous disposition, and was, at every turn, labouring to bring an army of English auxiliaries over to his assistance. Lewis, by his mother's advice, resolved, once for all, to put an end to this, by attacking him with a puissant force; the queen, in the mean time, having drawn several of the lords in Bretagne from their attachment to the count, and having such an intelligence in England, as left her free from any apprehensions of a descent from thence. When, therefore, the king approached the frontiers with an army, the count, who had done homage to the king of England for his territories, desired leave to demand succour from that monarch, which if he did not receive, he promised to submit. This was indulged him; and Henry refusing to come with a fleet and army to relieve him, he returned, and presented himself before Lewis with a rope about his neck. The king, however, after some hard words, and the imposition of very rigorous terms, dismissed him, sufficiently humbled, and yet glad to escape even at that rate<sup>z</sup>. The king, becoming of the age of twenty-one years, might, as the constitution of France then stood, have taken the reins of government into his own hands; but queen Blanch was not weary of ruling; and Lewis had so much deference for his mother, that, though she laid aside the title of regent, she exercised the same authority as before. Thibaut count of Champagne being become, in right of his mother, king of Navarre, and having found an immense sum in the treasury of that crown, began to surmise, that it was not a sale, but a mortgage he had made of the estates which some years before he had surrendered to the crown. But the king, notwithstanding the interposition of the pope, made him so sensible of the superior weight of his arms, that he was constrained to submit<sup>a</sup>. The manner in which these potent vassals of the crown had been from time to time mortified, and the sense they had of the impossibility of giving the crown any remarkable disquiet at this juncture, induced them to follow the example of the king of Navarre, who had taken the cross, that they might go and display their courage and their power, at the same time that they indulged their spirit of independency in distant climates. Accordingly the count de Bretagne, having resigned his dominions to his son Henry count of Bar, the duke of Burgundy, with Amauri de Montfort, constable of France, and several other great lords, attended him<sup>b</sup>. About this time it is said d that the prince of the Assassins sent two of his desperate attendants into France, with orders to kill the king; but being afterwards informed how mild and good a prince he was, sent a countermand, and those who brought it arrived before the Assassins. The king, apprised by them of his danger, instituted, as his grandfather had done, a new guard, with maces, for the security of his person. In a little time the two assassins were discovered and seized; but the king was so far from doing them any hurt, that he caused them to be kindly treated, and sent them back with a rich present for their master. But, perhaps, it was not the good character of the king solely that brought about this event<sup>c</sup>. The Tartars began like an inundation to sweep all Asia; and the prince of the Assassins, and other Mohammedan powers, most earnestly implored the assistance of the Christians, to prevent their common destruction by these barbarous invaders<sup>d</sup>. e

So long as the great lords remained abroad, the kingdom enjoyed a proper tranquillity. Lewis, as soon as he became of age, had settled his brothers in the manner prescribed by his father's testament, and omitted nothing that could contribute to place them in a state of grandeur and security, suitable to their birth. This chagrined some, and frightened others; and therefore, upon the return of the count of Bretagne, and other lords, from Syria, they began to cabal afresh, and to take all the measures they could devise for exciting a new war<sup>e</sup>. At the head of this contrivance was the count de la March, who had married the queen dowager of England, a princess who could not bear the thoughts of doing homage to the children of queen Blanch, and who was bent, at all events, to recover for her son Henry the territories his father had lost in France. The count of Thoulouse was also of this faction, and with much much more reason than any, since he had been very hardly treated. Henry III. of England was the power chiefly depended upon; and, indeed, but for that dependence, there could have been none of these disturbances in France<sup>f</sup>.

It was his foible to form very great designs, and to execute them weakly. But he had the misfortune to differ with his parliament; and, as they would give him no supplies, he was compelled to raise money at high interest: and this went but a little way in a war where his allies were very hungry, and where, though they were to reap all the profit, they notwithstanding expected him to be at most of the expence<sup>g</sup>. King Lewis, after trying all means to quiet the minds of the malecontents, at length assembled a great army, the best part of which was composed of troops in his own pay; and, having twice beaten the confederates, he constrained the count of la March to make a separate peace upon very hard terms, and concluded another truce with Henry, who, finding himself disappointed by the greater part of the French lords (who, upon reflection, were afraid to join with him), began to have a distaste for these kind of proceedings, and therefore went to Bordeaux, to get his son Edward acknowledged by the inhabitants of that city for his heir apparent<sup>h</sup>. The triumphing over this confederacy, which, if things had taken another turn, would have produced an universal insurrection, was the most important, if not the most glorious, event in the reign of king Lewis, as it placed b his authority on a level, at least with that of his grandfather Philip Augustus<sup>i</sup>.

THE count of Thoulouse was the last who submitted; and though the king readily pardoned his revolt, yet he was very strict in the precautions he took, that he should not revolt again. His whole conduct was of the same tenure; and the point he kept continually in view was, to put it out of the power of the great lords to disturb him with impunity. He had before made an edict, with the consent of his parliament or council, that they should not marry their daughters to foreigners without his permission; the pretence was to prevent strangers from inheriting lands in France, to the prejudice of natives, which was very plausible and popular; but the principal aim was to hinder their having any connections, and of consequence obtaining any support, from other princes<sup>k</sup>. At this time he made another edict, that such as held c lands from him, and from the king of England, should make their election to which of the kings they would render homage, and thereby put an end to the old custom of becoming subjects to both kings, and adhering, either as their humours or their interests led them, to which they pleased. This was considered as a great hardship, since, by making their option, these vassals were sure to lose their estates either in one country or the other. To redress this, as far as it could be redressed, Lewis indemnified those, who adhered to him, out of the lands of those who chose to do homage to the king of England<sup>l</sup>. Pope Innocent IV. being driven out of Italy, was desirous of putting himself under the protection of France, which the king declined, as foreseeing many inconveniencies that would attend it, but permitted him to hold a council at Lyons, which was not then united to the crown, in which the emperor Frede- d rick was excommunicated. The king soon after fell sick of a grievous distemper, in which he remained, for the space of twenty-four hours, so totally insensible, that many believed him dead; and, upon his coming to himself, he immediately took the cross from the hands of the bishop of Paris, making at the same time a solemn vow to go in person with an army against the infidels, which threw the nation into almost as great perplexity as that from which they recovered on the first news of his being out of danger<sup>m</sup>. The wisest and ablest of his ministers laboured all that was in their power to dissuade him from this resolution; but their efforts were to no purpose, though he readily agreed to do nothing precipitately, but to take all the precautions possible to prevent this expedition from being so prejudicial to his dominions as those of his predecessors had been.

IT appears from the common consent of the historians of those times, that the king judged it necessary to have the concurrence of the nobility before he undertook this expedition; and as the obtaining this was no very easy matter, considering their general reluctance, and the little hope there was of success abroad, or of tranquillity at home, if he went unattended by the most powerful of his vassals, he was obliged to act with the utmost caution; and, from the address he shewed in the management of his affairs, we may very safely pronounce, that never was so imprudent a design so prudently conducted. He had an interview with the pope, in hopes of reconciling him to the emperor Frederick, but without effect. However, though he missed of doing another's business in this journey, he executed his own, by procuring Beatrix, the youngest daughter of the count of Provence, to whom, in prejudice of his other daughters, and particularly the queen of France, her father had bequeathed his dominions f for his brother Charles<sup>n</sup>. The secrecy and art with which this business was managed, though so many great princes, and particularly the king of England, married to another daughter of the count's, employed all their skill and interest to prevent it, did him great credit. He was no less successful in levying a tenth of their revenues upon his clergy, by the authority of the pope; but when the pontiff would have extracted another sum for carrying on his war against the emperor, Lewis interfered, which the clergy took so kindly, that, though at first they had murmured against the tax for the crusade, they now applauded it<sup>o</sup>. - a methods he practised, and the earnestness he shewed, in exhorting the nobility to follow his example, had by degrees a great effect, more especially after he had prevailed upon the count of March, and the old count of Bretagne, the two most turbulent men in France, to assume the cross<sup>p</sup>. His greatest difficulty was about the king of England; for having, according to the custom of those times, upon all such occasions, made open proclamation, that if there was any person he had wronged, he was ready to do them right, and to make restitution to all who had a right to claim it; Henry sent over his brother earl Richard, who very boldly and plainly told the king, that he ought to restore to his brother Normandy, and the rest of the countries of which he had been despoiled, in case he hoped for success against the infidels<sup>q</sup>. The king had so far regard to his application, that he submitted this as a case of conscience A. D. 1241.
- b to the bishops of Normandy, and, upon their declaring he was not bound to make restitution, he declined it. Henry consented, nevertheless, to the renewing the truce; and the king, having declared the queen-mother regent in his absence, disposed every thing for his departure<sup>r</sup>.

THE king carried with him in this expedition his queen, and his two brothers Robert and Charles. At Lyons he received the benediction of the pope, and passing down the Rhone, he embarked at Aigues Mortes on the 23d of August, and, having fair winds and a fine passage, landed his forces on the 25th of September following in the isle of Cyprus<sup>s</sup>. There it was resolved to winter, which it was thought he might conveniently do, as he had taken the precaution of causing vast magazines to be previously constructed for the use of his army: but, notwithstanding this, they must have suffered considerably, if the emperor and the Venetians had not taken care to furnish them with vast supplies. It was resolved, during his stay in this island, that a descent should be made into Egypt, experience having shown that Jerusalem and the Holy Land, when conquered, could never be kept, while Egypt remained in the hands of the infidels. Here also he received ambassadors from Armenia, and from the Khan of the Tartars; the latter assuring him that he would find full employment for the Soltân of Bagdat, and the former promising to do the same with respect to the Soltân of Iconium<sup>t</sup>. In the spring, having received a considerable reinforcement under the command of Robert duke of Burgundy, he disposed every thing for his second embarkation. It was, however, about the middle of May, before his fleet, which consisted of eighteen hundred sail, parted from Cyprus; but meeting with a tempest in their passage, it is said he had not a third, some affirm not a fourth, part of his forces at the time of his landing. This, however, produced no ill consequence; for though the enemy had twenty thousand men well posted to hinder his debarkation, yet they were struck with such a panic at the sight of his troops leaping on shore, that, after one discharge of their arrows, they retired in the utmost confusion, and, which was still more extraordinary, abandoned the city of Damieta, a place rich, of great extent, and extremely well fortified<sup>u</sup>. A piece of good fortune they did not expect.

- THE first success seemed to promise great things, with which, however, the following events did by no means correspond. They took possession of this place in the beginning of the month of June, and the rising of the waters of the Nile rendering it impossible to proceed to Cairo, they were obliged to stay several months where they were. Lewis considering the importance of Damieta, preserved with great care the magazines and military stores that were found therein, which displeased the bulk of his army exceedingly, who asserted, that according to the custom of the crosses, he had a right only to a third part of the plunder<sup>v</sup>. They shewed from this time but little regard for his orders; for, composed as they were of different nations, being many of them persons of high quality, and all volunteers, discipline could arise only from a sense of duty. Instead, therefore, of providing for the next campaign, they thought of nothing but feasts, shows, and debauchery. When the season for action returned, after rejecting an offer made them by the Soltân of restoring Jerusalem, and all the places the Christians had once possessed, and resolving to listen to no propositions whatever, they marched, as to a certain victory, against the infidels<sup>w</sup>. A canal of the Nile lay in their passage; they were equally unprovided with boats or bridges; this put them upon attempting to run a causeway, with infinite labour, across it, and with little success; at length they found by chance a ford, which the count de Artois, the king's brother, passed with two thousand horse, but, instead of intrenching on the other side, after dissipating a corps of the enemy, he pushed on to Massoura, and, finding the place open, began to plunder it. The infidels, perceiving that he was unsupported, barricadoed themselves in their houses, and from thence threw wild-fire, stones, boiling water, and whatever else came to hand, upon the assailants; the troops too, whom they had dispersed, rallied and invested the place, so that, surrounded by enemies on every side, the count de Artois, and the best part of his detachment, perished<sup>v</sup>. The rest of the Christian army, however, passed the canal, and with great courage, though in great disorder, attacked the enemy, and gained some advantages, but were at length obliged to post themselves in a strong camp, where they suffered exceedingly from the scarcity of provision, the scurvy, dysentery, and other diseases, being closely blocked up by the superior enemy. The king might have made his escape by sea, but he refused it, and resolved to share with his forces the danger of a retreat, which was undertaken when there was scarce a possibility of succeeding. In their march they were continually attacked by the infidels; and at length, on the 5th of April, being intirely broken, the king and his brother were taken prisoners, with the poor remains of their army<sup>z</sup>.

Lewis bears
this misfortune with great fortitude, notwith-

THE infidels made a most insolent and barbarous use of their victory, they used their prisoners cruelly, they took every method possible of shewing their abhorrence and contempt of the Christian religion, they insulted the king personally, they threatened him with fetters, and even with tortures; and it is very possible they had proceeded further, if the precaution he had taken of preserving the magazines and military stores in Damieta, repairing its fortifications, and leaving in it a strong garrison, for the security of the queen and other ladies, had not put it out of the power of the infidels to carry that place by assault<sup>a</sup>. When, therefore, they saw the war was not at an end, and apprehended the Christians might send another army into Egypt if they continued in possession of this fortress, they began to alter their measures. But to understand this matter clearly, we must of necessity observe, that, during the progress of this war, great alterations had happened amongst the Mamelukes, who were then in possession of Egypt<sup>b</sup>. Their Soltân, at the time Lewis landed, and made himself master of Damieta, was Al Malec Al Salehi, who died of a mortification in his thigh before the opening of the next campaign; his son and successor being at a distance, the army was commanded by Phachro'ddin Othman; but, before the last engagement, the young Soltân Al Malec Al Moaddbemi was come to the army, and his favourites having observed to him that he was a king only in name, and that the power was in the old Soltâna Shajro'l Dorra, and a few of the emirs who were in her confidence, they advised him to treat with the monarch of the Franks, that, by recovering Damieta, and putting an end to the war, he might establish his own power<sup>c</sup>.

Makes a treaty

dels, recovers

HE, yielding to their persuasions, entered into a negotiation with Lewis, and agreed, that he should surrender Damieta in consideration of his own liberty, and pay a million of pieces of gold for the ransom of the other prisoners; to which terms it was added, that there should be peace between the Christians and Mohammedans in Syria, as well as in Egypt, for ten years. This negotiation ended, and on the point of being carried into execution, Shajro'l Dorra and the principal emirs having intelligence of what was intended, engaged part of the army to revolt, and murdered the unfortunate Al Malec Al Moaddbemi under the very eyes of his royal prisoner, who, with those about him, was very near sharing the same fate<sup>d</sup>. However, when things were a little settled, these great lords, and Phares Aktai, whom they raised to the rank of Soltân, ratified the treaty, which was performed with great punctuality; for Lewis understanding that they were deceived in the tale of the money, and had received a considerable sum short, he was so far from availing himself of the fraud, that he caused it immediately to be made good<sup>e</sup>, though in order to do it he was obliged to borrow the money from the knights templars. This done, and Damieta being evacuated by his troops, the king, with his queen and his two brothers, and about six thousand men, which was esteemed about a sixth part of the forces he brought into Egypt, embarked on board the galleys of the Genoese, and were safely transported to the port of Acon in Syria<sup>f</sup>; all hopes of making any impression in Egypt being lost.

THE wisest persons who were about the king disapproved his conduct in going from Egypt into Syria, more especially when they found him bent upon remaining there, and applying himself with as much assiduity to the affairs of that country as if they had really been his own concerns; they remonstrated to him freely, that his own kingdom was the proper sphere of action for his great virtues; and that, while he was so active and diligent in composing quarrels, redressing grievances, rebuilding fortresses, and forming alliances, in Syria, France suffered severely from his absence, and the truce of England being on the point of determining, his subjects would be exposed to the hazard of a war at home, whilst he was exhausting their force and wealth for the benefit of others abroad<sup>g</sup>. To this the king opposed his duty as a Christian monarch, the honour of performing something worthy of his rank and dignity

- a in such an expedition, and the broken condition of the Christian principalities in those parts; to which he added, that the prudence of the queen-mother's conduct, and the courage of the barons, relieved him from all apprehensions as to the interruption of domestic quiet, or the consequence of an invasion from England. In this, however, he was a little too sanguine, for the news of his imprisonment had thrown his hereditary dominions into great confusion, and, together with other afflictions, had so wrought upon the health and spirits of queen Blanch, that little of her former conduct appeared in her administration<sup>b</sup>. She had suffered an apostate monk, who was afterwards suspected to act as a spy for the Soltân of Egypt, to preach a new kind of croisade for the deliverance of the king out of captivity, by which he assembled near one hundred thousand people of low rank, to whom he gave the appellation of shepherds.
- b It quickly appeared they might, with greater propriety, have been stiled wolves; for, instead of living as they did at first by alms, as soon as they grew strong enough to force them, they demanded contributions, which ended in a civil war, by which they were partly dispersed, and partly extirpated<sup>c</sup>. This, with the remorse of having executed two persons as spreaders of false news, who first reported the king was made prisoner in Egypt, affected the queen regent to such a degree, that it broke her heart. She took, a little before her death, the habit of a religious order, and was buried in a monastery of her own foundation, with all the demonstrations of profound sorrow and sincere esteem that the nobility, clergy, and people, could give. This melancholy event had a very untoward effect on the affairs of France, and obliged those, upon whom the administration devolved, to send the most pressing remonstrances to the king to return, without further delay, into his dominions, where his presence was absolutely necessary<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1252.

- THE king received the news of his mother's death with the most sensible regret: but his consort queen Margaret was very easily consoled, for the old queen had kept her so much under, that she was not displeased to be free from her restraint. Lewis, convinced by the reasons assigned in the remonstrance before-mentioned, determined to return; but he executed this resolution with great deliberation. He left all the places the Christians still held in Syria in a proper state of defence; he placed in them garrisons of his own troops, and distributed his money freely, by which he acquired very justly the title of the father of the Christians<sup>e</sup>. These precautions taken, he embarked at Acon on the 24th of April, with a squadron of fourteen sail. He took the island of Cyprus in his route, and was in great danger upon those coasts; arrived in his own dominions about the middle of July, and made his entry into Paris the beginning of the month of September. He still wore the cross on his upper garment, appeared grave or rather disconsolate, observed great regularity in his court, but affected in his dress and manners rather the plainness of a private man than the state of a great prince<sup>f</sup>. Thibaut II. king of Navarre, and count of Champagne and Brie, having demanded his daughter Isabel in marriage, he readily consented to it, after settling the dispute between him and the countess of Bretagne. Henry III. of England, being at this time in Gascony, was desirous of paying him a visit, and was received with great pomp at Paris, where Beatrix, countess dowager of Provence, had the singular felicity of embracing her four daughters, the queens of France and England, and the countesses of Anjou and Cornwall<sup>g</sup>. Henry entertained the king with great splendor at the temple, where he took up his lodgings, and where Lewis would have yielded him the place of honour, if he had not absolutely refused it; the king likewise entertained him very sumptuously, and, when he would have retired in the evening, told him he was master in his own house, and he was resolved to have him one night in his power<sup>h</sup>. He was so well pleased with Henry's frankness and condescension, that he could not help saying at supper, "I would willingly restore you Normandy, and all your dominions, but that" is a thing to which the twelve peers and barons of my kingdom will never consent." After a week's stay, Henry set out for Boulogne, and Lewis accompanied him the first day's journey. The truce was soon after renewed between the two crowns<sup>i</sup>.

Upon the death of queen Blanch, takes a resolution of returning into France.

- f THE king laboured with incessant diligence to correct abuses, to pacify disputes of every kind, and to promote peace throughout his kingdom; and, in order to this, he sometimes took very singular methods. As for instance; when the countess dowager of Provence, the queen's mother, and the count of Anjou, his own brother, consented to abide by his decision, in respect to certain castles which they both claimed, he decreed that the count should purchase them, and at the same time gave him the money<sup>j</sup>. He was no less desirous of terminating whatever disputes subsisted with his neighbours. With this view he concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and not long after with Henry III. of England, to whom he yielded the Limousin, Querci, Perigord, and some other places, in consideration that himself and his son prince Edward renounced, in the fullest manner, all their pretensions to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou. This compromise was equally satisfactory to the two kings, and disagreeable to both nations; the English thought their monarch had sacrificed his pretensions for a trifle, and the French looked upon that trifle as absolutely thrown away<sup>r</sup>. His eldest son and heir, prince Lewis, dying, the king concluded a match for prince Philip, who was now become the eldest, with the princess of Arragon, who had been intended for his brother, and by this alliance secured the peace of his dominions on that side.

pope.

THE reputation of this monarch for candour and justice was so great, that the barons of England, as well as Henry III. consented readily to make him the umpire of those differences which had produced a civil war. This some of the French writers, not without cause, represent as one of the most glorious transactions of his reign. The king accepted the reference, and heard both parties fairly and coolly: his decision was, that the proceedings of Oxford were so indecent towards a crowned head, that they ought to be considered as null and void; but he decreed, at the same time, that the king should strictly observe the great charter, and not violate, on any pretence, the liberties and immunities granted to his subjects<sup>s</sup>. This determination, fair enough in itself, was construed by both parties in their own sense. Henry, and those who continued firm to him, highly approved it, as restoring the king to his former state and dignity; but Simon, earl of Leicester, son of the famous count de Montfort, who had been general of the croisade against the Albigois, affirmed this decision was in their favour, since it confirmed the great charter, and obliged the king to perform its contents, which was all that was aimed at by the proceedings in the assembly at Oxford: and thus the good intentions of Lewis were frustrated, and this dispute once more referred to the sword<sup>t</sup>. In the affair of the pope's conferring the kingdom of the Two Sicilies upon his brother the count of Anjou, the king was rather passive; and, indeed, it was such a kind of grant as a prince, of so great probity as Lewis certainly was, could hardly approve. The pope had before offered it the king for one of his own children, which he absolutely refused, and the pontiff thereupon bestowed it on prince Edmund, son to the king of England; but the situation of things in that kingdom putting it out of the young prince's power to avail himself of this grant, the pope, who knew Charles of Anjou to be a proper instrument of his resentment, as having a high degree of fierce or rather brutal courage, transferred the title to him<sup>u</sup>. This title, such as it was, arose thus:

Charles passes
over into Italy, defeats Mainfroi and Conradine, by which he acquires the crown.

THE popes, perpetual enemies to the house of Suabia, had deprived the emperor Frederic II. of these kingdoms. Mainfroi, his bastard, had usurped them from his nephew Conradine, the sole heir of the house of Suabia, and paid little regard to the pretensions of the see of Rome, not only disclaiming all homage to the pope, but, in resentment of the provocations received from him, had made incursions into the papal territory. It was this that induced pope Urban to make a tender of the crown to the count of Anjou, and to use his utmost endeavours to remove the many obstacles that lay in the way of this prince's intended expedition; but before this could be done he died. His successor, Clement IV. prosecuted the same plan; and though he found Charles in circumstances very unequal to so arduous an undertaking, and both the king and queen of France very cold in promoting it, yet, by an assiduous application, and the practice of all the arts for which Rome has been ever famous, and particularly by proclaiming a croisade in favour of this new king of his creation, he put him at length in a condition to attack Mainfroi with a numerous force<sup>v</sup>. Charles seconded the views of the pope with all possible vigour, defeated his competitor in the plains of Beneventum, where he was slain upon the spot, quickly gained possession of both the kingdoms which the pope had given him, and shewed himself resolved to maintain them by the same violent methods by which they had been acquired. The young Conradine, seeing the usurper slain, endeavoured to vindicate his rights, and had quickly a very formidable army, composed partly of the friends to his family, but chiefly of the enemies to the French. However, the fortune and the experience of Charles prevailed; Conradine was beat in a decisive engagement, taken prisoner, and by a shameful act of cruelty put to death, by the sentence of those who stiled themselves a court of justice. In this manner Charles fixed himself on the throne of the Two Sicilies, and gave rise to what the French stile the first house of Anjou, for reasons that, in the course of this history, will appear<sup>w</sup>.

- a ALL this time Lewis was employed in settling the affairs of his kingdom and of his family, and was equally attentive to the general system of policy, by which his realm ought at all times to be governed, and the particular cases and events that fell out in his own time. He framed a code of laws, which bear the title of the establishment of St. Lewis: he reduced into order the policy of cities and great towns, which was in great confusion<sup>y</sup>: he contrived, or caused to be contrived, those rules and regulations, in respect to traders and artificers, which have subsisted ever since: he married his children, and assigned them suitable provisions for their subsistence, without prejudice to the crown: he purchased and united to his domain several lordships, the owners of which were the last heirs of their respective families<sup>z</sup>: he determined the claims that some of the nobility had upon the crown; and it is very remarkable, that neither he or they made any scruple of his being judge in his own cause; and it is no wonder, for, if the matter was but doubtful, he decided against himself, as in the case of Matthew de Trie, who claimed the county of Dammartin, as heir to Matilda, countess of Boulogne, in which he condemned himself to restore it, though it had been united to the crown: he compromised a dispute between the kings of England and Navarre, about the town of Bayonne; and, instead of availing himself of the troubles, he was continually interposing his good offices with all his neighbours; and tho' this proceeded, in some measure, from his disposition, yet he made it appear to be good policy, according to his maxim, that a reputation for probity and disinterestedness created an authority that was not to be overthrown<sup>a</sup>. It is certain that, by this means, he maintained his dominions in peace, reformed the disorders of the state, and brought the affairs of the kingdom into very good order. All this was with a view to a new croisade, which, after his brother was settled in Sicily, the king undertook; and his example was so powerful, that, besides his three sons, and his nephew the count of Artois, most of the great lords of his court embraced it. He embarked again at Aigues Mortes on the first of July, and, by the counsel of the king of Sicily, directed his course for Africa, and landing on the coast of Barbary, made himself master of Carthage, and prepared for the siege of Tunis, the king of which, who was a Mohammedan, had promised him to become a Christian, but did not keep his word<sup>b</sup>. There the plague infected his army, of which many persons of distinction and multitudes of private men died, and at length the king himself, on the twenty-fifth of August, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and in the forty-fourth of his reign: he spent the last hours of his life in dictating instructions to his son Philip, which are excellent in their kind<sup>c</sup> (I).

(I) The different qualities of Lewis IX. are such as were scarce ever united in one prince, which is the reason that authors, who have considered him in single, tho' in different, points of light, have given him inconsistent, and even opposite, characters (1). He was, without doubt, very obedient and submissive to the queen his mother, very familiar with his servants, and withal very devout, so as to spend a great part of every day in public or in private prayers. We find him from hence considered as a mild, harmless, superstitious prince, who had the obtaining the title of Saint in view, which he accomplished (2). But others again have thought him, with equal justice, a hero. His two foreign expeditions were certainly founded upon maxims of policy, as well as piety, however he might be mistaken. He shewed equal prudence and firmness in securing Damieta; his intrepidity in battle was, to the full, as conspicuous as his patience after his defeat. In short, his courage was of a very peculiar kind, without any tincture of fierceness, which shewed itself on every great and momentous occasion: in a word, he was ever at the command of his reason, but was never subservient to his passions (3). His abilities, as a politician, are apparent in his treaty with James, king of Arragon, on the marriage of his son Philip with the daughter of that prince, when he adjusted at once, in an amicable manner, the perplexed claim of both crowns, which had created frequent wars between their predecessors, and which, but for this treaty, must have had the like effect with respect to their successors. His probity was no less remarkable in his behaviour to Henry III. of England, to whom he restored much, and would have restored more, if his nobility had not restrained him (4). Those who treat him as a weak man, and a feeble prince, know not what they say. It is true that his neighbours stood in no fear of his ambition, but it was because they confided in his justice; and on many occasions he gave law to them, not in right of his power, but of that authority which he had acquired by his equity, which he never violated or betrayed, in the greatest or in the smallest instance (5). His zeal for religion, though it carried him into two croisades, did not render him the dupe of priests, or a slave to the popes; on the contrary, he constrained his clergy to discharge their duties, and he fixed on a solid basis the liberties of the Gallican church. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in the month of August 1297, and Lewis XIII. procured the day, dedicated to his honour, to be declared a general feast of the church (6). By his queen Margaret, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, he had eleven children, six sons and five daughters. Lewis, the eldest, died at the age of sixteen, and was interred at St. Denis; Philip, who succeeded his father in the throne; John, who died a child; John, surnamed Tristan, born at Damieta, when his father was a prisoner among the infidels, espoused Violante of Burgundy, countess of Nevers, died at the siege of Tunis; Peter, count of Alençon, who espoused Joanna, countess of Blois, who deceased in 1283; Robert, count of Clermont, who espoused Beatrice, heir-

Philip the Hardy / succeeds and brings back the remains of the army to France.

THE king of Sicily arrived with his fleet and army immediately after his brother's decease, which changed the face of affairs, and saved the remains of the French troops. Philip, who was in the twenty-sixth year of his age, immediately assumed the title and state of king, received the homage of the monarchs of Sicily and Navarre, for the fiefs they held in France, and, notwithstanding the ravages still made by the plague, kept the field against the Moors, and put so good a face on things, that he received in Afric the surname of the Hardy, which, from his subsequent conduct in Europe, he would hardly have attained<sup>d</sup>. However, in a little time he was confined to his bed by sickness; so that the command devolved on Charles and Thibaut, kings of Sicily and Navarre. They defeated the king of Tunis in two or three engagements, and afterwards prepared to besiege the place in earnest, though the king of Sicily had all along treated privately with the infidels; and at length, with king Philip's consent, concluded a treaty with them. The king's motive to this was the pressing instances made by the regents, Matthew abbot of St. Dennis, and Simon de Clermont count of Nesle, for his return. By the treaty the two kings were to have a large sum of money, under colour of paying the expences of the war; the king of Sicily was to have five years tribute, and the monarch of Tunis was to pay him a double tribute for fifteen years to come: there was also a clause that he should permit the Christian missionaries to preach in his dominions, and such of his subjects as they should convert to be baptized; but this was purely to save the honour of the croisade, and without any great hopes of its being performed<sup>e</sup>. The kings then embarked their army and proceeded to Sicily, but they carried the distemper with them, of which great numbers died after their arrival. The king, to console his melancholy, resolved to make a tour through Italy, took Rome in his way, and, after visiting most of the remarkable places, entered his own territories; having reposed himself some time at Lyons, he prosecuted his Journey to Paris, where he was received with great acclamations of joy, notwithstanding the sinister events of this last and most fatal of all the croisades; for therein the king lost his father, his brother, the count de Nevers; in Sicily his brother-in-law the king of Navarre; his own consort Isabel of Arragon, his sister the queen of Navarre, immediately after her return to Marseilles: his uncle the count, and his aunt the countess of Poitiers, in their passage through Italy<sup>f</sup>.

He compels the count de Foix to surrender at discretion, and thereby humbles his wafflers, who had given law to all his predecessors.

AFTER the celebration of his father's funeral at St. Denis, and the ceremony of his own coronation, at which the count of Artois carried the sword of Charlemagne, the king visited the frontiers on the side of Flanders, and proposed afterwards taking possession in person of the counties of Provence and Thoulouse, which were now united to the crown, without any thoughts of a military expedition. This, however, he was constrained to undertake against one of his vassals, which we find ourselves obliged to relate, not only as one of the most remarkable actions of his reign, but as it serves to mark the constitution of France at this time<sup>g</sup>. The law made by St. Lewis, for preventing private wars, was strictly executed within the royal domain; but the royal vassals held it as a great prerogative to decide their disputes like sovereigns by the sword. The count d'Armagnac had taken some offence at the lord of Casaubon, and, after the usual prelude of defiance, came with a great number of his friends to insult him in his castle; upon this the lord of Casaubon sallied out, beat the count of Armagnac, and killed his brother. The latter, highly irritated, and greatly allied, summoned all his relations, and amongst the rest the count of Foix, to his assistance: the lord of Casaubon, seeing the party very unequal, demanded the royal protection, surrendered all his places into the king's hands, yielded himself a prisoner, and submitted to make any satisfaction that the law should els of the house of Bourbon; his son Lewis de Clermont was created duke of Bourbon by Charles the Fair, with this remarkable cause in the preamble of his patent, "I hope that the descendents of the new duke, will contribute by their valour to support the dignity of the crown (7)." Of the daughters, the eldest, Blanch, died at three years old; Isabella, the second, espoused Thibaut, king of Navarre, and deceased without children; Blanch, born at Jaffa in Syria, became the wife of the royal infant Ferdinand de la Cerda, whose children were excluded from the throne of Castile by their uncle Don Sancho; Margaret, who espoused John duke of Brabant; Agnes, who was the consort of Robert II. duke of Burgundy, by whom, amongst other children, she had Margaret, who espoused Lewis Hutin, and was by him put to death; and Joan, who was the consort of Philip de Valois (8). Queen Margaret was one of the most beautiful, and, at the same time, one of the most virtuous and prudent princesses of her age; and though she had little share in the government, in the life time of her husband, yet the king of England and lord of Pons submitted a dispute to her decision; so did Otho, count of Burgundy, and Philip, count of Savoy; as also the emperor Rodolph, and the same count of Savoy. She died at Paris, December 20, 1285, at the age of seventy-six, and was buried in a convent of Cordeliers, which she erected, and in which she lived in retirement fifteen years (9).

award;

- a award; upon which the king assigned him the castle of Sompui, on his own domain, for the residence of himself, his family, and friends, till the cause could be heard<sup>b</sup>. The count de Foix, notwithstanding this, took the castle, and carried away prisoners all who were in it, except the lord of Casaubon, who made his escape. For this contempt the king summoned him thrice to appear, and on his slighting those citations marched with an army and invested the castle of Foix, which was looked upon as impregnable. In a short time, however, the king reduced the count and his garrison to extremities, who thereupon offered to capitulate. Philip would grant him no other terms than rendering this, the rest of his fortresses, and himself, at discretion, to which he was forced to submit. When he came with great humility to throw himself at the king's feet, he ordered him to be put in irons, and sent prisoner to Paris, but treated the countess and his family with great civility. After a year's confinement he sent for him to court, admonished him to respect the laws, and to live peaceably with his neighbours; then dismissed him to his own house, and restored him all his fortresses; which seasonable act of severity saved him any trouble of this kind during the rest of his reign<sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1273.

- THE death of Henry, king of Navarre, gave Philip an opportunity of aggrandizing his family, which he did not neglect. That prince left by his queen, the daughter of Robert, count of Artois, and the niece of St. Lewis, an only daughter, whom Philip took under his protection, with intent to marry her to his eldest son Philip, but, as they were related, a dispensation was necessary; and this was vehemently opposed by the kings of Castile and Aragon, at the court of Rome, who represented to the pope, that Sicily, being already in the hands of a French prince, it would be very unreasonable to put it in the power of the king of France to add Navarre also to his dominions, more especially as he pretended a claim to the crown of Castile<sup>k</sup>. On the other hand, Gregory X. to whom Philip had given the county of Venaissin (of which the see of Rome is still possessed), was very desirous to gratify the king; but that he might keep some measures with other princes, he granted the dispensation for his second son Lewis, which, though with some reluctance, Philip accepted, and sent the count of Artois with a French army into Navarre. After this provision for his younger son he thought fit to marry himself, and chose for his consort one of the most beautiful princesses of that age, Mary, the daughter of the duke of Brabant<sup>l</sup>. He celebrated his marriage with great magnificence, and, to the satisfaction which this gave him, he added another, which was receiving the homage of Edward, king of England, for the lands he held in France. This, however, was attended with a circumstance not altogether so agreeable. Lewis, his father, had engaged in his treaty with Henry III. that if the country of Aginois reverted to the crown, it should be yielded to him or his heirs; and as by the death of the count of Poitiers it was reverted, Edward put in his claim. The country was in itself of great importance, and more so from its situation; but the case was clear, and Philip caused the king to be put in possession of it<sup>m</sup>. An act of justice that secured him the friendship of a prince, who, in all respects, was the most capable of giving him disturbance.

- PHILIP, for which some historians reproach him, was a great lover of peace, and laboured all he could to preserve it; yet he was not an unconcerned spectator of what he took to be an injustice done to his nephews the infants de la Cerda, of which, having spoken largely in the history of Spain, it is unnecessary to dwell upon here<sup>n</sup>. On this account, while there was a kind of rupture between the kingdoms of France and Castile, in consequence of which an insurrection appeared in Navarre, an unlucky event in France filled the king and his subjects with great perplexity; Lewis, his eldest son and heir apparent, died suddenly, at the age of twelve years, with circumstances that created a suspicion of poison<sup>o</sup>. One Peter de la Brosse, who had been about the person of St. Lewis, but in no higher character than that of a barber, had engrossed the favour of Philip, who raised him to the post of high chamberlain, made him his first and almost sole minister, and suffered him to fill all employments, ecclesiastical and civil, with his creatures and relations. This man, perceiving that the king had an extreme tenderness for his young wife, took umbrage at it, and either raised or encouraged a rumour, that she had procured his son's death. As this made Philip exceedingly uneasy, la Brosse put it into his head to consult a certain nun who pretended to revelations. The king sent the abbot of St. Denis, and the bishop of Evreux, who was the brother of la Brosse's wife. This prelate got first to the nun, and drew from her what he pleased in confession, so that when the abbot came she would say nothing. The king, disappointed and displeased at the bishop's report, sent other persons in whom he could confide to the nun, who then answered clearly that the king ought to despise what was told him to the prejudice of his consort, because it was false<sup>p</sup>. This laid the foundation of la Brosse's ruin, who, being soon after charged with holding a private correspondence with the king of Castile, and betraying his master's secrets, was sent to prison, and his family disgraced, to the no small satisfaction of the nobility and the people. But, being afterwards condemned without an open trial, and the duke of Brabant her brother, and two or three other lords of her party, being eye witnesses of his execution, the popular tide turned, and la Brosse, who was before thought a criminal<sup>q</sup>, was now considered as a victim, to the resentment of the queen and her family, which gave the king great uneasiness, and was the prelude to those unfortunate events that embittered the remaining part of his life, and led him from one misfortune to another through the rest of his reign, though it cannot be said that he contributed, by any act of his own, to the bringing on of these disasters, which, as they belong in a great measure to other parts of our history, and must be there treated more at large, we shall mention but very succinctly here.

the subjects of Charles of Anjou, and the famous Sicilian Vespers.

A. D. 1282.

THE severity of the king of the Two Sicilies had not only rendered him, but his family, odious, to a great part of his subjects; and the insolence and debauchery of the French troops had excited an irreconcilable aversion to the whole nation. At the same time, the immeasurable ambition of Charles, who was actually preparing to attack the emperor Michael Paleologus, and was suspected to have an eye also to the German empire, raised a general distaste against him amongst all his neighbours<sup>r</sup>. Pope Nicholas III. was of this number, and had conceived worse impressions of him than any, which induced him, if he is not slandered by the French historians, to concur in, if not to contrive, the scheme for his destruction, though this did not operate till immediately after his decease. It began by the general massacre of the French troops in Sicily, on the evening of Easter-day, so famous to all posterity by the name of the Sicilian Vespers<sup>s</sup>. Don Pedro, king of Arragon, who had married the daughter of Mainfroi, supported the Sicilians, and openly claimed the kingdom in her right. In this situation Charles had no hopes but from France, where the nobility in general had a great affection for him, and very readily offered to furnish troops for his support, to which the king consented. Pope Martin, who had succeeded Nicholas, was also entirely in the interest of Charles, who might probably have recovered his kingdom, if he had not been amused by Don Pedro's challenging him to decide their disputes by a personal combat at Bordeaux, which Charles, who wanted not courage, but rather had too much, accepted; and Don Pedro, as we have shewn in its proper place, having very adroitly saved his honour and avoided the combat, prosecuted the war with all the advantage that this address gave him<sup>t</sup>. The pope, zealous for Charles, excommunicated the king of Arragon, and gave his dominions to which of his younger sons the king of France should please to name, who was to hold them as a vassal to the Roman see<sup>u</sup>. Philip, flattered by his proposal, declared his son Charles de Valois king of Arragon and Valentia, and count of Barcelona; and, at the same time, furnished his uncle Charles with a fleet and forces for the recovery of his dominions, and put himself at the head of a numerous army, with an intent to set his son, of the same name, upon the throne of Arragon. Projects splendid and specious, if they had been but practicable<sup>w</sup>.

CHARLES had left his son of the same name, and who, from an accident that befel him, was surnamed Charles the lame, in Sicily, with strict orders to act on the defensive, and to risk nothing till his arrival with the succours that he was embarking at Marseilles: but the young prince, provoked by the Arragonefe fleet, broke through his father's instructions, was defeated, and taken prisoner; which, though the king his father at first supported with constancy, yet the constraint he put upon his grief cost him dear, since he afterwards broke his heart<sup>x</sup>. The French army, under the command of king Philip, penetrated into Catalonia, and laid siege to Gironne, which made a gallant defence. Don Pedro being in the neighbourhood with a small army, and attacking a convoy that was going to the French camp, received a mortal wound. Gironne being surrendered, and the king having put a good garrison into it, he dismissed part of his fleet, which consisted of three hundred sail, being ships that he had hired from some of the Italian republics. Doria, who commanded the fleet of Arragon, who durst not attack the French fleet when whole, beat this detachment, and afterwards sunk and destroyed the remainder<sup>y</sup>, which was not a greater loss in itself, than fatal in its consequence, since having the greatest part of the provision, with which the army should have been supplied, on board, the troops were grievously distressed; and the king taking this reverse of fortune to heart fell sick, and died at Perpignan, about the middle of the month of September, in the forty-first year of his age, and in the sixteenth of his reign<sup>z</sup>, extremely a regretted by his army, and not less by his subjects in general; for though he loved money rather more than became a king, yet he was very tender in imposing taxes, and, when he did, levied them so mildly, and with such equality, that the people never expressed any impatience (K).

PHILIP IV. surnamed le Bel, or the Fair, from the beauty of his countenance and his majestic presence, was about seventeen at the time of his accession, and was crowned at Rheims on the 6th of January, together with his consort Joan, queen of Navarre in her own right, and by whom he became also possessed of the counties of Champagne and Brie<sup>a</sup>. He found things in a very perplexed state, his finances exhausted, his troops ruined, and the war still open with Castile and Arragon. He was willing to have composed his disputes with the former monarch, and a conference was fixed for that purpose; but the Castilian declined, and it ended only in an interview between their ministers. Edward I. king of England, demanded the country of Xaintonge, as belonging to him by the treaty concluded between Lewis IX. and Henry III. Philip caused that treaty to be examined, and finding the matter perfectly clear, directed the country to be restored; and terminated also in an amicable manner some other differences that had arisen between the two crowns, with which Edward was so well pleased, that he came to make the king a visit at Amiens, went with him to Paris, and there did homage for the dominions he held in France: after which the two kings parted as good friends as possible<sup>b</sup>. Edward after this interview went to Bourdeaux, where he held a parliament, and where, with great state, he received the ambassadors of Castile, Arragon, and Sicily; which gave Philip great pain, as he was at war with all these crowns, and therefore suspected that some negotiation to his prejudice was on the carpet. But in this he was absolutely mistaken; for Edward, who was a wise and generous prince, had nothing farther in view than to facilitate a general peace, and to procure the liberty of Charles the Lamb, for whom he had a great affection<sup>c</sup>. He at length concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and though the terms were hard, Charles would gladly have accepted them; but, upon laying it before pope Honorius for his approbation, he declared it null, and pressed king Philip to carry on the war against the crown of Arragon, with an offer of taxing his clergy for the support of it. This pope dying, he was succeeded by Nicholas the fourth, who had somewhat more moderation; and king Edward, renewing his solicitations to the king of Arragon, prevailed upon him to set Charles at liberty, upon giving hostages for the performance of the terms stipulated, and a ransom of fifty thousand livres, twenty thousand of which

(K) Philip III. surnamed the Hardy, was the first who granted letters of nobility, which he did in favour of Ralph the Goldsmith, in which he did no more than restore the ancient constitution of the Franks; who, being all of one blood, were esteemed equally noble, and alike capable of the highest offices. The notion of a particular and distinct noblesse arose towards the close of the second race, when many of the officers of the crown had usurped, and converted into an hereditary dignity, the offices and jurisdictions which they received from royal favour (1). In the reign of this prince a great change was made with regard to the succession to the domains of younger sons to the crown; for upon the decease of Alonzo, count of Poitiers, his succession was claimed by Charles, king of Sicily, as heir by descent, and by Philip, king of France, as reverting to the crown, in whose favour it was determined by the parliament at the term of All-Saints, 1283, the record of which still remains (2). This prince, by his first wife Donna Isabella, daughter to the king of Arragon, who died January 23, 1271, had four sons; Lewis, who deceased five years after his mother; Philip, who succeeded his father Charles count of Valois; Alençon, who was the founder of the royal house of Valois, and Robert, who died young (3). By Mary his second queen, the daughter of Henry, and the sister of John, dukes of Brabant, he had one son and two daughters; Lewis count d'Evreux, the founder of the house of Navarre; Margaret, who espoused, at Canterbury, September 10, 1299, Edward I. king of England; and Blanch, who first married John de Namur, count of Hainault, son to Guy, earl of Flanders, and afterwards Rodolph, eldest son of the emperor Albert of Austria, in 1300, and, with her only son, poisoned about five years after (4). As for queen Mary of Brabant, who survived Philip, she was in great danger of suffering death upon the poisoning of prince Lewis, of which she was positively accused; but her brother procured her a stout champion, by whom the accuser being worsted, was, pursuant to the notions of those times, hanged without mercy (5). This princess was a great lover of poetry, and is said to have written some things herself. She died in the year 1321, having out-lived her husband thirty-six years, and was buried in the church of the Cordeliers, to whom she had been a bountiful benefactress (6); but her heart was deposited in that of the Jacobins; those convents, says a modern historian, dividing the relics of this princess after her decease, as while living they had shared her favours. On this occasion it will be proper to remark, that as there was a necessity for embalming the corpse of St. Lewis, which gave occasion to the interring his entrails in one place and his body in another, so the clergy took this opportunity of establishing this as a custom; and as these marks of esteem were never given without some foundation for prayers on behalf of the deceased, subsequent monarchs were obliged to make two, one in favour of the convents where the heart was deposited, and the other on behalf of that where the corpse was interred (7).

Edward agreed to pay <sup>d</sup>. Charles being at liberty, and perceiving some hopes of retrieving <sup>a</sup> his affairs, pressed king Philip to carry on the war in behalf of his brother Charles of Valois, instead of engaging him to persuade that prince to lay aside the title of Arragon, to which he was bound both by the treaty and his oath. However, these military operations not having answered his desire, the king of England insisted on the performance of those articles, in respect to which he was bound. Charles found it his interest to press this point at the court of France; and, perceiving it could be no other way obtained, gave his eldest daughter in marriage to Charles of Valois, and with her the counties of Anjou and Maine, in compensation for his claim upon Arragon; a claim no better founded than in a bull, granted by a passionate pope, for giving away the dominions of a prince who would not submit to be governed by him <sup>e</sup>. The quarrel with Castile had been some time before adjusted, at the expence of the infants de la Cerda, whom king Philip, finding it inconsistent with his interest to sustain, was content to abandon. Charles of Sicily also having quarrelled with the count of Artois, that prince returned with most of the French troops that had served under him in Italy; so that peace on all sides was now in some measure established, to the great satisfaction of king Philip, though things did not long remain in this state <sup>f</sup>.

He quarrels with Edward
I. of England, and resolves all proposals of accommodation.

THE two kings Philip and Edward, who had hitherto lived on the best terms imaginable, and whose right correspondence was of so great consequence to their respective countries, were of a sudden involved in a war, as if it had been by accident, though at the bottom, upon comparing the best historians, it appears, that the haughtiness and ambition of Philip was its real source, through the unfortunate circumstances for him of having to do with the firmest and ablest monarch of that age <sup>g</sup>. The immediate cause of this war was a quarrel between a Gascon and a Norman sailor; the latter had attempted to stab the former, who escaping the blow, by his agility, the Norman fell upon his own weapon. The crew of their respective ships immediately took part in the quarrel, and fought it out at sea. Soon after a fleet of Norman vessels engaged an English fleet in the same cause, without the interposition of authority on either side. At length, the Normans making prize of English ships, Edward commanded reprisals, and then the matter began to grow serious. Philip sent ambassadors to London, who demanded satisfaction in very high and very coarse terms. Edward gave them good words, and promised an answer by ambassadors of his own, who were sent back with them <sup>h</sup>. These ambassadors acquainted king Philip, that, hostilities having been reciprocally committed by the subjects of the two crowns, the dispute was to be considered as between the English and French nations; which, however, Edward was very desirous should be amicably determined. As a farther proof of this, he sent over his brother prince Edmund to expostulate the matter with Philip; to shew him the impropriety of pretending to summon him as a vassal to the parliament, to abide the judgment of his peers; and at the same time to assure him, that, as he had formerly had strict justice done him by the king in France, he should, on a proper complaint, render the like justice to the subjects of France in England. Philip, mistaking condescension for submission, persisted in his own way, summoned Edward as a peer of France to his parliament; and, upon his refusal, declared all the estates he possessed in that kingdom forfeited for this act of felony. A proceeding which the French historians acknowledge to have been equally violent and unjust, and which they likewise own Edward bore with extraordinary patience <sup>i</sup>.

King Philip,
thro' a breach of faith, brings on a war with Edward king
of England.

THE appearance of war being strong, both monarchs began to enter into alliances, and to make suitable preparations; but the queen of France, and the queen mother, very desirous to prevent a rupture if possible, sent for Edmund earl of Lancaster, Edward's brother, back to the French court, and proposed to him, that, to satisfy king Philip, the king of England should order six fortresses in Guienne to be delivered up, and should permit him to name an officer to command in each of the great towns of that duchy, three only excepted; that upon this the summons should be recalled, the judgment of parliament reversed, and, a safe conduct being granted to king Edward, Philip and he should have an interview at Amiens, where all things might be finally adjusted; and that in the mean time the places yielded for saving the king's honour should again be given up <sup>k</sup>. This agreement, being reduced to writing, was transmitted to Edward, who readily consented to it, and sent over to his brother the necessary orders for the general, who commanded in Guienne, and for the governors of all the strong places in that country. But earl Edmund, before he made use of these orders, had the precaution to demand an explicit approbation of this agreement from the king's own mouth; who, in the presence of the queen of Navarre his consort, and of her mother queen

- a Blanch, the duke of Burgundy, Hugh Vere son to the earl of Oxford, and John Lacy an ecclesiastic, promised, that he would abide by the convention entered into by the queens; upon which the earl of Lancaster dispatched the orders he had received into Guienne, and John de St. John, Edward's general, believing all differences between the two kings at an end, sold the ammunition and provisions out of his magazines, and the governors of the fortresses, pursuant to the orders they had received, opened their gates to the French. But, being once in possession, Philip disavowed the treaty made by the queens, and sent the constable of France, with an army, to secure what he had thus basely obtained<sup>1</sup>. It must be owned, that this is related by English writers; but by English writers of that age, well informed, and so consistent in their accounts, that the modern writers of French history very fairly admit their testimony<sup>m</sup>; and indeed a French writer of this age appears not to be unacquainted with the fact, by the effort he makes to turn the fraud upon king Edward; who, he says, gave up the places with a design to recover them by conquest, and to hold them afterwards in his own right, without homage to the crown of France<sup>n</sup>: which suggestion is plainly drawn from Edward's subsequent conduct, who, in resentment of the usage he had received, immediately declared war, and at the same time acquainted king Philip, that he looked upon himself as released, by this notorious breach of faith, from his former obligations; that therefore he renounced his homage, and would acknowledge himself no longer his vassal for any thing he held in France<sup>o</sup>.

- It is agreed by the historians of both nations, that the war thus begun was carried on with great vigour on both sides. John de St. John, who was sent back to his command, made himself master of the important town of Bayonne, and of several other places, while the French, who were not at all idle, made a great progress on their side. The count de Valois also entered Gascony with a numerous army. At the same time Matthieu de Montmorency, and John de Harcourt, with a powerful fleet, attempted a descent upon England, burned the town of Dover, and some villages on the coast: but the English, in return, landed on the coast of Normandy, and destroyed Cherburg, and the places adjacent<sup>p</sup>. The next year, Edmund earl of Lancaster commanded for his brother in Guienne, where he recovered several places, and would have done more if he had not been seized with a dangerous distemper, of which he died not long after at Bayonne. But what the king of England chiefly depended upon, was the alliance he had made with the emperor Adolphus of Nassau, the counts of Bretagne, Holland, Bar, Juliers, Gueldres, and Flanders<sup>q</sup>. Philip, who had treated the emperor very rudely, was obliged to repair that fault by an embassy, which perhaps would have produced no great effect, if it had not been accompanied with a round sum of money, which the pressing necessities of that great prince obliged him to accept. At the same time Philip sent as large a sum to Albert duke of Austria; who sharing this money with the lesser German princes, which Adolph had refused to do, they formed a design to raise him to the imperial throne; in which they succeeded, the emperor Adolph being killed in the dispute. By the same powerful argument Philip wrought upon the rest of Edward's allies, the count of Flanders only excepted, against whom he acted by force of arms, and had probably reduced him to great extremities, if king Edward had not come with a fleet and army to his relief<sup>r</sup>. Upon this Philip dexterously changed his conduct, and, by declaring for the commons in the several cities of Flanders, excited a revolt at Ghent, in which Edward was very near losing his life; and thereupon a negociation was set on foot, and a truce concluded, through the interposition of Charles king of Sicily, whose gratitude to Edward prompted him to act as a mediator upon this occasion. This truce was at first but for a few months; but, for their mutual conveniency, the two kings afterwards extended it to two years, and, as it was made in order to promote a peace, all points in difference between them were referred to the mediation of the pope<sup>s</sup>. By letters patents, dated in the month of September this year, the king, to replace the peerage of Champagne now in himself, erected Bretagne into a dukedom and peerage, in favour of John de Dreux, a prince of the blood, who had espoused Beatrix, sister to king Edward of England; of which we take notice, because it is the first instance of the kind in the French history<sup>t</sup>.

ONE of the most remarkable occurrences in his reign was the quarrel between Philip and Boniface the eighth, which began before this time, and which seemed to be accommodated by the two kings accepting him for the umpire of their differences. This pontif was certainly a man of parts, but even these were inferior to his pride; he had more learning than judgment, and, with much spirit and penetration, wanted sagacity and steadiness. He had indeed the appearance of both; for his policy, at the bottom, was but cunning, and the firmness, of which he made a shew, proceeded rather from the obstinacy of his temper than from a rational fortitude. The quality which particularly distinguished him was a supercilious haughtiness, which led him to imagine himself as much superior to other princes as they were to private men; and this was peculiarly offensive to Philip, from the strong tincture he had of the same kind of weakness himself<sup>a</sup>. The first thing which gave offence to Philip, was his forbidding the clergy in general to grant any aids or subsidies to princes, without leave first obtained from the holy see, under pain of excommunication. Philip encountered this by an edict, forbidding any of his clergy to send any money abroad without his leave. The pope next attempted to force a croisade upon the loss of Ptolemais, or Acon, the last place which the Christians held in the east; to which Philip would not consent. But what was most provoking, was the manner in which he interposed between the two kings, directing them, in the most peremptory manner, to make peace, and to submit their disputes to the decision of his tribunal. This was equally resented in France and England, which, when the pope found, he gave so soft a turn to the swelling terms of his proposals, that the two kings, finding it for their interests, consented that he should act as umpire; upon which, taking the truce for the basis, the project he dictated was this; that Guienne should be restored to king Edward, and that he should do homage as in times past; that the places in dispute should be sequestered in his hands; that the ships and effects taken should, as far as possible, be restored, and such farther satisfaction made as the pope should hold reasonable; that king Edward should marry the princess Margaret, the king's sister; and that his son Edward should espouse Isabella king Philip's daughter<sup>b</sup>. But many things yet remaining unsettled, the truce was prolonged, and the quarrel between Boniface and Philip reviving, excluded the pope from having any thing farther to do with their affairs; and having, at length, accommodated all differences by a definitive treaty, Philip received the homage of Edward on the 20th of May, at Paris; where they also concluded a defensive alliance against all such as should disturb, impeach, or trouble, the said kings in their franchises, liberties, privileges, or customs, in their respective realms; which was understood to be a league against the pope<sup>c</sup>.

It is impossible for us to enter into the detail of the revived quarrel between the king and the pope, the history of which actually makes a considerable volume. It is sufficient for our purpose to say, that Boniface was in general the aggressor: he had erected the abbey of Pamiers into a bishoprick, without the consent or approbation of the king, in favour of Bernard Sayseti, who was very obnoxious to him. On the other hand the king granted his protection to the Colonna's, whom the pope persecuted with implacable malice, and who, for very plausible reasons, refused to acknowledge him for pope<sup>d</sup>. To insult him farther, the pope issued bull after bull, assuming to himself a sovereignty over the king and his subjects; wrote him a letter, in which he told him he was a fool, if he made any doubt of this, or of his power to correct him, and call him to an account<sup>e</sup>. He named this very bishop of Pamiers his legate, who not only delivered arrogant messages from Boniface to the king, but took the liberty of speaking very disrespectfully to him and of him, and entered into intrigues of a treasonable nature; for which the king caused him to be arrested, and sent out of his dominions. Boniface, upon this, summoned the clergy and doctors of France to assist at a council he appointed at Rome, to enquire into Philip's conduct. The king encountered this by assembling the states, and not only drew from the clergy and nobility, but also from the magistrates and representatives of cities, a clear acknowledgement of his own sovereignty, a disavowal of the pope's authority, and an appeal to a general council, under a future pope, regularly elected, against the violent and illegal proceedings of Boniface, whose title was now drawn into dispute<sup>f</sup>.

THE pope notwithstanding proceeded to hold his council at Rome, at which a considerable number of the French clergy assisted; for which the king seized their temporalities at home. He had also recalled his brother Charles of Valois, who had been the pope's general, and on whom, in right of his second wife, the daughter of Baldwin emperor of Constantinople, he had bestowed that lofty title; but who, in quitting Italy had left numbers of those, who had served under him, very well affected to the French nation<sup>g</sup>. Philip, therefore, doubting what the consequence might be of these disputes, in case they should be longer protracted, and apprehending that Boniface would have recourse to the severest ecclesiastical censure, resolved to prevent him, and with this view sent William de Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna into Tuscany, with a large sum of money, giving out, that, since other measures had failed, he would try whether peace could not be purchased. These agents of his raised with great

- a secrecy a body of determined men, and with them suddenly invested Anagni, where the pope was born, and which was now the place of his residence<sup>c</sup>. The inhabitants, corrupted by money, joined with them, and seized on his person; when Sciarra not only insulted but struck him, and, if Nogaret had not interposed, would have killed him: but after some days the popular tide turned, and the inhabitants, having taken him out of their hands, sent him under a good escorte to Rome, where he died of a disease brought upon him by anxiety, and the ill usage he had met with. Such was the issue of this famous quarrel, which, instead of lessening the royal authority in France, or extending the papal power, established the former, and effectually circumscribed the latter<sup>d</sup>. This blow was struck very opportunely, for the pope had actually a bull by him, and which he intended to publish the next day, for excommunicating the king, and for releasing his subjects from their obedience<sup>e</sup>.

- b THE king, during the course of these events, was embarked in the war of Flanders, which he had determined to unite to the crown, and therefore would never suffer the count Guy de Dampier to be included in the peace with England. The Flemings were at this time excessively rich, their cities populous and well built, but at the same time they were divided amongst themselves, and there was a strong faction in favour of France. Philip flattered these, and sent his brother Charles of Valois to reduce their opponents. A divided people are incapable of making a vigorous defence. The count de Valois was a good officer, had a powerful army of well-disciplined troops, and good intelligence in most of the places he was to attack. With these advantages he soon brought things to such a pass, that the count found himself under the necessity of recurring to the king's mercy. Charles received the old man with humanity, promised, that neither he nor his sons should be confined, and that if, within the space of a year, he could not compromise matters with the king, they should be at liberty to return home, and take whatever measures they thought proper. After this Charles entered Paris in triumph, and the queen, who mortally hated the count of Flanders, pleased herself with looking upon him and his sons as they passed in the procession<sup>f</sup>. It had been well if her resentment had stopped there; but, in conjunction with the count of Artois, she engaged Philip to disavow the treaty which his brother had made, to send the count prisoner to Compiègne, and his two sons to different castles. The king and queen went afterwards into Flanders, not as conquerors but as sovereigns, and as such they were received, d with a profusion of expence, and a joy that bordered upon madness, which was excited by the pains they took to render themselves popular, by remitting some taxes, and by flattering the magistrates where-ever they came. At their return, John de Chatillon was appointed governor by the queen's interest, to whom he was nearly related<sup>g</sup>. He had courage and abilities, but he was proud and haughty; the magistrates made great court to him, and, in return, he supported their authority, even when they made an ill use of it. This produced murmurs, and these were followed with chastisements: the towns were most of them open, he repaired their fortifications, and in several places built citadels, to bridle their inhabitants; but, what is very wonderful, he forgot garrisons, which, indeed, were not in use in those days but in war. The people of Bruges, headed by a dyer, revolted; Ghent and other places e followed their example; but the French faction and the magistrates were still so powerful, that they were soon calmed, and the dyer and his associates banished<sup>h</sup>.

- f THERE the dispute might have ended; but Chatillon, who had now a body of troops about him, entered Bruges in triumph, and proposed, when he had posted them properly, to have employed the contents of a couple of hogsheds filled with ropes, in stifling what he called rebellion. The people, having notice of this, took their measures with such secrecy, that, recalling the dyer, they surprised the governor, and killed fifteen hundred out of seventeen hundred French horse, which he had brought to be spectators of the execution he intended. He himself hardly escaped, by swimming the town ditch in the night. Three sons of the count, who had retired to Namur, which belonged to their mother, quickly returned, and put themselves at the head of the people, and gradually recovered the best part of the country<sup>i</sup>. Philip found himself much embarrassed, but, having raised a numerous army, sent it under the command of the count of Artois to chastise the Flemings. The young princes were then besieging Courtray, and their army consisted of near sixty thousand men, but they were new raised, and very ill armed. However, they fortified their camp, and continued the siege. The count of Artois, contrary to the opinion of the constable de Nesle, resolved to attack them in their intrenchments, though the strength of his army consisted in cavalry; the consequence was a total defeat, in which the count and the constable both fell, with about twenty thousand men<sup>k</sup>. This so irritated Philip, that, to raise a new army, he diminished his coin a third part, that is, he obliged his subjects to take a groat for six pence ; and, having assembled the whole force of France, threatened the Flemings with extirpation. The young princes provided the best they could for their defence ; but Edward king of England, who saw his old allies suffer with infinite concern, told his queen, as a great secret, that the pope had some partizans in the French army, who would take their opportunity to deliver the king to the Flemings. She, as he expected, gave notice of it to her brother, and Philip, under pretence that the season was too far advanced, retired without doing any thing. It may not be amiss to observe, that these two monarchs, Philip and Edward, understood each other's maxims perfectly well ; for as the latter had abandoned the Flemings, the former had left the Scots out of the treaty, so that they provided for their own interests, and gratified each other's resentments, at the expence of their allies <sup>1</sup>.

King Philip enters Flanders with the whole force of his dominions.

It was some consolation to Philip, that the fleet which he furnished to his ally the count of Hainault, who was also at war with the Flemings, gained a great naval victory ; but the reader must not imagine from hence, that, at this juncture, the French were powerful by sea, for this fleet was composed chiefly of the Genoese gallies, and their admiral was Rainald de Grimaldi, who took Guy, son to the count of Flanders, prisoner, and sent him to Paris. Philip, finding the war expensive, tedious, and hazardous, consented to a kind of truce, and, releasing the old count of Flanders, sent him to try what he could do with his subjects ; but upon an express condition, that, if he could not bring them to the king's terms, he should return ; which he did, and died soon after at Compiègne at the age of fourscore <sup>m</sup>. The king, having by this time recruited his army, marched with his brothers the counts of Valois and Evreux, the flower of the French nobility, and the whole force of the kingdom, against the Flemings, who had still three sons of their count at their head. Philip, who had served long in Sicily, having brought with him a small corps of Italians, was intrusted with the chief command, whom his brethren and the whole nation willingly obeyed <sup>n</sup>. He acted as long as it was possible on the defensive, but Philip at length penetrated into Flanders, eager to decide this long dispute by a decisive action, and came up with the Flemish army at Mons en Puelle <sup>o</sup>.

Gains a great victory, but thinks it prudent, notwithstanding, to conclude a peace.

THE young prince Philip, knowing the French force consisted in cavalry, that he had none to oppose them, and that they had the advantage of ground, fortified his camp with his carriages, determined to defend it to the last extremity. The French advancing on all sides to insult them, the Flemings issued out ; but were repulsed with great loss. After they retired to their camp, it was debated, whether they should retreat in the night ; but the people in general pressed their officers to attack, in their turn, the French camp ; which they resolved and executed immediately, with such spirit, that they penetrated, in a quarter of an hour, to the king's tent, where they found the tables covered for supper. Philip had but just time to escape, and, having happily found a horse, rallied some of his troops, and attacked the enemy. The greatest part of the French army, who fled at the beginning, hearing of the king's danger, and being encouraged by the great lords, returned to the charge, and, after an obstinate dispute, drove out the Flemings with prodigious slaughter <sup>p</sup>. After this the king invested Lisle, into which Philip of Flanders had thrown himself with what troops he could collect, and here the king expected the war would have ended, the place having capitulated, in case it was not relieved by the first of October ; but, when it was least expected, John de Namur appeared with an army of sixty thousand men, undisciplined indeed, but daring and desperate ; so that the king, by the advice of the duke of Brabant, and other great lords, consented to set Robert de Bethune, the eldest son of the count of Flanders, at liberty, to receive his homage for the country, to accept of eight hundred thousand livres for the expences of the war, and to have certain places delivered into his hands by way of security, till this sum should be paid <sup>q</sup>. At his return to Paris the king granted a rent of one hundred livres to the church of Notre Dame, and placed there an equestrian statue, which many, however, have asserted to belong to Philip de Valois ; but it appears from the breviary of Paris, that it referred to this battle, which was fought on the 18th of August <sup>r</sup>.

Benedict XI. absolves king Philip, dies and is succeeded by the archbishop of Bourdeaux, styled Clement V.

WE must now resume the transactions between this monarch and the see of Rome, which were interrupted, in order to give a more distinct account of the war of Flanders. After the death of Boniface, the cardinals speedily elected Nicholas Boccacini, who assumed thereupon the name of Benedict the eleventh <sup>s</sup>. He was a mild and good man, and, being desirous to use his power for the promoting of peace, revoked the excommunication which his predecessor had fulminated against Philip, and emitted six new bulls, by which, in a great measure, all things were put again into their former state. He also pardoned the Colonna's, and

- a shewed a strong disposition to reform that corruption, which had spread itself generally through the dominions of the church<sup>1</sup>. These proceedings, while they gained him the approbation of all virtuous and worthy men, excited the hatred of such as were of a different disposition; so that, before he had accomplished much, he was removed by poison<sup>2</sup>. In the conclave after his death, which subsisted several months, the Italian and the French factions were so nicely balanced, that there could have been no election, if the former had not proposed to name three eminent persons amongst the clergy on the other side of the mountains, out of which they might name one who was to be unanimously proclaimed pope. This expedient being accepted, they named three archbishops, all partizans of Boniface the eighth, and amongst these was Bertrand de Got, archbishop of Bourdeaux<sup>3</sup>. King Philip, being informed of this, and happening
- b to receive the news when he was in Poitou, sent to desire the archbishop would meet him, as if it was by chance, in a wood. There the king told him, he would certainly make him pope, if he would promise him an absolute pardon for all that had been done against Boniface, an authentic condemnation of the conduct and memory of that pontif, the restitution of the honours and estates of the Colonna's, the tenths of the clergy of France for five years, and another request which he would make to him at a proper time. Bertrand, without hesitation, accepted the king's proposition; and, being unanimously elected pope, took the name of Clement the fifth<sup>4</sup>.

- THE new pontif, to the great regret of the Italian cardinals, resolved to be crowned at Lyons; which was performed accordingly, with great ceremony, on the 14th of November. This pope is crowned at Lyons, and removes the papal residence from Rome to Avignon. A. D. 1305.
- c In returning from the church to his palace, the pope was on horseback with his triple crown on his head, and the king of France, his brothers, the counts de Valois and Eureux, and the duke of Bretagne, led the beast by turns. This procession, however, would not have claimed a place in our history, but for the accident which attended it; for a great number of spectators having taken post upon an old wall, it fell down at once, by which the pope had his tiara beat off, the king and the count de Valois were wounded, the duke de Bretagne, the pope's brother, and several other persons of distinction, were bruised to death<sup>5</sup>. Such was the introduction of the papal court into France; for this pontif and several of his successors, leaving Rome, fixed their seat at Avignon. Clement performed his promises tolerably well; he revoked, or softened, all the bulls that Boniface had issued; he granted the king the tenths of the
- d clergy, for the term required; he created several cardinals at his request; but for stigmatizing the memory of Boniface he took time, under pretence of examining witnesses: but, at length, it ended in a justification of his predecessor, in which the king acquiesced, as finding it unavoidable<sup>6</sup>. The king found it necessary to send his son Lewis into Navarre, where he took the title of king, as heir of his mother. He had the satisfaction also of seeing the marriage completed between his daughter Isabel and Edward the second, become lately king of England, with whom he had an interview at Bologne, where he did him homage for the duchy of Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu<sup>7</sup>. The death of the emperor Albert of Austria, who was assassinated by his nephew, afforded Philip an opportunity of disclosing to the pope his last demand, which he had so long kept secret, and which, if he had still retained in
- e his own breast, had infallibly taken effect; but the king having declared in council that his view was to set his brother Charles of Valois upon the imperial throne, he was advised to demand assistance of the pope in person, attended by his court and a good body of troops, which the king relished; but, while he was making the necessary preparations, Clement was informed of his intention, and wrote thereupon, in strong terms, to the electors, that they could not do any thing better for themselves, or the peace of Europe, than to chuse an emperor without delay, and named to them Henry of Luxemburg; so that, before the king arrived at Avignon, the election was over, and Clement delivered from the apprehensions of being distressed by a French king on the one side, and a French emperor on the other<sup>8</sup>. Philip, however, had better success in another project, which was that of re-uniting the city of Lyons to the realm of France, from which it had been formerly detached, to make a part of the kingdom of Arles, and was at this time a kind of principality, in the hands of its archbishop, who, partly by fair promises, but chiefly by the appearance of Lewis king of Navarre with an army at its gates, was constrained, under certain conditions, to render it to the crown. This was justly considered as a great acquisition, tho' the king still suffered the archbishop to stile himself count of Lyons<sup>9</sup>.

THE king had all this time a very troublesome affair upon his hands, of which the world knew not what to think in his own time, and with respect to which the sentiments of posterity have been, and perhaps ever will be, divided. This was the prosecution of the knights a templars, a military order that had been established for the protection of such as went in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and which had received its name from an house, or palace, given them by one of the kings of Jerusalem, near the temple. This order had subsisted near two hundred years, was spread through the dominions of all Christian princes, had vast possessions in land, was immensely rich, and was composed of men of the best families in every nation throughout Europe <sup>d</sup>. They were indeed, very much declined from that reputation in which they had formerly stood, were deeply tinged with the corruption of the age in which they lived; were extremely hated for their pride and luxury; and, amongst other vices, were particularly decried for drunkenness; infomuch, that to drink like a templar was become a proverb <sup>e</sup>. Two of this order being sentenced by the grand master to perpetual imprisonment, the one a Frenchman for heresy (which is very remarkable), the other an Italian, for a multitude of crimes, insinuated, that, if they might have life and liberty given them, they would discover certain secret practices of their order that were little suspected <sup>f</sup>. These men, being admitted as witnesses, deposed, amongst other horrible things, that, at their entrance into the order, every knight was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to go through several indecent and filthy ceremonies, and were, through their whole lives, indulged in the most horrid and abominable of all lusts <sup>g</sup>. The king had these informations before the pope's coronation, and had then several conferences with him on this subject, which induced the pope to command James de Molai, the grand master, and other great officers of the order, to repair into France, under pretence of concerting measures for a new croisade; where, with the rest of the c knights templars, to the number of one hundred and forty, they were arrested, by the command of king Philip, in one day, and committed to several prisons <sup>h</sup>.

That order suppressed in the council of Vienne, after numbers of the knights had been put to death.

At first the pope seemed to be in great doubt in this matter, and to proceed in it more briskly by degrees, through the evidence that was brought out in prosecutions before his inquisitor, joined with the king's commissaries, to whom the greatest part of the knights freely confessed all that had been laid to their charge, and gave a distinct and particular account of all their horrid practices, to which the first witnesses had deposed. But still a considerable number persisted firmly in denying every word of what had been advanced; asserting, that those, who had confessed, did it through fear of death, through force of torture, or through flattering promises of life and liberty <sup>i</sup>. Between fifty and threescore of these suffered death, d in a field near the convent of St. Anthony at Paris, and died with great steadiness and piety, professing their innocence to the last <sup>k</sup>. The Pope, to put an end to this and to other perplexed affairs, appointed a general council to be held at Vienne, in Dauphiny; where, on the 22d of May, in the presence of the king, the count de Valois his brother, Lewis king of Navarre, and the other two princes his sons, a bull for the condemnation and extinction of the order was published, and their estates, excepting in Castile, Arragon, Portugal, and Majorca, given to the knights of St. John at Jerusalem, otherwise knights of Rhodes, and now of Malta; but without hearing the knights in their own defence, tho' they demanded it with great earnestness, the grand master and other great officers being reserved to a future judgment <sup>l</sup>. In this council, the memory of pope Boniface the eighth was freed from all imputation of heresy, several doctors making long speeches in support of his innocence; and, after this was over, two Catalan knights entered, and threw down their gauntlets, offering to prove, at the launces point, against any of the king of France's subjects, the innocence of the deceased pope, in respect of the charges that had been brought against him, not only as to heresy, but as to impiety, atheism, and immorality; with which, tho' king Philip was by no means pleased, yet, things were so circumstanced, that he was obliged to seem contented <sup>m</sup>.

The grand master and chief officers burned, and the rest of the knights of the order dispersed.

JAMES DE MOLAI, grand master of the knights templars, and the three great officers of the order, finding they were not set at liberty, as they had been promised, after five years confinement, insisted upon being brought to a trial; and, upon their own confessions, which were very full and express, were condemned to suffer perpetual imprisonment, after making f open acknowledgement of their crimes before the people. In order to this, a scaffold was set up before the great porch of the Notre Dame, upon which the criminals were placed, in the presence of several cardinals and other persons of distinction, and of a prodigious multitude of people; where, their sentence and confessions being read, they desired leave to speak <sup>n</sup>. This being granted, James de Molai declared, with a loud voice, that all they had heard was absolutely false, that they had been threatened and seduced into those confessions, and that, tho' themselves and their brethren had frailties and failings as well as other men, yet, with respect to those impieties and impurities that had been charged upon them, they were absolutely innocent.

- a The king, being informed of this, was so enraged, that he ordered them all to be burnt in a slow fire behind the garden wall of his palace; where they suffered with great composure and constancy, which was the more extraordinary, because the grand master was of a very fickle disposition, had confessed and recanted several times, and shewed such a weakness of spirit as had rendered him very despicable<sup>o</sup>. It is reported, that, a little before he expired, he summoned the pope in forty days, and the king in four months, to answer at the divine tribunal for the murder of himself and his brethren. Of the original accusers it was remarked, that the Frenchman was assassinated as soon as he was released out of prison, and that the Italian, having committed a murder, was hanged for it not long after<sup>p</sup>. The order, however, was every-where suppressed in England by authority of parliament, but upon general suggestions,
- b and the knights were confined to certain convents, with handsome allowances, upon which they lived regularly, and without affording the least countenance to the imputation that had been cast upon their order<sup>q</sup>. In the Spanish kingdoms the templars suffered no injury in their persons, but their lands were appropriated to other religious orders, or to the defence of the countries, where they were situated, against the Moors. In short, it has been much doubted, whether the greatest crime of these knights was not their wealth and their possessions; and as it is said that the order possessed, at the time of its suppression, sixteen thousand lordships, this will appear the less incredible. The immense wealth found in their houses, which everywhere bore the name of temples, was also confiscated<sup>r</sup>.

- THERE happened some disputes between the king and his son-in-law Edward the second of England, which seem to have arisen chiefly from misunderstandings between their officers in frontier places; yet they might have produced a rupture, if both princes had not been equally unwilling to come to extremities. To prevent these, Edward, with his queen Isabel, repaired to Paris; and, having passed some time in the most agreeable manner, all things were amicably adjusted, and king Philip subscribed an act, by which all memory of their former differences, as well as the errors of their officers which had occasioned them, were abolished<sup>s</sup>. The old quarrel with Flanders was revived with great heat, the king insisting that the count had infringed the last treaty; whereas the count as positively asserted, that it had been broken by the king himself; who, upon the count's retiring privately from Paris, and his son's making his escape, after he was arrested, summoned him to abide the judgment of his peers; and he
- d not appearing in person, but by deputy, the king upon this, and other suggestions, procured a sentence, by which all his estates were declared confiscated; which, however, was esteemed hard, and to be rather severe than strict justice, tho' the king had extended the power, and raised the credit of his parliament higher than it had ever stood in the days of his predecessors<sup>t</sup> (L). But, whatever the sentiments of the world might be, Philip, recurring to his old object,

(L) It was to this stirring and active monarch Philip the Fair, that the French owe the fixing their parliament of Paris, which had before followed the person of the prince, and held its assemblies where he judged it most convenient. This is said to be in 1302, and was, without doubt, at the time, considered as a prudent and popular action. At the same time king Philip did this, he brought in more lawyers into that assembly, and appointed superiors, by the title of presidents, to see that every thing was done with decency and order. Those who had formerly officiated in this manner were stiled masters of the parliament, they were not fixed officers for life, but held their places by commission; neither did the parliament continue always sitting, but had stated times for their meeting, as appears by their judgments that are still extant. The principal view of Philip in these regulations, was to free himself from the trouble of legal decisions, without prejudice to his subjects; for hitherto the kings themselves had sat in this judicature; which he found inconvenient, more especially as the number of appeals continually increased. By this means the parliament came to be considered as a supreme court of judicature, which indeed it had always been; but it was, nevertheless, a council of state, an assembly of peers and of prelates, in which, and by the advice of which, the king regulated affairs of the greatest moment, and which most respected the welfare of the state. A great modern writer seems to think, that the dignity of this court was abased by the introduction of so many jurists, as he calls them; whereas an elder author, and one of at least equal authority, considers this as a great blessing to the state, as it preserved the monarchy entire, and hindered it from being cantoned into little principalities, as Germany and Italy had been. This monarch also erected the parliament of Thoulouse, apparently after the model of that of Paris, since he appointed six ecclesiastical and six lay counsellors. He settled the court of exchequer in Normandy upon a like plan, and appointed the great days or solemn assizes at Troyes, in Champagne. His difference with pope Boniface the eighth put him, by the advice of the Sieur de Marigni, upon calling what were afterwards stiled assemblies of the states, in which the nobility, the clergy, and the deputies of the cities, sat separately, and framed their respective letters to the cardinals at Rome, in which they asserted the independency of the crown, justified the king's measures, and appealed from the tribunal of the pope. Such as are extremely attached to the aristocratic form of government are offended also with this measure, as introducing, in their sentiments, an alteration in the Gallie constitution. Yet, if this matter be strictly considered, we shall find it was not an alteration, but a restitution, of the government, since, according to the original system of the Franks, every freeman was intitled to some share in the government, either virtually, or in person. On the other hand, the inhabitants object, which was re-uniting this great fief to his crown, pursued this sentence of the law with a military force, notwithstanding the interposition of the pope, who, by his legate cardinal Goffelin, laboured to the utmost of his power to heal this breach, and to prevent the destruction of the count, who was rather unhappy than undutiful. But after much altercation, and many propositions made and rejected on both sides, the king took a resolution, grounded upon an opinion that the conquest was easy, to leave all things to the decision of arms; and having assembled a numerous army, commanded by himself, his two brothers, and his three sons, he marched directly against the Flemings; but, upon new propositions from the count, who gave hostages for the performance of them, and surrendered also the fortress of Courtray into the king's hands, he consented to a new treaty; and having done nothing worth mentioning, except conferring the honour of knighthood on his three sons, and on Hugh duke of Burgundy, in the field, he returned to Paris<sup>a</sup>. The true reason of this retreat, which did him no great honour, was the want of money, and the small disposition shewn by his subjects to submit to the methods his ministers had contrived for raising it; a misfortune which he had never met with before, and which therefore made the greater impression on a prince of his high spirit<sup>b</sup>.

He takes these and some domestic misfortunes so much to heart, that it brings him to the grave.

THE truth of this matter was, that, finding themselves in a manner exhausted, and remembering the distresses that had been brought upon them by the last Flemish war, there suddenly appeared a strange spirit of disaffection through all his dominions; so that the nobility, the clergy, and cities, in several provinces, entered into confederacies, to prevent the ministers from carrying their measures for levying money into execution; which, when it could be no longer concealed from the king, affected him exceedingly<sup>c</sup>. To this was added a new circumstance of domestic chagrin, that penetrated still deeper. He had taken great care in marrying the three princes his sons, all handsome and accomplished youths, in a manner suitable to their birth, and great suspicions arose of the infidelity of all their wives; upon a strict examination into this matter, Margaret queen of Navarre, daughter to the duke of Burgundy, and Blanch, the wife of Charles count of la March, appeared to be guilty, and to have lived for some time in a scandalous commerce with Philip and Walter de Launai, men of a noble family, but rather mean than comely in their persons; for which they were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and their gallants, after being flea'd alive, were drawn over a field, and then hung upon a gibbet, with an usher of the chamber, who had been privy to their amours<sup>d</sup>. The vexation of this shameful affair, added to his former disappointments, threw the king into a wasting consumption, in which the skill of his physicians could do nothing; so that he expired on the 29th of November, in the 30th year of his reign, and in the 47th of his age<sup>e</sup>. He was certainly, to give his character in few words, a prince of great talents, great virtues, and great vices, of which the most flagrant were avarice and cruelty; the consequences of which were severely felt in his dominions long after his decease.

A. D. 1314.

LEWIS, surnamed Hutin, which signifies the Boisterous, or the Quarrelsome, because something of this kind appeared in his temper while a child, succeeded at twenty-three, or, as other writers say, at twenty-five years of age, being already king of Navarre. He continued to use the same seal as in his father's life-time, and put off his coronation, under pretence of making the same ceremony serve for himself and his new queen, whose name was Clemence, the daughter of Charles king of Hungary, his first queen Margaret being strangled, by his order, for the crime of adultery, in her prison of Chateau-Gaillard<sup>a</sup>. There were, however, other reasons for this delay; such as the want of money, the treasury being in a manner empty at his father's decease; and the discontents that reigned in several provinces of the kingdom, which he thought it necessary to compose, to prevent any disturbance at that solemnity; which he effected by the interposition of his uncle Charles de Valois, and the king's promises, that the nobility should be restored to the privileges they enjoyed in the reign of St. Lewis. These obstacles being removed, he was crowned at Rheims, by Robert de Courtenai, of cities and towns, being no longer vassals, but contributing both in men and money to the service of the state, it was but reasonable that they should have a measure of power annexed to their property. To speak impartially, however, there is little reason to suppose, that Philip was induced by this motive to act as he did. The state of his affairs dictated to him this step. It was of great consequence to him, to let the court of Rome see how much all his subjects were attached to his government, and that ecclesiastical censures were not likely to operate as they had formerly done in France. But, after all, when he had served himself by this method, his subjects availed themselves of it in their turn, and began to pursue their own views, and to take care of their own interests in these assemblies, capitulating with the king, that they would give him such and such subsidies in case he redressed such and such grievances, more especially the great point of the money, which he had repeatedly debased.

a archbishop of that city <sup>b</sup>. The count de Valois, though the king was of age, had such an ascendancy over him, that, in effect, he governed in his name; which was the easier for him to do, as he had a great share in the administration during that of his father, though perhaps it had been better for both kings if they had confided in him less, his hasty and passionate disposition being the principal cause of those disasters that happened both to his brother and his nephew <sup>c</sup>.

WHERE a king is in want of money, his government cannot long be either steady or peaceable. Lewis was surprised to find himself so much distressed; he demanded the reason of it in his council, and his uncle charged it upon Enguerand le Poitier de Marigni, a nobleman of Norman extraction, whom his father had raised to the title of count de Longueville, to the post of chamberlain, and, in effect, to that of prime minister, by giving him the direction of the finances: he was a man of great abilities, but as warm in his temper as the count de Valois, and unable to bear this usage after the great services he had done the state; for it was chiefly through his management, that Philip the Fair had triumphed over pope Boniface, and obtained so much from the late pope Clement the fifth. In support, therefore, of his own conduct and character, he boldly answered, that so much of the king's treasure as had not been spent for his service, had been taken by the count de Valois himself <sup>d</sup>. The count upon this gave him the lye, which, with some vehemence, Marigni retorted; so that they were on the point of drawing their swords in the king's presence. The rest of the council interposing, the count de Valois satisfied himself with putting him in prison, and causing him to be prosecuted, exhibiting against him a multitude of charges, some of which were destitute of all foundation, others strongly exaggerated, and in some there might be truth <sup>e</sup>. He demanded time to make his defence, which was refused him; and the count had so great influence over his judges, that they pronounced him guilty in the gross of all that had been laid to his charge. But the king, though he might be well enough content to see the pride of Marigni humbled, more especially as it afforded satisfaction to his subjects, yet he by no means desired his destruction, as having a great opinion of his capacity, and much regard for his family; but the count de Valois was not to be pacified, his resentment had dictated the ruin of Marigni, and he resolved to accomplish it <sup>f</sup>.

THE next step taken, in order to deprive him of the king's favour and pity, was to cause his sister and wife to be arrested, together with the pretended magician, who by their command, as it was said, had made images of wax of the king and his uncle, in order to destroy them by enchantment. The magician hanged himself in prison, the women were convicted, and the king was prevailed upon to give way that Marigni should be executed <sup>g</sup>. He was accordingly hanged on the high gibbet at Montfaucon, set up by his own order, that the bodies of notorious offenders might be exposed to public view. He did not fall alone; several of the inferior officers in the finances were confined and put to the torture; his brother, the bishop of Beauvais, was forced to retire; and the bishop of Chalons, chancellor of France, was charged with being his accomplice, and with having poisoned his predecessor, but being brought to a public trial was acquitted <sup>h</sup>. All this was far from answering the end proposed; Marigni was considered by the people as the victim of the count de Valois's passion; and that they judged right, appeared afterwards, by the king's leaving a considerable sum of money to his children by will, and by the count de Valois giving largely to the poor to pray for Marigni and for himself, because he looked upon his being struck with a palsy to be a judgment from heaven, for his severity in persecuting this unfortunate gentleman: neither did the confiscation of his effects, and of those who were styled his accomplices, furnish supplies in any proportion to the king's wants, though, exclusive of what was diverted from the king's coffers, they were very considerable <sup>i</sup>.

THE coronation quickly exhausted these, the proposed war in Flanders required new aids, and, though Marigni was in his grave, yet the spirit he had introduced into the councils of France still prevailed. The ministers found means to compel the nobility to lend the king money under a variety of pretences; they levied a tenth upon the clergy; they sold their liberty to the king's bondsmen, and when they would no longer buy, they levied the money upon them by force, and declared them free whether they would or not <sup>k</sup>. By these, and other practices of a like nature, an army was raised, and the king's passion gratified, who desired above all things to chastise the Flemings; or rather the haughty temper of his uncle was indulged, who managed the king so absolutely, that he made his own humours appear to be his. The pretence of this war was the breach of his treaty with king Philip, by Robert de Bethune, count of Flanders; but Robert insisted that the French themselves had broke it, that he had paid immense sums to Enguerrand de Marigni, and that he had been imposed upon and deceived in many respects<sup>1</sup>. The true motive to the war was the entire conquest of Flanders, then in a very low condition, and the people harrassed by famine. Count Robert, very sensible that he could not oppose force by force, thought it excusable to have recourse to fraud. He negotiated with all apparent signs of submission; he consented to give hostages, and to deliver up the fortress of Courtray; but, at length the wet weather came, as he expected, and the French army, no longer able to keep the field, being obliged to retreat, he recovered Courtray by surprise<sup>m</sup>. King Lewis finding his coffers as empty as ever, fell into great perplexity, from which he was delivered by a sudden death, occasioned, as some say, by drinking imprudently a glass of water when he was very hot; but others think he was poisoned<sup>n</sup>, and Mezeray ascribes this to the accomplices of Marigni, assuring us, that, at this time, poison was but too frequent in France<sup>o</sup>. But, whatever was the cause, the king ended his days at Bois de Vincennes on the fifth of June, after a reign of one year eight months and six days, leaving his subjects in great perplexity, on the score of the queen's being with child, and his brother Philip at a distance (M); so that it was doubtful whom they were to obey.

Philip, count of Poitiers, is declared regent, in spite of the intrigues of the count de Valois.

CHARLES, count of Valois, unwilling to part with that authority which he had so long held, seized the Louvre, and made a strong party in order to obtain the regency, which he had the more time to do, because Philip, count of Poitou, being at Lyons, where a conclave was held for the election of a pope, could not be prevailed upon to move till he saw that matter in a fair way of being adjusted. On his arrival at Paris, near a month after his brother's decease, he found things in great confusion; but being supported by the constable the count d'Evreux, though brother to Charles de Valois, and the citizens of Paris, he compelled that ambitious prince to deliver up the Louvre, and to submit their pretensions to the decision of the court of peers, or, as it was then styled, the parliament, who decided, that the regency belonged of right to Philip, as first prince of the blood, to whom they granted that title and authority for eighteen years, and directed a great seal, which he was to use during that time, with this inscription, "Philip, son of the French king, governing the realms of France and Navarre <sup>p</sup>." By this judgment the government was settled for the present, and gave leisure for settling that of the succession. The crown of France, from the time of Hugh Capet, had gone in a lineal succession from father to son; in case therefore the queen was delivered of a prince there could be no dispute; but if she was brought to bed of a princess, or if her son should die, then came the doubt how the crown should descend, which was so much the greater, as there was no written law to which they could have recourse. Some were of opinion that the kingdom was a great fief, and that therefore the succession should be regulated as in other fiefs; and in that case the princess Joan, daughter to the deceased king, was clearly the heiress of the crown<sup>q</sup>. Charles, count de la Marche, the younger brother of the regent, Charles of Valois, and Lewis of Evreux, his uncles, Eudes duke of Burgundy, and the other princes of the blood, were of this opinion. But others alleged, that the bulk of the realm of France consisted of salique lands, and therefore ought to pass by the salique law, which, excluding females, the regent Philip, as next prince of the blood, was to inherit<sup>r</sup>. In this situation of things there was a treaty made at Vincennes, the 17th of June, by which it was stipulated, that, in case the queen was delivered of a princess, the heiress of Lewis Hutin should have the kingdom of Navarre, and the counties of Champagne and Brie, in conjunction with her younger sister (not yet born); that the prince Joan should be bred up at the court of

(M) This monarch, king of Navarre, in right of his mother, espoused, while very young, Margaret, daughter to Robert II. duke of Burgundy, by Agnes the youngest daughter of St. Lewis, who being convicted of adultery in 1313, was confined in Chateau Gaillard, and there strangled by her husband's command the year following; but whether before or after he became king of France, is not very clear, though the latter is most probable. Her corpse was interred in the convent of the Cordeliers at Vernon. By her he had only one daughter, Joan or Jane, heiress after his decease of the kingdom of Navarre, and of the counties of Champagne and Brie, educated at the court of her uncle Otho, duke of Burgundy, and under the eye of her grandmother. The second queen of Lewis Hutin was Clementia, the eldest daughter of Charles Martel, king of Hungary; she espoused the king in the month of August 1315, and became a widow in the beginning of

June following. She is said to have been so passionately fond of her husband, that her grief proved fatal to his posthumous son John, king of France and Navarre; and that, after having wept and deplored him for twelve years, she died inconsolable in 1328. Lewis had also a natural daughter, named Endelina, who became a nun. An ancient historian ascribes to him the fixing the court of parliament at Paris, which other authors ascribe to his father. The crime of poisoning was so common at this time in France, and indeed in other countries, that whenever a king died suddenly the people made no scruple of supposing that his end was hastened. In the present case it is not easy to discern who should have an interest in perpetrating such an act, since his demise, as things at that time stood, was equally fatal to his subjects and to the royal family.

a the duke of Burgundy, her uncle, and that neither of the princesses should be married, without the consent of the person at the time of governing the realm of France, and Philip still to have the regency of Navarre and Champagne, till such a marriage should be concluded and consummated. In the course of his regency he engaged in a war, in support of his wife's mother Matilda, countess of Artois, against count Robert, who claimed that country by descent<sup>a</sup>. This war he conducted with éclat and with success, obliged Robert to surrender himself prisoner, and to submit his pretensions to the decision of the parliament, who gave judgment in favour of the countess, and a fatal judgment it was<sup>b</sup>. The queen, who with difficulty escaped from a fever, into which grief for the king her husband had thrown her, was on the 15th of November delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of John, and who lived a week, or, as some say, three weeks, and was buried at St. Denis, being proclaimed king, as is generally said, in the funeral service; but there are deeds still preserved which bear date in his short reign, so that the modern historians are justified, who put him into the list of kings of France by the name of John I<sup>c</sup>.

PHILIP LE LONG, or Philip the Tall, having made use of the crown revenue to strengthen Philip V. his party, was declared king upon the death of his nephew: and, as soon as things could be adjusted for that purpose, he went to Rheims, in order to be crowned: the day fixed for that purpose was the ninth of January. The old duchess of Burgundy, the youngest daughter of St. Lewis, and grandmother to queen Joan of Navarre, protested by letter against this act, till the rights of that princess should be examined. The king's brother, Charles, repaired to Rheims, but left it the very morning of the coronation, which occasioned such a consternation, that the gates of the city were shut till the solemnity was over<sup>d</sup>. The new king, to prevent any disputes about his title, called a general assembly at Paris, in which his coronation was confirmed, and the nobility, prelates, and others who assisted there, took an oath of allegiance to him and to his son Lewis, who died in a few days after<sup>e</sup>. Philip did not stop there; he applied himself to pope John XXII. who wrote to the queen dowager, and to the counts Valois and de la Marche, exhorting them not to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and, at the same time, gave his instructions to the archbishop of Bourges to excommunicate them if they did<sup>f</sup>. In order to put a final end to these disputes, Philip gave his eldest daughter in marriage to the duke of Burgundy, and with her the county of the same name, of which her mother was heiress, and promised the queen of Navarre to the son of the count de Evreux, which had the effect he desired, and pacified all who had exerted themselves on the side of the queen of Navarre. As for the count de la March, since the death of the young prince Lewis, he had changed his sentiments, and highly approved the law that had been made to exclude females from the throne, because it opened him a passage to it<sup>g</sup>.

AFTER all this, the jealousies and grievances which had disturbed the last years of his father's reign were on the point of creating troubles in his. The nobility, clergy, and citizens, in several provinces, jealous of their respective privileges, began to enter into confederacies for the support of them, which might have been fatal to the public quiet, under a monarch less wise and less firm than Philip<sup>h</sup>. He immediately appointed commissaries to enquire into these grievances, and directed them to assure his people, that he would be as tender of giving them just occasion to take up arms, as he would be severe in punishing those who should take them up without cause. He observed that particular privileges were granted, on a supposition that they were not repugnant to the general welfare of the realm; and as he would oppress none himself, so he would not permit either lord, or bishop, or city, to oppress the meanest of his subjects: and, upon the report of these commissaries, having complied exactly with his promise, the people were so well satisfied, that, though their superiors found themselves hurt a little by the king's notions, yet they found an insurrection impracticable<sup>i</sup>.

f THE war with the Flemings had been suspended by a truce; and though the king was much inclined to put an end to it by a peace, yet this was not easily effected, notwithstanding he had the assistance of the pope's spiritual artillery, as well as the force of his own realm: but in the end the Flemings, being convinced of the rectitude of his intentions, compelled their count to put an end to a quarrel which had been alike burthensome to both nations<sup>j</sup>. He summoned Edward II. of England to render homage for the places he held in France; and though the excuse that prince made would scarce have been accepted by his predecessors, yet, partly out of regard to his sister whom that king had married, and partly from the consideration of his own circumstances, he received it with a good grace<sup>k</sup>. Philip was the source of the only object ever made to his conduct: he had taken the cross <sup>a</sup> with his father at the council of Vienne, and he was so strict an observer of his word, that he made it a point of religion to prepare for a new expedition into the Holy Land, and was, with great difficulty, dissuaded from carrying it into execution while he was regent. After he was king he remained so bent upon it, that he neglected no method of filling his coffers, and this gained him the reputation of being covetous, and of having nothing so much at heart as amassing money <sup>c</sup>. The steadiness of the king's disposition, however, would very probably have carried him through, if the pope had not interposed; for the politics of the court of Rome were now so much changed, and the situation of things in Italy rendered the protection of France so necessary to the pontif, that he wrote to Philip, in very pathetic terms, to desist from this enterprize for the present <sup>f</sup>; which, though it had its <sup>b</sup> effect, yet he continued to look upon himself as bound in conscience to accomplish his vow, and therefore never desisted from the means that he thought were most likely to put it in his power <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>Strange disorders in France, occasioned by a plague attributed to poisoning the waters.</sup> AMONGST other mischiefs this occasioned, there was one of a very extraordinary nature, and which was almost as prejudicial to his subjects as if the king had actually executed his design. The Mohammedan princes in Africa, considering the last croisade of St. Lewis, and being apprehensive that the king might revive the same scheme, and make the first descent in some other of their dominions, practised with the Jews, whom his grandfather had banished, and his brother readmitted into France, to poison the wells, fountains, and rivers, and offered them great sums if they would enter into their views <sup>h</sup>. The Jews were afraid <sup>c</sup> to embark into so dangerous a conspiracy; and yet being loth to lose the money, they practised on the lepers, of whom there were great numbers then in France, and who lived by themselves in hospitals, very richly endowed, and who had also many Jews amongst them, to undertake this villainy, which they did, and were so industrious in the performance of it, that a prodigious mortality ensued, insomuch that, if the king had persisted in his intention, he would have found it scarce possible to have raised an army. This conspiracy being detected, many of the lepers were burnt, and the people rising against the Jews committed most horrid disorders, under colour of executing justice; so that a greater or more universal calamity could not well have happened <sup>i</sup>. The king had been persuaded by the pope to send an army into Italy, against the family of Visconti, lords of Milan, who were at the head of the Gibel- <sup>d</sup> lines. This army was commanded by Philip, count of Mans, son to Charles, count of Valois; but Galeas de Visconti coming to meet him with a small retinue, giving him good words, and promising to submit all points in dispute to the judgment of the king of France, Philip returned with his forces, without doing any thing <sup>k</sup>; which, however it might injure his reputation, was certainly without any prejudice to his country. At his return, he found things in the confusion we have represented, the people every-where highly irritated against the Jews, and the Jews protesting that they were the victims of their impatience, on account of the nation's being afflicted with a plague, which they could neither help or remove <sup>l</sup>. This affair is very darkly represented by all, and in very different lights by some historians.

<sup>The king dies, and, though a prince of great merit, is very little regretted.</sup> THE last great action of Philip's life and reign, or at least the last great thing he attempted, <sup>e</sup> was to complete what his predecessors had begun, in reducing the money, the weights, and the measures, throughout all France, to some settled standard. In order to this, he sent commissaries through all the provinces to take an exact account of the state of things as they then stood; and having done this, he began to compound with some of the great lords, particularly the princes of the blood, for the rights of coinage within their own domains, and actually effected it with count de Valois, and the count of Clermont and Bourbon, but found it very difficult to succeed, notwithstanding he was at great pains to make it appear how much it was for the common benefit of his subjects, and that it was the only effectual remedy for some of those evils of which they had so much complained <sup>m</sup>. But a report prevailing, that he intended to raise a tax of the fifth part of every man's revenue, in order to pay such individuals as would not part with their privileges, it raised a general discontent. Philip, much affected by the misfortunes that had happened to his subjects during his reign, and not a little chagrined to find all his actions misinterpreted (more especially by the prelates, whom, from a point of conscience, he had excluded by law from sitting in parliament, because it hindered their residence in their diocese, and prevented them from discharging their pastoral duty <sup>n</sup>), fell sick of a fever, accompanied with a dysentery, of which having languished five months, he breathed his last on the third of January, at the entrance of the sixth year of his reign, and in the twenty-eighth of his age, not without great suspicion of poison, being hated by the <sup>f</sup>

a clergy, and little beloved by the nobility<sup>o</sup>. He is, however, by all the French historians, allowed to have been a wise, moderate, pious, just, and public-spirited prince<sup>p</sup>. It appeared after his decease, that he had been miserably cheated by those who had the direction of his finances: but it also appeared that he was very sincere in his designs, by his appropriating in his will the sums he had saved, for the very purposes for which he had declared they were intended. He was himself learned, and a great lover of learning, religious without bigotry, and so circumspect in ecclesiastical promotions, that those who were most assiduous in seeking them very rarely met with preferments<sup>q</sup> (N).

CHARLES IV. surnamed le Bel, or the Fair, succeeded his brother in the throne, when he was about the age of twenty-six, without any scruple or dispute, though contrary to that rule of succession which himself had espoused when his brother claimed the crown. The duke of Burgundy, who had married the eldest daughter of the deceased monarch, was the first to do him homage. But though he set up no pretensions to the crown, yet he claimed the county of Poitou upon this principle, that her father having no higher title at the time of his wife's birth, she was of consequence his heiress in respect to that county as well as Burgundy, which, or an equivalent, had been yielded to him; but the parliament finding that the county of Poitou was given by Philip le Bel only to his son and his heirs male, they declared the duke of Burgundy's pretensions groundless<sup>r</sup>. The next point was to get rid of his wife Blanch of Burgundy, who had been all this time prisoner in Chateau-Gaillard; and, in order to this, an application was made to the court of Rome, where the pope was so complaisant as to declare the marriage null, for two reasons; the first was, that the lady's mother, the countess Mathilda, had been godmother to the king, the other, that the lady Blanch herself was related to him in the fourth degree, for which, indeed, a dispensation had been obtained from the court of Rome, but this dispensation was now found not to be in proper form<sup>s</sup>. On such slight circumstances as these stood the marriages and successions even of princes. The king, being now at liberty, married the princess Mary, daughter to the emperor Henry of Luxemburgh, in hopes of male issue, and also with a view to facilitate his correspondence with the princes of Germany, for reasons that will quickly appear<sup>t</sup>. A. D. 1323.

THE peace which had so long subsisted between the crowns of France and England was interrupted by various accidents. Edward being summoned to do homage for the territories he possessed in France, made the same excuses he had formerly done, and might have made them with the same success; but the lord of Montpesat having built a castle on lands which were claimed by the crown of France, was dispossessed of it by that prince's order: however, by the assistance of the seneschal of Guienne, it was recovered, and the French, who were in possession, put to the sword, as the French writers say<sup>u</sup>. For this Edward was summoned to the parliament to answer before his peers; and, notwithstanding he sent his brother Edmund, earl of Kent, to prevent things from coming to extremity, yet the French army, under the command of Charles, count of Valois, entered the territories of Edward, and reduced the best part of them in a short time; so that to preserve Bourdeaux, and the few places that were left, he was forced to conclude a truce for a short time, under colour of giving his brother leisure to recollect himself, and to come over and render homage in person<sup>v</sup>. The truth seems to be, that this war, though carried on in France, was contrived in England, to

(N) This monarch was at great pains in regulating the chatelet, which is, properly speaking, the court belonging to the old peerage, and in which therefore the provost of Paris presided; and, at this time, there were signal acts of injustice committed in this court. For instance; one of the provosts, for a sum of money, suffered a rich man to escape, who was condemned to death, and executed a poor fellow in his stead, for which he was very deservedly hanged. The king also directed that the provost should render justice himself in open court, and that if he failed to do this he should lose his office. His queen was Jane or Joan, the daughter of Othelin, count of Burgundy, by the countess Mathilda, who, as we have shewn, enjoyed Artois in her own right. Joan was condemned with her sister, at the close of the reign of Philip the Fair, as guilty of adultery; but, after a year's imprisonment, the king took her again, being persuaded, or seeming to be persuaded, that she was innocent. He had by her Lewis, who died a child; Joan, who espoused Eudes duke of Burgundy, and was the heiress of the countess of Burgundy and Artois: but an accurate historian affirms, that, at her marriage, she brought her husband only one hundred thousand livres in ready money, and a rent-charge of twenty thousand livres per annum, in lieu of the county of Burgundy. We shall speak of her death hereafter. Margaret, who was the consort of Lewis, count of Flanders, to whom she brought a great succession; she survived to the age of seventy-two, and died with the reputation of a saint. Isabella, the third daughter, married Guigon, dauphin of Vienne, and, after his decease, John, baron of Faucogney in Franche-Compte; Blanche, who died a nun in the monastery of Long Champ, the 26th of April, 1358. The corpse of king Philip V. was interred in the abbey of St. Denis, his heart in the church of the convent of Cordeliers at Paris, and his entrails at the Jacobins. Queen Joan retired after his decease to a convent at Roie in Picardy, where she died January 31, 1329; and her body being afterwards removed to Paris, was interred in the convent of Cordeliers.

serve the purposes of the barons, who were then upon bad terms with the king, and the queen, who began to enter into their views, and looked upon a war with France as the only means of accomplishing them*. This was the last campaign of the great count de Valois, who being afflicted with a grievous distemper, the nature of which the physicians did not understand, and of consequence knew not how to cure, persuaded himself it was a judgment from Heaven, for the persecution of the sieur de Marigni, whose body he caused to be taken down, the judgment against him to be reversed, and his family restored in blood and to their estates. Proofs of a sincere repentance, which he did not long survive. Mezeray† would persuade us that he died of poison, and that he had no reason to trouble himself so much about the fate of Marigni, who met with no more than he deserved. Yet sure the count de Valois was a better judge than he; and how guilty soever the minister might be, he was notwithstanding unjustly condemned, being unheard‡.

EDWARD of England was much at a loss, as the queen and her faction foresaw, how to adjust his affairs in France, where his own presence was absolutely necessary; and yet to quit his kingdom was to lose it. In this situation the queen, who stood but ill with him and his ministers, offered to go over and negotiate a peace with her brother; and, notwithstanding the bad terms on which they stood with her, as having lately deprived her of all her French servants, they consented to this proposition; the bringing about of which seems to have been the whole secret of the quarrel, in which the kings had very little share on either side§. Upon her arrival at Paris she complained bitterly of the Spensers, and endeavoured rather to inflame her brother Charles against her husband, than to conciliate the disputes betwixt them; but Charles, who knew that the pope and other princes had their eye upon his conduct, remonstrated to her the impropriety of her behaviour, and that it was requisite to settle the peace before the king meddled in the matters of which she complained||. The peace was accordingly regulated; the seizure of Guienne was acknowledged to be just, because Edward had refused his homage; Charles was to name a seneschal, and to keep possession of his new conquest, but was to grant a safe-conduct for Edward to come over; and, upon his doing him homage, was to restore all he had taken. This brought Edward into the old difficulty of leaving his regal dominions, which he was unwilling to do; and to remove this obstacle, it was proposed he should resign the duchy of Guienne, and the rest of his lands in France, to his son prince Edward, whose homage in that case king Charles would receive. This was accepted by Edward, with a few restrictions; such as, that these countries should revert to him in case the prince died; that his uncle should not assign him a guardian; and that the young prince should not be induced to marry without his father's consent¶. The king thereupon sent him over, accompanied by the bishop of Exeter, and a suitable train; and all things being adjusted, the king expected his queen should have returned. His expectations, however, were in vain; many of the English malecontents repaired to her there, and she continued to instigate her brother against her husband; which the bishop of Exeter perceiving, and that the court were no strangers to her intrigue with Roger Mortimer, he left Paris, and secretly returned home, disclosing all he knew to king Edward, who thereupon demanded his queen and his son in high terms; and not prevailing, hostilities were again renewed, abundance of French ships taken at sea, and incursions made by land into the duchy of Aquitaine‡. The pope and the king of Castile interposing, and representing to Charles that his conduct was not at all suitable to his dignity, he forbade his subjects to frequent his sister's court; and at length ordered her and the prince her son to retire out of his dominions. At the same time, however, Robert de Artois, count of Beaumont (not without the privity of the king as is generally supposed), advised her to go into Hainault, where she concluded a marriage for her son with the daughter of that count, and engaged his brother to accompany her to England with a small force; and being, on her arrival, assisted by the malecontents, she quickly deposed her husband, and raised her son to the throne, whom Charles would never acknowledge so long as his father lived¶. A conduct which some have represented as pure artifice; but, the king's character considered, may be more probably ascribed to his justice.

Charles fails in his attempt to gain the German princes to elect him emperor.

BUT let us now return to the affairs of France. At the beginning of his reign, the king, in virtue of a decision of the parliament, had placed Lewis in the seat of his grandfather Robert de Bethune, as count of Flanders, Nevers, and Rhetel, notwithstanding the opposition of his uncle Robert, who pretended that, being one degree nearer his father than Lewis, he ought to succeed; and the Flemings giving him some disturbance, the king granted him such timely assistance as prevented their breaking out into open rebellion¶. He was not altogether

- a so successful in his attempt to supplant Lewis of Bavaria in the empire. The pope had quarrelled with this monarch, and supported Frederick, duke of Austria, who likewise stiled himself emperor, and whom Lewis had defeated, and then held in prison. The scheme of the pope was, that Charles should enter into a league with Leopold of Austria, Frederick's brother, to procure that prince his liberty: that, in consideration of this, Frederick, as soon as he was set free, should resign his pretensions to Charles, who, upon his being acknowledged emperor by the princes of Germany, was to pay Leopold a large sum of money<sup>s</sup>. Lewis of Bavaria spoiled the first part of this plan, by generously setting his rival at liberty, and allowing him to keep the title of emperor during his life. The pope, however, kept to his design; and Leopold of Austria, desirous of gaining the money that had been promised him, assured Charles, that, if he would but come to the frontiers, most of the princes of the empire would meet, receive, and elect him. The king went accordingly, with an equipage suitable to his rank, but found nobody except Leopold, who laboured to excuse this disappointment, and engaged the pope also to renew the treaty: but the king was so ashamed of what had happened, that he would not risk a second disgrace, notwithstanding he had this project once exceedingly at heart, from the ambition of restoring the diadem to France<sup>b</sup>.

- CHARLES fought in general to be well with his neighbours, and maintain those alliances which were most likely to turn to the advantage of the crown of France, in case of any dispute. It was with this view that he renewed his alliance with the king of Scots, in which he inserted an article, importing, that in case the throne of either kingdom should be vacant without an heir apparent, the states should declare who had the right: and this done, the other king should assist the heir, so declared, in person, and with all his force, against any opponents<sup>c</sup>. It seems the king was apprehensive of dying, as he did, without heirs male, though he had a son by his second queen, who died as soon as born, and his mother not long after, which might probably induce Charles to make this treaty. However, not long after, he espoused Joan, daughter to Lewis, count of Evreux, who was his cousin german, notwithstanding he had been divorced from a wife on the score of consanguinity, who was not so nearly related to him<sup>d</sup>. Edward II. of England being dead, he summoned his son Edward to do him homage for the duchy of Guienne, and the rest of his territories in France; but Edward excused himself for the present, by alleging the unsettled state of his affairs, and the unlucky consequences that might attend his passing the seas, which was accepted and the truce renewed, there being particular reasons why the king did not incline to excite any disputes with England, or indeed with any of his neighbours; and, amongst there, it was none of the least that his health began to decay<sup>e</sup>.

- HE shewed a great inclination to live upon good terms with the princes of the blood; and being desirous of having Clermont, which belonged to Lewis, the son of Robert, the younger son of St. Lewis, he gave him in exchange the county of la Marche, and some other places, and, by letters patent, erected his barony of Bourbon into a dukedom and peerage<sup>f</sup>, which was one of the last actions of his life; for his disease increasing, he died at Bois de Vincennes on the first of February, as he entered the seventh year of his reign, and the thirty-fourth of his life, leaving the third queen, as his brother Lewis Hutin had done, big with child<sup>g</sup>. Some historians speak of this king as a prince of a very moderate genius: it may be rather said of a moderate disposition, for he did not want either martial courage or steadiness of mind, which appeared clearly in his zeal for justice; for he called to an account the Lombards, and the other officers, who had been employed in the treasury, and had acquired immense fortunes by pillaging the people. One of them died under the torture, and the rest, being stripped of their ill-got wealth, were sent home as naked as they came into France<sup>h</sup>, which Mezeray commends as their proper punishment<sup>i</sup>. Charles shewed no less courage on another occasion: Jourdain de Lisle, a great lord of Aquitaine, relying on his wealth, his quality, and his being allied by marriage to pope John XXII. committed innumerable insults on the laws, inasmuch that he had eighteen charges against him for capital offences. This lord, being summoned to appear before the parliament at Paris, beat out the officer's brains with his own mace; notwithstanding which he had the imprudence to go thither in a short time after, of which the king having notice, he caused him to be arrested, and within a few days hanged, by an arret of parliament, without any respect to his birth, his wealth, or his alliance<sup>j</sup>. In this monarch ended the male line of Philip the Fair, who, though he left behind him three sons at men's estate, and consequently had the fairest hope of a numerous and lasting posterity, yet, in so short a space as fourteen years, they all deceased, and left the crown to pass into another branch of the royal family, which some, too boldly judging of the decrees of Providence, have considered as a judgment, for the severity exercised on the knights templars'. Charles, on his death-bed, being put in mind of the succession, contented himself with saying, that if his queen was delivered of a daughter, it belonged to the parliament to declare the next heir'. Remarks on the history of France, during this period of the third race.

THE descendents of Hugh Capet governed the kingdom of France, in a direct line from father to son, for eleven generations, without taking in the young king John, and including the two collateral reigns of Philip V. and Charles IV. There were thirteen monarchs in all<sup>a</sup>, whose reigns together made upwards of three hundred and forty years, during which space they wonderfully extended, as well their authority as their dominions; and had at this time recovered, either to the crown or to princes of the royal family, the better part of the antient kingdom of France<sup>b</sup>: they had also reduced the exorbitant power of the nobility within bounds, and were much less dependent than the monarchs of the second race upon the clergy<sup>w</sup>. Yet, after all, the nation was in low circumstances, the frame of government far from being uniform<sup>x</sup>; and, in short, the seeds of those disorders were very perceptible to prudent and thinking men<sup>y</sup>, which, in the succeeding reign, sprung up and became visible to the whole world in their dismal effects, and that bloody and consuming war which almost exhausted the strength of two potent nations<sup>z</sup>.

AS, on the death of Charles the Fair, France was without a king, and as the succession depended on the sex of a child unborn, there was a plain necessity of appointing a regent. The common histories speak of a great contest between Philip, count de Valois, and king Edward III. as to their respective rights of succession to the crown of France; and what they say is true in the main, but not clearly or distinctly expressed<sup>a</sup>. The dispute was, in reality, about the crown, but the claim was made only to the regency; for it was a point established, that this belonged only to the next heir; so that declaring the regent was, in effect, declaring the next heir. Philip alleged that he was the grandson of Philip the Hardy, the nephew of Philip the Fair, the cousin german of the deceased king, and his nearest heir male, descended from a male, which was not contested with him by any of the princes of the blood<sup>b</sup> (A). Edward, on the other hand claimed it as being the nephew of the last deceased

(A) In this note, that the subsequent narration may be as clear as possible, we will speak first of the princes of the blood, as they stood at this time, distinguished under various houses, that it may appear how the right of Philip de Valois was prior to theirs; next of the house of Valois, at the time of Philip's accession, that his alliances may be seen; and, lastly, of the great signories in France, which still remained, and had no more than a feudal dependence upon the crown. Of the princes of the blood, the first house was that of Evreux, founded by Lewis, the son of Philip the Hardy. His son Philip had espoused the princess Joan, daughter to Lewis Hutin, and in her right became king of Navarre. Title of his own to the crown he had clearly none; and whatever he might have had by his wife was taken away by the decision of parliament, supported by his own renunciation (1). The next was that of Bourbon, or of Clermont, more remote, as descending from Robert count de Clermont, son to St. Lewis. Peter, duke of Bourbon, was the head of this house, and brother-in-law to Philip de Valois (2). That of Artois, descended from Robert, another son of France, that is of Lewis VIII. and brother to St. Lewis, who, in his favour, erected Artois into a peerage. He was killed, as we have already shewn, in Egypt. His son Robert II. as we have likewise shewn, was killed at the battle of Courtray. His son Philip died of the wounds he received at the battle of Furnes. Robert III. the county of Artois being adjudged to his aunt Maud, was the head of the house, and in his favour Philip erected Beaumont le Roger into a peerage (3). Of the lines of Drux and Courtenai, the chief was John III. duke of Bretagne, descended from Robert IV. son of Lewis the Gros (4). And, lastly, that of Burgundy, descended from Robert III. son of king Robert, and the grandson of Hugh Capet, the head of which was Eudes, or Otho, IV. duke of Burgundy, grandson by the mother's side to St. Lewis, and whose sister, Joan, Philip de Valois had married (5). It is clear from this genealogy, that none of these princes a deceased king, and consequently nearer in blood than Philip, who was but his cousin<sup>c</sup>. He admitted the general principle that females could not inherit the crown of France, for this plain reason, that otherwise the crown must have belonged of right to the princess, of whom the queen might be brought to bed, or to the queen of Navarre, who was the daughter of Lewis Hutin; but, in admitting this, Edward only set aside his mother's right to establish his own; for though he acknowledged females incapable, yet he insisted that the males descending from females had a just claim<sup>d</sup>. The parliament of France thought otherwise, and decided in favour of Philip, count of Valois, who thereupon assumed the title and authority of regent during the queen's pregnancy<sup>e</sup>.

b ALL the persecutions in the former reigns having failed of producing any amendment in the administration of the finances, the regent thought it might contribute to his reputation, and bring some wealth into the treasury, if he called Peter Remy, lord of Montigny, who had for some time directed those affairs, to an account, which he accordingly did; and by a judgment of the parliament, in which there were present twenty-five barons and fifteen knights, the regent himself presiding, he was condemned to be hanged, and all his goods confiscated, which, if we believe the writers of those times, amounted to one million two hundred thousand livres, that is, about twenty millions of the present French money<sup>f</sup>. The States of Navarre understanding that the daughters of Philip the Long, and Edward III. of England, as the son of the queen's daughter, formed some pretensions to their crown, cut that dispute short, by proclaiming the daughter of Lewis Hutin, and sending a deputation to invite her and her husband, Philip, count of Evreux, to return into their dominions; which Philip permitted, after having engaged them to grant a kind of annuity of five thousand livres to the daughters of Philip the Long, and to accept of an equivalent for the counties of Champagne and Brie, which, in virtue of this composition, remained annexed to the crown<sup>g</sup>. On the first of April the queen dowager was delivered of a daughter; upon which Philip immediately assumed the name of king, notwithstanding Edward III. sent over ambassadors to claim his right, for which several eminent lawyers had declared<sup>h</sup>. On the 29th of May following he was crowned at Rheims, with much solemnity, and without the least opposition; at which we shall the less wonder, when we recollect that he was a prince in the flower of his age, whereas his competitor was a youth of about sixteen, under the tuition of his mother, and her paramour Mortimer<sup>i</sup>. On this account he received the surname of the Fortunate, though the Flemings, who hated him for his father's sake, styled him Philip Trouvé, that is, Philip the Foundling, or the come by chance King. It is said that Robert de Artois was very active in Philip's behalf, which is very probable, as he had married his sister; but certainly his services are overvalued by such could pretend to a prior right, and therefore their interest lay in supporting that of Philip de Valois; because this right of succession being once established, they might all, in their turns, avail themselves of the extinction of the males of the reigning house, which has been actually the case of the family now upon the throne, in whom are united the houses of Navarre and Bourbon (6). Let us next speak particularly of the house of Valois; Charles of France, third son of Philip the Hardy, count of Valois, Alençon, Chartres, and Perche. He espoused first Margaret of Anjou, and had by her two sons and four daughters. The eldest was Philip de Valois, the first of the French monarchs of his line; Charles, from whom sprung the house of Alençon; Joanna, who married William, count of Hainault, Holland, and Zealand; Isabella, who espoused John, duke of Bretagne; Margaret, who became the wife of Guy de Chatillon, count of Blois; Katherine, who died young. By his second wife Katherine, sole daughter and heiress of Philip de Courtenai, son of Baldwin II. emperor of Constantinople, and who was herself crowned empress by pope Boniface VIII. he had a son who died young, and three daughters; Katherine, who married Philip, prince of Tarentum; Joan, who espoused Robert de Artois, and Isabel, abbess of Fonteverault. By his third wife, Maud, the eldest daughter of Guy de St. Paul, he had a son and three daughters; Lewis, count of Chartres, who died young; Mary, the second wife of Charles, duke of Calabria, by whom she had the famous Joan, queen of Naples; Isabel, who espoused Peter, duke of Bourbon; Blanche, the first wife of the emperor Charles IV. (7). The great lords still remaining in France were not, in point either of number or power, any way comparable to what they had been in the times of his predecessors; but, notwithstanding this, they were still numerous enough to give him great disquiet, and the force of his kingdom was nothing comparable to what it is at present on the frontiers towards Spain; the counts of Foix and Armagnac were very powerful, and scarce subjects at all; Gascony was in the hands of the English, whose claims reached to all the countries as far as the Loire; Bretagne was an independent duchy; in effect the king of Navarre had considerable estates in Normandy; the constable of France had two considerable counties in Picardy; Flanders and Artois were in an unsettled condition; the duchy and county of Burgundy, tho' detached from the crown, were united to him from family connections; the territories next adjacent belonged to the dauphine of Vienne; the county of Provence, with half the city of Avignon, to the queen of Naples; the other half of that city, with the county of Venassin, to the pope; besides many other counties and baronies in the very center of the kingdom, and the claim of the house of Navarre to the counties of Champagne and Brie.

*Assists Lewis count of Flan-

ing the Flemings, whom he

AMONGST the great peers, who assisted at the ceremony of the coronation, was Lewis count of Flanders, who carried the sword of state, and whom his subjects had driven out of his dominions, chiefly on account of his attachment to France. Philip, therefore, thought himself obliged in justice and honour to restore him; and, having speedily assembled a very numerous army, marched directly into Flanders, accompanied by the king of Navarre, the duke of Burgundy, and the principal nobility of France <sup>l</sup>. The Flemings, tho' their army was inferior to that of the king, encamped on the side of a mountain, with the town of Cassel behind them, strongly entrenched, and a river in their front. Philip was inclined to have attacked them in their camp, but the best officers in his army dissuaded him; so that if the Flemings <sup>b</sup> had remained firm to their first resolution, and acted entirely on the defensive, the king, like some of his predecessors, had been obliged to retire, after wasting his treasure and his army <sup>m</sup>. But, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, they attacked the king's camp with such intrepidity and address, that they were very near becoming masters of his person. Philip, however, behaved with great courage; and, having given time for his troops to recollect themselves, he attacked the Flemings in their turn, who had now lost the benefit of their situation, with such spirit, that they were entirely defeated <sup>n</sup>. The loss of this battle was the loss of Flanders; for the king becoming master of Cassel, burning it to the ground, and threatening every place that made resistance with the same fate, carried all before him, restored the count, and left the Flemings humbled by his power, but without any relaxation of their hatred to his person <sup>o</sup>. At his <sup>c</sup> return to Paris, he summoned king Edward to do him homage, and, receiving no satisfactory answer, seized his revenues in France <sup>p</sup>. In regard to the services rendered by Robert de Artois in the war of Flanders, the king erected his county of Beaumont-le-Roger into a peerage; so that at this time he was considered as a favourite declared <sup>q</sup>.

Edward III.

king Philip at Amiens.*

THE next year Edward the third of England thought fit to pass the sea, and, having landed at Boulogne, came to Amiens with a numerous retinue; where he was very kindly received by Philip, who had with him the kings of Navarre, Bohemia, and Majorca. Great disputes arose about the nature of the homage which the king was to pay; that is, whether it was liege or simple; the former including services, and an oath of fealty, the latter being no more than an acknowledgement that the countries for which homage was done were fiefs dependent on the crown of France; besides Edward insisted, that satisfaction should be given for the lands that had been taken from the duchy of Guienne before he did homage. Philip, desirous of having this matter adjusted, consented that Edward should render him homage in general terms, and should take time to examine his own archives, and from thence determine which species of homage was due: and as to the dispute concerning the lands in Guienne he was to have his action before the parliament <sup>r</sup>. Upon these terms Edward did homage in the cathedral of Amiens, on the 6th of June, and returned very soon after to England <sup>s</sup>. Philip acted in this whole affair with great caution and prudence; he knew that the homage due to him was liege; but considering that the king must then have appeared bare-headed, without arms or spurs, and have taken his oath upon his knees, he was persuaded that the spirit of a young man would <sup>e</sup> not let him stoop to that, and therefore he condescended to this expedient, that he might receive the homage in any form, reserving to himself a right to have this afterwards explained in a manner more authentic, and which would answer his purpose better than the ceremony, if the king had condescended to have gone through the proper form; in which he succeeded, notwithstanding Edward had made a protestation before a notary at London, that, whatsoever he did, he did by compulsion, and through fear of losing his lands, and that therefore it should be no prejudice to his just rights <sup>t</sup>. The same year king Philip determined a dispute concerning ecclesiastical and lay jurisdictions, in favour of the clergy, who held themselves so much obliged thereby, that they set up his statue, and gave him the title of catholic <sup>u</sup>.

AFTER a reasonable delay, Philip sent the duke of Bourbon, accompanied by several great <sup>f</sup> lords and learned lawyers, to the court of England, in order to obtain the satisfaction that had been promised to him; and the affairs of king Edward being at that time exceedingly embarrassed, he found it requisite, after a previous examination of records, to grant letters patent, in the most clear and explicit terms, acknowledging the homage to be such as king Philip had demanded, and allowing the homage to be paid, tho' in general terms, to be understood and taken as such <sup>v</sup>. What particularly determined Edward to this measure was a new disturbance in the duchy of Guienne, the inhabitants of which, believing they should have been supported

- a from England, made some incursions into France; upon which king Philip sent his brother Charles duke of Alençon into that duchy, with an army, who took the town of Xainte and demolished the walls. Edward concluded from hence, that, if he refused the satisfaction desired, he should be stripped of all his dominions in France before he was in a capacity to defend them<sup>x</sup>. In the summer he came over into this kingdom, demanded restitution of what had been taken from him, and seemed disposed to live upon good terms with the king; which being all that Philip desired, he treated him with all possible respect, and gave him the satisfaction he demanded. Here the French writers seem to think the disputes between these princes had ended; for, though they did not love, they esteemed each other highly, and had great apprehensions of the reciprocal disturbances that each might create in the other's dominions, which made them willing to avoid a rupture, as being inconvenient to either in the present state of their affairs<sup>y</sup>. This disposition, however, was quickly altered, by means of a certain incendiary, whose private interest, or rather whose violent resentment, induced him to leave no means untried to inspire Edward with an implacable aversion against Philip; in which he succeeded, and involved the two nations in a war, the most fatal and bloody that almost any history records, and which more than once brought the kingdom of France to the very brink of destruction. So fatal are private passions to the welfare of the greatest states<sup>z</sup>. A. D. 1330.
- THIS incendiary was Robert de Artois, who being a prince of the blood of France, having married the king's sister, and having served him with great vigour and valour in the cabinet and in the field, thought his services could never be paid, and that Philip was bound to accomplish for him whatever he desired, in whatever manner, and by removing whatever obstacles lay in the way<sup>a</sup>. He began by presenting a memorial when king Edward was at Amiens, desiring leave to examine witnesses in regard to his just claim to the county of Artois, which was granted. He next demanded a revision of the judgment given by parliament in that cause, on a suggestion that he could exhibit new proofs, which were absolutely conclusive. He was indulged in this too, and the suit was reduced to the same state in which it stood before either of the two judgments were pronounced<sup>b</sup>. He then produced these evidences, which, upon inspection, were found to be forged; and the very woman, by whose contrivance this whole scene was carried on, being seized, confessed the facts, and made every thing as clear as possible. The king laboured as much as was in his power to prevail upon his brother-in-law to desist from these pretensions, and to have nothing farther to do with those whom he had engaged in these practices, which he promised, but did not perform; so that, at length, provoked by these and some more criminal practices, the king, after granting him various delays of justice, at length, in full parliament, pronounced an edict of banishment and confiscation of all his estates<sup>c</sup>. He retired upon this into the territories of the duke of Brabant, where he engaged in new intrigues; and Philip, having thereupon taken measures for humbling the duke of Brabant, and having caused his own sister, for the share she had in her husband's sinister contrivances, to be arrested, Robert de Artois withdrew, in the disguise of a merchant, with all the wealth he had amassed, into England, where he was kindly received by Edward, as well in regard to the services he was able to render him, as in resentment to the protection afforded by Philip to David king of Scots; who, though his own brother-in-law, Edward had dispossessed of his dominions<sup>d</sup>. Many of the French historians, and amongst these some of great note, have considered Philip's proceedings against Robert as flowing from a spirit of implacable persecution<sup>e</sup>; whereas others, by producing the original process, have vindicated the king's conduct, and shewn, that, if he had followed the advice of his parliament, in seizing the person of Robert, he might easily have prevented the mischiefs to which he was exposed, by suffering him to retire as he did, and to seek shelter amongst his enemies<sup>f</sup>. But with regard to Edward's creating him earl of Richmond, though affirmed by some good authors, it is certainly a mistake<sup>g</sup>. Sentence of the parliament against Robert d'Artois, who thereupon retires into England. 1331.
- PHILIP had lived upon exceeding good terms with pope John the twenty-second, who seemed to be very desirous of establishing a new croisade; in which, to shew his obedience, and at the same time to answer other purposes of his own, Philip shewed himself very zealous, and, with the kings of Arragon, Naples, and Bohemia, took the cross, though it has been very much doubted, whether he was at all in earnest in regard to this expedition<sup>h</sup>. He raised forces; he took the necessary measures for assembling a great fleet; and the doing this afforded a fair pretence for levying large sums upon the clergy and laity, at the same time that it gave a colour for negotiating on every side, and, which which was of more consequence than all the rest, gave occasion to the pope to interpose with the king of England, Philip and Edward both prepare for war, though secretly, and under various pretence.

and to protest, according to the doctrine of those times, against making any attempt on the dominions of a prince, who had taken a vow to employ his arms in defence of the gospel against the infidels<sup>1</sup>. On the other hand, Edward, though scarce of full age, managed his affairs with great temper and address; he had nothing so much at heart as maintaining what he took to be a good title to the crown of France, and at the same time there was nothing of which he was so much afraid as of the loss of the duchy of Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu, before he was in a condition to prosecute that title. The first thing he aimed at was subduing Scotland; yet, in order to this, he did not make war directly upon king David Bruce, but suffered such of his nobility as were inclined to assist Edward Baliol to invade Scotland; where, notwithstanding the assistance of a French fleet, they gained great advantages, and, under pretence of giving them a new king, reduced the whole kingdom to misery<sup>2</sup>. As soon as the four years truce was at an end, he marched into Scotland in person, and traversed it from south to north, penetrating at length as far as Caithness. Philip, to favour his allies, suffered some irruptions into Guienne, and at the same time made fresh complaints at Avignon to pope Benedict, who had succeeded John. Edward sent his ambassadors also to the pontif, offered to submit the differences between them to his decision, professed his inclination to go also into the Holy Land with Philip, and to leave all things in the situation they then stood till their return<sup>3</sup>. He sent his ambassadors likewise to the court of France; where they complained of the injuries done him, solicited redress in the most respectful terms, and assured Philip, that king Edward had nothing so much at heart as preserving the peace between the two nations. But at the same time he did this, he treated with the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, with the count of Holland and Zealand, with the count palatine of the Rhine, and other princes of Germany, and made no secret to them of his intention to attack France, not barely about the wrongs he had sustained in Guienne, but in support of his right to the crown of that realm, which Robert of Artois persuaded him was indubitable, and had so high an idea of his own abilities, that as he boasted he made Philip de Valois king by his address, so he now threatened to depose him for his ingratitude<sup>4</sup>. Language wild and passionate indeed, but expressive of that vindictive vigilance, by which he went very far towards bringing it to pass.

A. D. 1337.

The war breaks out, and Edward prevailed on to conclude a truce.

KING Philip being informed of these negotiations, and perceiving clearly that the pretence of taking the cross was no longer of any use, detached a squadron of his fleet against the infidels, and brought the rest, consisting chiefly of Genoese vessels, into the ocean; where they might be employed against the English<sup>5</sup>. He made alliances likewise with the princes on his frontiers, particularly the king of Navarre; and on the side of Germany he brought into his interest John of Luxemburgh, king of Bohemia, the dukes of Austria, and several great prelates and peers of the empire<sup>6</sup>. In a dispute of this nature it was of great consequence which side was taken by the Flemings. Their count Lewis declared without reserve for king Philip, but his subjects were much more inclined to Edward. James Artevelle, a brewer, the most able and the most artful man in that country, governed them as much as if he had been their prince, and the advantages derived from the English commerce determined him in favour of Edward; who, at his request, passed the sea with a great navy, and debarked a numerous army at Sluys<sup>7</sup>. In the first councils that were held, it was resolved to act offensively; but for this there wanted a pretence; the vassals of the empire could not act either by the orders, or even as allies of Edward, without direction from the emperor, and he was under a treaty with France. This difficulty, however, was soon overcome; the French had made themselves masters of Cambray, the emperor resolved it should be retaken, and, with a view to this, he created Edward vicar general of the empire, who besieged it without delay, though John duke of Normandy, king Philip's son, defended it with a numerous garrison. Yet, after a short time, Robert de Artois prevailed upon him to raise the siege, and march into Picardy<sup>8</sup>. Philip covered his country on that side like a captain of great experience, and declined coming to a battle, though some writers ascribe this conduct to Edward. However, the seat of the war was again transferred into the Low Countries, where Edward, with his forces, besieged Tournay; to the relief of which Philip marched with a numerous and well-appointed army, but acted with so much caution, that Edward found himself in a manner blocked up in his camp; and the countess dowager of Hainault, sister to Philip, mother-in-law to Edward, and sister-in-law to Robert de Artois, coming out of the convent to which she had retired, interposed with so much spirit and address, that she engaged all parties to agree to a truce for a year<sup>9</sup>; and might, perhaps, have brought about a peace if she had survived.

- a BUT while these things were transacted by land, there were also some great things performed by sea. The French fleet, or rather the fleet in the pay of France, took two ships of force, many trading vessels, committed great depredations on the coasts, burnt the town of Southampton, and attempted descents in several places; and, notwithstanding they were at length repulsed, did a great deal of mischief<sup>a</sup>. But king Edward, in his passage to Flanders, met with this fleet at sea, engaged and beat it after a very obstinate resistance. This was the first great maritime action that happened in the course of the war, and cost both parties very dear; the greatest part of king Philip's fleet was destroyed, and near twenty thousand men perished; on the other side, the English had about seven thousand men killed, and their fleet so roughly handled as to be able to perform nothing of consequence that year<sup>b</sup>. Philip, folb lowing the course of his predecessors, prosecuted Edward as a peer of France before the parliament, for receiving and supporting Robert de Artois, after he had been condemned for treason, and for this directed the duchy of Guienne and the county of Ponthieu to be seized; in pursuance of which many places were taken, till the war on all sides was suspended by the truce<sup>c</sup>. At the siege of Tournay, Edward first took the arms, and assumed publicly the title, of king of France, and this that he might engage the Flemings to act, who did homage to him as their monarch, that they might avoid the imputation of rebellion, and the forfeiture of two millions of florins which they stood bound to pay the pope upon their last treaty with Philip, in case they at any time revolted against the crown of France; which they conceived to be eluded by their owning Edward's title, and acting against Philip as the usurper c of that realm from the right heir<sup>d</sup>. Yet, upon the truce, they admitted the return of their count, who feasted Edward magnificently at Ghent, though he would not be persuaded to enter into his interest; which was the more honourable, as this would have reconciled him to his subjects effectually.

A. D. 1340.

- A NEW and unlooked-for incident revived the war, even before the conclusion of the truce, and spread its flames much wider than ever. Arthur the second duke of Bretagne, prince of the blood, and peer of France, had, by Mary daughter of the viscount de Limoges, three sons, John, Guy, and Peter. By his second wife Yoland, or Violante, daughter of Robert count of Dreux, and Beatrice countess of Montfort, which lady, at the time of her espousing the duke of Bretagne, was the widow of Alexander king of Scots, he had John de Montfort, d and five daughters<sup>e</sup>. The eldest and the youngest of his sons, of the first bed, lived and died without issue; but Guy count de Penthièvre left behind him an only daughter, who, from an accident that befel her while a child, was called Hopping Jane. Her uncle John the third duke of Bretagne would have regarded her as his heiress, having an implacable aversion to his mother-in-law and his brother John count de Montfort<sup>f</sup>. After contriving various methods to defeat him of his succession, the duke at last gave his niece in marriage to Charles de Chatillon, second son to the count de Blois, by the sister of king Philip, whom the French historians generally call Charles de Blois<sup>g</sup>; and to whom, in conjunction with, and in right of, his wife, duke John caused the states of Bretagne to swear homage, not doubting that, after his decease, the king would support his nephew's title, which was the principal motive e to the marriage. This duke dying in the month of April, John count de Montfort, in right of his mother, immediately seized his palace and treasures, which quickly enabled him to make himself master of all the strong places in the duchy<sup>h</sup>. As he knew the disposition of the king and court of France, he had very little hopes of remaining long quiet; and therefore, to secure himself a protection equal to that on which his competitor depended, he went over to England, and offered to do homage to king Edward, either as king of France, on whom it depended by the dew creation, or as king of England, since in quality of duke of Normandy, which he claimed independent of his right to the crown of France, Bretagne depended anciently on him, and was but a remote fief of the crown of France. Edward entertained him kindly, received his homage, promised him support, and sent him back to f Bretagne<sup>i</sup>. On the other hand, Philip caused him to be summoned to answer for his conduct before the high court of parliament, and probably granted him a safe conduct; for he went to Paris, made his excuses to the king, and remained there some time; but, suspecting a design to secure his person, he withdrew secretly, and retired into his own country. The parliament proceeded however, and at length declared the right of succession belonged to the countess de Penthièvre, and the king ordered his son John duke of Normandy to put that lady and her husband into possession of the duchy of Bretagne<sup>j</sup>. John de Montfort exclaimed against this sentence as unjust, and as given at the solicitation and out of complaisance to the king; in which there seems to be some foundation, since he was brother to the deceased

duke, and consequently nearer in blood than his niece, and heir male, and therefore to be preferred to a female; and it was not a little strange, that he, who was capable of taking the crown of France by descent, should have no title by the same descent to a fief of that crown<sup>d</sup>.

Robert d'Artois slain in the war with Charles de Blois in Bretagne.

THE war of Bretagne seemed to be determined almost as soon as it began; for the duke of Normandy entering that duchy with a numerous army, John de Montfort threw himself into Nantes, and made all the dispositions requisite for an obstinate defence; but the duke having corrupted one of his officers, the place was betrayed into his hands, together with the person of John de Montfort, who was sent prisoner to Paris, and confined there in the tower of the Louvre<sup>e</sup>. His wife, the daughter of the count of Flanders, retired into Hennebon, which was a place of great strength; and, having prevailed upon the garrison and inhabitants to risk all in her defence, and in that of her son, a child in the fifth year of his age, she spared no pains to encourage or to augment the party of her husband. His competitor Charles de Blois marched with a considerable force to besiege her in Hennebon; upon which she sent Amaure de Clifton into England to solicit succours from king Edward, and with him the young prince her son, that he might be safe. Charles, who looked on the reduction of the place as a certain prelude to the conquest of Bretagne, pushed the siege with all the warmth imaginable, and was on the very point of taking Hennebon and the duchess, when the English succours arrived, under the command of Walter de Mauny, an excellent officer; who, with a handful of troops, did all that could be expected from him; but had probably been oppressed by numbers, if the countess had not very artfully procured a truce, which gave her an opportunity of going over in person to England; where, the truce between the two crowns being expired, she procured a powerful succour, commanded by Robert de Artois, with whom she embarked on board a fleet of forty-five sail. In their passage, they met and attacked the French fleet, commanded by Lewis de la Cerda, whom the historians of those times call Lewis of Spain, but were separated by a storm<sup>f</sup>. On their arrival in Bretagne, the war revived with great spirit, in which, as in the fight at sea, the duchess acted in person. Robert de Artois made himself master of Vannes, which was soon after retaken by the French, and Robert de Artois, with much difficulty, made his escape. The wounds he received proving dangerous, he embarked for England; where he died about the middle of October, and was buried with great solemnity at Canterbury. A very fortunate event for king Philip, and which affected Edward so much, that he resolved to go over in person to Bretagne to revenge it; which he accordingly performed with a greater force than had been hitherto employed on that side<sup>g</sup>.

AN eagerness to perform something very extraordinary prevented him from doing at all what he thought to have done at once; for, perceiving there was no considerable army in the field to oppose him, he laid siege to Nantes, Rennes, Vannes, and Guignan, at the same time. The duke of Normandy, who knew those places were well provided, made no great haste to succour them, that the English army might be harrassed by the fatigue of those sieges, and that he might have time to augment his own<sup>h</sup>. At length, hearing that Edward had taken Guignan, he marched towards Rennes; and, the enemy having raised the siege, he proceeded to Nantes, the siege of which was likewise raised at his approach, and the whole of Edward's army assembled about Vannes; where the duke of Normandy, having some officers about him of great experience, and being guided by their counsel, formed a blockade at a great distance; and, though Edward took every method he could devise to provoke him, yet he continued still in the same situation, till, by the interposition of the new pope Clement the sixth, a truce was concluded, and Edward returned into England with less advantage than from any campaign he ever made<sup>i</sup>. By this treaty John de Montfort obtained his liberty, and, though he was forbid to leave Paris, yet he took the first fair opportunity of leaving it privately, and returning again to Bretagne. As for the conferences held at Avignon, in the presence of the pope, they were far from advancing the peace, but they had this good consequence, that the truce was prolonged for three years, and this for France and England, as well as Bretagne, Scotland, Guienne, and the Low Countries, the allies on both sides being included<sup>k</sup>.

King Philip, by an act of severity, affords Edward an opportunity to declare void the truce.

It seems to have been the view of Philip, in concluding the first truce, to make way, if possible, for a peace; for though hitherto his losses had not been great, yet he found that Edward had so many advantages, and was so capable of improving them, that the war exhausted his subjects so much, and had besides so many inconveniencies, that he would willingly have ended it; which he flattered himself, after the death of Robert de Artois, might have been practicable<sup>l</sup>. As soon as he was convinced it was not, he applied himself to strengthen the alliances he had already formed, and to make such acquisitions as might prove a beneficial to his family. He met with some success in the former, and more especially in the promise of naval assistance from Spain, and much greater in the latter, by his treaty with Humbert the second dauphin of Viennais, of which we shall have occasion to speak more largely hereafter, and by the purchase of the lordship of Montpellier from the unfortunate king of Majorca, of which we have already given an account in its proper place <sup>m</sup>. He might have done more in reference to both, if the war had not broke out sooner, and with greater violence than ever, by a breach of the truce, as some writers say, on the part of king Edward; but, in reality, from an inexcusable act of cruelty, flowing from that impetuosity of temper which was the great source of all Philip's misfortunes. He had concluded a marriage between his second son Philip duke of Orleans, and the princess Blanch, the daughter of his predecessor for Charles the Fair; and, to heighten the solemnity of the wedding, had appointed a tournament <sup>n</sup>. On the faith of the truce, Oliver de Clifton, who had served with reputation on the side of Charles le Blois, had been made prisoner by the English, and been exchanged for an English earl, came to Paris, with several other gentlemen of Bretagne, to share in these diversions. Soon after their arrival, the king caused Clifton and eleven more to be arrested, upon some suspicion that they held intelligence with John de Montfort, or with king Edward, and, without any form of law, caused them to be beheaded in prison. As the blood of the nobility had hitherto been sacred in France, this act of violence excited terror and jealousy amongst them, and struck all France with consternation <sup>o</sup>. When the news of it came to Edward, he was so incensed, that he was on the point of putting all the French prisoners in his hands to death; but Henry of Lancaster earl of Derby dissuaded him, by saying, that it was not the way to efface a bad precedent by making a worse: upon which the king sent for Henry de A. D. 1345. Leon, and told him, that tho' he might as well put him to death as Philip had done his countrymen, or insist upon a very large ransom, as he was the richest gentleman in Bretagne, yet he would be content with a very small one, if he would go to Paris, and, in his name, defy Philip de Valois; tell him, that he looked upon the truce as no longer subsisting, and that he would never conclude another till he had revenged the death of these unhappy gentlemen <sup>p</sup>.

THE first efforts were made in Guienne, to which the earl of Derby was sent with a strong squadron, and a numerous corps of troops on board. He managed the war with great success, and defeated the count de Lisle, who commanded for king Philip on that side. John de Montfort displayed his banners again as duke of Bretagne, and, with the assistance of some English troops, besieged Quimper; but the place was so strongly fortified and so well defended, and his own troops in so poor a condition and so ill provided, that he was constrained to raise the siege; the disgrace of which affected him so strongly, that he died soon after of discontent, leaving his son a kind of hostage in England, and his broken fortune to the care of that heroine his spouse <sup>q</sup>. In Flanders things took the like turn; king Edward not only went thither, but carried with him also his son, afterwards the famous black prince, in hopes that, through the interest of his friend Artevelle, for so Edward always called him, the Flemings might be induced to leave their natural prince, and accept either of him or his son. His agent did all that was in his power, but in vain; the proposition was rejected, and the commons of Ghent entertaining some suspicion of Artevelle, who remained behind, the rest of their deputies ran into a tumult on his return, and beat out his brains <sup>r</sup>. Thus far things went well for king Philip, even without his own assistance; but the earl of Derby was still victorious in Guienne, and pushed his conquests as far as Angoulesme. The king ordered his son, the duke of Normandy, to march against him; but was unable to provide him with a competent army for want of money. He had foreseen this want, but did not think it would so soon have come upon him. He had, however, endeavoured to provide against it, by imposing that tax upon salt which still subsists <sup>s</sup>. This furnished him with money indeed; but it came in slowly, was attended with several insurrections and universal discontent <sup>t</sup>. At length the duke of Normandy marched with a hundred thousand men against the earl of Derby, who had not a third part of that number, recovered most of the new conquests, and, by degrees, pressed him so hard, that he was forced to send to king Edward and demand relief, without which it was impossible to save Guienne, which the war had already almost ruined <sup>u</sup>.

KING Philip, having exerted his utmost force in assembling and completing the army of the duke of Normandy, relied upon that for resisting the English, not only as their forces stood at present under the earl of Derby, now by his father's death become earl of Lancaster, but likewise when they should be augmented by the troops which he knew king Edward was bringing- <sup>v</sup>

ing thither in person; and therefore he meditated an invasion on England, in the king's a absence, which was to be facilitated by an irruption of the Scots; and with this view he had a great number of Genoese vessels in his ports, and some thousand of cross-bow men, who were to embark as soon as the king had appointed a place for his fleet to assemble. He had also set on foot a fresh negociation with the Flemings, and had made them very considerable offers, if they would return to his obedience, and that of their count *. While he was using the properest means to carry these important projects into execution, Edward, having drawn together four thousand men at arms, ten thousand archers, twelve thousand Welch, and six thousand Irish foot, embarked them on board eight hundred transports, and, escorting these with a fleet of two hundred and fifty sail, embarked in person on the 4th of July, with an intention to land either at Bayonne or Bordeaux; but being twice drove back by contrary winds, b which threw him, with no small hazard, on the coast of Cornwall, he began to listen to the advice of Geoffrey brother to the count de Harcourt *. This gentleman had not only been of the council, but was also a declared favourite, to king Philip, till, by such degrees as are but too common at courts, he was disgraced; and, knowing the violence of his master's temper, fled about two years before into England, where he was very kindly received, and much esteemed by Edward. This Geoffrey had, from the beginning, remonstrated to him, that Guienne and Poitou were in themselves countries not over fruitful, and were by this time wholly exhausted, having been so long the seat of war; whereas Normandy (which was his own country), was very rich and fruitful, full of large towns indifferently fortified, and where, on account of taxes which they thought illegal, and for various other reasons, the gentlemen c were highly disgusted with Philip and his government: and now, finding that he could not execute his own purpose, Edward very wisely altered it, and, directing his course to the opposite shore, debarked his troops at La Hogue *. He there divided his forces into three bodies, commanded by himself, the earl of Warwick, and Geoffrey Harcourt, with which he spread desolation on every side: Charentan, St. Lo, and Velonge, were taken sword in hand, and pillaged:
Rouen, better fortified, might have escaped; but the count d'Eu and the earl of Tancarville having retired thither with the militia of the adjacent country, the townsmen would needs have them give the English battle; which they being persuaded, or rather compelled, to do, were not only defeated, but beat into the town, and the place taken, with the constable and the count, a prodigious slaughter, and an immense booty *. Edward then advanced up the Seine d as high as Poissi, within less than twenty miles of Paris, from whence he sent to challenge
Philip either to a battle or single combat; and, receiving no answer, retired into his own county of Ponthieu, in order to refresh and recruit his army, being now inclined to march into Flanders, having received fresh invitations from the Flemings *.

Philip assembles his allies
and the whole force of his realm, in order to revenge this insult.

MANY of his allies, and most of his great vassals, having joined Philip, the sight of so numerous an army, and such a croud of nobility, induced that prince to hope, that, in the first transport of their resentment, they might over-whelm the reduced army of his antagonist.
Full of this opinion himself, or influenced by those who were, he followed the English with all possible diligence *. King Edward, who had now in view a retreat into Flanders, directed his march towards the river Somme, in order to pass into Artois; but found it so well guarded, e that it was impossible; upon this, he ordered proclamation to be made amongst his prisoners, of whom he had fifteen or sixteen thousand, that, if any of them could shew him a ford, he would give him his liberty, with that of twenty more, and a sum of money into the bargain.
One of the prisoners accepted the proposal, and led him to the ford of Blanquetaque; where the English passed in spite of the opposition given them by six hundred cross-bows, and the like number of horse, on the other side; and having reached the village of Cressy, four leagues beyond Abbeville, encamped in the neighbourhood *. King Philip passed the same night in the last-mentioned town, and in the morning continued the pursuit, not with that leisure and prudence which he had shewn upon other occasions, but like a man led by his passions, and who measured the glory of his victory by the number of the slain. f

The famous battle of Cressy in Pon-thieu, in which the army of Philip is totally defeated.

He came up with the English about four in the afternoon, and a battle ensuing, was defeated with great slaughter *. The next day's loss was little, if at all, inferior to this; for a vast body of militia from all the adjacent countries, marching in order to join the king's army, fell in unexpectedly with a body of English troops; and, being easily beaten, were most of them put to the sword. The king, who behaved very gallantly himself, and was carried from the battle by force, sent for the duke of Normandy, to join the remains of his army, while the victorious Edward continued his march to the sea, and closed the campaign by investing Calais *, as a place very commodious for his designs.

- a THE town of Calais was obstinately defended by its inhabitants, which obliged Edward to fortify his camp, and to take great precautions for the continuance of the siege; in the mean time king Philip, being joined by his son the duke of Normandy, and having drawn forces from every part of his dominions, took the Oriflame from the abby of St. Denis, and, with an army of one hundred thousand men, marched to the place besieged. When he arrived at a convenient distance, he dispatched some officers, with orders to view the enemy's camp; who found it covered by a strong regular line, within which were warm convenient huts for the soldiers, places of arms at proper distances, convenient markets, in which all sorts of necessaries were sold at an easy price<sup>m</sup>. They offered him battle in the name of king Philip; to which he answered coolly, that he did not mean to give him battle, but to take Calais;
- b and, at their return, they reported the English to be so well posted, that it would be great imprudence to venture an attack. Philip carried his point in regard to the young count of Flanders, whom his subjects invited home, received him with great affection, and would have married him to the princess Isabella, daughter to king Edward; but he, deceiving them, escaped to Paris, where, by the advice of king Philip, he espoused Margaret, daughter to the duke of Brabant<sup>n</sup>. This, though a point of consequence, afforded but very little consolation for the loss of Calais; which, after it held out near a year, surrendered on terms which only high resentment could impose, or the deepest necessity admit. Six of the principal inhabitants were to be given up to Edward, who declared his intention to put them to death. This treaty must have been ineffectual, if six of the chief burghers had not offered themselves, and went out in their shirts, with halters about their necks, to throw themselves at Edward's feet, who sternly ordered their execution; from which they were, with difficulty, saved by the queen, upon condition they left the place, and never returned any more. They were honourably received, and amply provided for by king Philip<sup>o</sup>. Edward, once master of the place, turned out all the inhabitants, and replaced them by his own subjects. The war was not more fortunate for Philip on any side. In Guienne, the earl of Lancaster not only recovered whatever places the duke of Normandy had taken, but added also to his conquests the port of St. John d'Angeli, Poitiers, Niort, and Xaintes<sup>p</sup>. The widow of John de Montfort defeated Charles de Blois in Bretagne, and made him prisoner, with his two sons; and, while her consort besieged Calais, the queen of England beat the Scots, and took David Bruce their king<sup>q</sup>. Things were in this state when a legate from the pope interposed, to the no small satisfaction of Philip; and Edward, knowing the disorder of his finances, readily yielded to a truce, which he afterwards prolonged for three years<sup>r</sup>.

- THE return of peace could not but be welcome to a nation in the most distressed condition. All the country from Paris to the sea was laid desolate and waste, and beyond the Loire all was in the same condition. A famine succeeded to the war, and to that a plague, which swept away multitudes; but this visitation was not peculiar to France, having ravaged Asia and Italy before, and continued its deadly progress to the very extremities of Europe<sup>s</sup>. His misfortunes softened the heart of Philip, so that, when Geoffrey de Harcourt threw himself at his feet, with a scarf about his neck, in the form of a cord, he raised him up with great kindness, and forgave him. An attempt made upon Calais, though without the king's knowledge, might easily have revived the war; but king Edward going thither in person, and making prisoners all who were embarked in that expedition, whom he ransomed at a high rate, and Philip disavowing the act, the truce subsisted as if no such thing had happened<sup>t</sup>. The dauphin of Viennois, notwithstanding repeated cessions of his estates, in case he died without heirs, after the death of his first wife was inclined to marry; and having cast his eyes upon Joan, daughter to the duke of Bourbon, Philip, whose talent was negotiation, prevented that match, by interposing his grandson Charles, who espoused the lady; and the dauphin, who was of a soft and pliant temper, resolved thereupon to quit the world, to take the order of St. Dominic, and at the same time relinquish his territories to Charles, the first of the blood royal of France who bore the title of Dauphin<sup>u</sup>. The duchess of Normandy, daughter to the king of Bohemia, and sister to the emperor Charles, dying, the king thought fit himself, being also a widower, to propose a match for his son with the princess Blanch, sister to Charles the Wicked, king of Navarre; but, when he came to see her, he was so charmed with her beauty and prudence, that he espoused her himself, and obliged his son to marry the countess of Bologne, widow to Philip of Burgundy count of Artois, and the mother of Philip, the last duke of Burgundy of that race<sup>w</sup>. These marriages occasioned great rejoicings, which, however, were of no long continuance; for his young queen, who was scarce seventeen, became a widow in less than a year, the king dying of a short illness at Chartres en Beauce, on the

A. D. 1350. 22d of August, in the twenty-third year of his reign, and the fifty-seventh of his life<sup>x</sup>, leaving the queen with child. His misfortunes, joined to the hastiness of his temper, made him little regretted, more especially as an opinion prevailed, that his person was unlucky, notwithstanding the surname of Fortunate, which he acquired at his accession to the throne<sup>y</sup>. Yet, it may be truly said, these vulgar opinions deserve little notice, since the cares and sorrows attending it might well induce Philip to doubt, whether he had any reason to boast his good fortune in obtaining the crown; and, on the other hand, if we reflect on the great accessions of territory he procured, and how near he was obtaining the noble duchy of Bretagne, if the states would have consented, we can hardly esteem him unlucky<sup>z</sup>. In short, like other princes, and indeed like other men, in some things he was prosperous, and in others not; or rather, his views, falling in with those of Providence, were accomplished, and when contrary were defeated, though ever so well concerted.

John duke of Normandy succeeds his father, and fulfies the beginning of his reign with the death of the constable Rodolph count of Eu and Guines.

On the demise of his father, John duke of Normandy ascended the throne of France, with as general an approbation as any of his predecessors; and indeed there were many reasons why his subjects might expect an extraordinary degree of ease and happiness under his reign. He was forty years of age, had always behaved very dutifully towards his father, commanded armies often, shewed much courage, and no want of conduct, in the execution of those commands; and, having had a large share in the administration of affairs in his father's life-time, felt the weight of the crown no greater than he was well able to bear at his accession<sup>a</sup>. He was crowned, with his second wife Joan of Bologne, on the twenty-sixth of September; and, to grace this solemnity, made his son Charles, the dauphin, knight, together with his second son Lewis, his brother Philip duke of Orleans, and the son of his consort, Philip duke of Burgundy. He proceeded from Rheims slowly to Paris, and made his public entry into that capital, on the seventeenth of October, with great splendour and the loudest acclamations, the feasts upon this occasion lasting a whole week<sup>b</sup>. This scene of mirth and joy was very speedily disturbed by an act of severity; which shewed that John inherited the disposition, as well as the dominions of his father. Rodolph de Brienne, count of Eu and of Guines, constable of France (which office his father had executed before him), had made three or four trips into France, since the time he had been made prisoner by the English in Normandy, under colour of procuring money to pay his ransom, which had been fixed at so large a sum as eighty thousand crowns<sup>c</sup>. Being at this time in Paris, the king caused him to be arrested, and three days after beheaded, without any trial, in the presence of the duke of Bourbon, and some other lords. It was given out, that, at his death, he confessed his having entered into engagements with king Edward. The crime charged upon him was, that he had consented to let that monarch have his county of Guines; which, lying in the neighbourhood of Calais, was at that juncture of the utmost importance; and to excuse the manner of his punishment it was alleged, that, from the examples of Robert de Artois and Geoffrey de Harcourt, the king had reason to secure himself against the consequences of a third instance of the like kind<sup>d</sup>. But all this did not satisfy the nobility, who looked upon the action with horror, and were terrified with the apprehension of such a precedent. Their apprehensions were not at all lessened by the manner in which the king disposed of the estates of the deceased. The constable's sword he bestowed on Charles de la Cerda, great grandson to Alonso the Wise, by the father's side, and standing in the same degree of relation to St. Lewis by his mother: the county of Eu he gave to John de Artois, the son of Robert; but, though both were his near relations, neither had merited any thing of the state, but derived these benefits purely from the king's favour<sup>e</sup>. The county of Guines was left to the daughter of the deceased, who espoused Walter de Brienne, titular duke of Athens, and who in process of time became also constable of France. The king being very sensible of the uneasiness of the barons and the noblesse, endeavoured to dissipate their fears by a great variety of court diversions, and instituted the order of the star<sup>f</sup>, that he might attach a considerable number of them to his person; which, though it had some effect, did not answer his intentions in any great degree. The institution of the garter by Edward produced this project.

The truce very ill kept, and yet renewed by the two crowns under the mediation of the pope.

As it was not the spirit of peace, but merely a sense of weakness on both sides, that originally produced and hitherto prolonged the truce, so it was never very strictly observed on either side. The French made an inroad into Xaintonge, under the command of marshal Offemont, who was defeated and taken prisoner; but they had better fortune in the blockade of St. John de Angeli, which, though a sea-port, surrendered for want of provision<sup>g</sup>. On the other hand, Sir Aumary de Pavia, who was still governor of Calais, corrupted the officer who commanded in Guines, and so took it, as if by surprize. As this blow was felt, king John complained that the truce was violated; but Edward vindicated himself, by saying that

- a he had looked upon the truce as a kind of merchandize, of which both were to make use, and that as John had got a port on one side, he had borrowed a fortress on the other<sup>b</sup>. Sir Aumary, who, though very brave, was an absolute knave, encouraged by this success, attempted to surprize St. Omers, in which Geoffrey Charni commanded, but he gave him so warm a reception, that, after an obstinate and bloody dispute, his troops being defeated, he was, by an unlucky fall from his horse, taken prisoner; and, in return for his having cheated Geoffrey of twenty thousand crowns for the sale of Calais, where he was also taken prisoner, and forced to pay a great ransom, he now caused Sir Aumary to be tore to pieces with wild horses<sup>c</sup>. In Bretagne the war was carried on with more heat than ever between the houses of Montfort and Blois; and, in short, every thing tended to an open revival of the war, as soon as both parties should have recruited their forces, in which John had some advantage, by his brother-in-law, Charles of Luxembourg, becoming emperor<sup>d</sup>. The next year the truce was again prorogued. At this time Charles, king of Navarre, having taken possession of his dominions, returned to the French court, where he was bred, and where he was admired and beloved, as one of the most gallant and accomplished princes of that age. At first he affected entirely the character of a man of pleasure, which he found to be most acceptable at court; and having, by this means, rendered himself wonderfully agreeable to the queens, for there were then three, he carried his first point of marrying the princess Joan, the king's daughter, without difficulty<sup>e</sup>. He then complained that the county of Angoulesme, being ruined by the war, it was but just that the loss he sustained thereby should be repaired; and several places being bestowed upon him in Normandy, the king gave that county to his favourite the constable Charles of Spain, which so provoked the king of Navarre, who had a mind to keep that too, as we have shewn in another place, that he caused that unhappy prince to be killed in his bed, owned and justified the fact, and at length compelled the king to grant what terms he thought fit to demand, with a full pardon for his accomplices: and though he submitted in person to a kind of conviction before the parliament of Paris, yet it was upon an assurance of having his grace, and, which is much more extraordinary, having king John's second son delivered him as an hostage till the ceremony of his dismissal should be over, which served only to debase the king, to heighten the ambition of Charles, and to augment his party<sup>f</sup>.
- d In another place we have given the character of this prince, whom the French stile Charles the Wicked, and who was indeed one of the most dangerous enemies the king or kingdom ever had. It shall suffice, therefore, here to observe, that exclusive of that title which, in his mother's right (the daughter of king Lewis Hutin), Charles thought he had to all, he also pretended to the duchy of Burgundy, the counties of Champagne and Brie, with some other places, which had belonged to some or other of his ancestors<sup>g</sup>. His method was to advance his pretensions singly and separately; and as soon as he had obtained an equivalent for one he set up another, at the same time treating with the English, and with such as, from particular prejudices, were become malecontents<sup>h</sup>. The king, being acquainted with these practices, bestowed the duchy of Normandy upon his son the dauphin, and ordered him to seize the king of Navarre's estates. This brought Charles out of his regal dominions by sea, where he quickly became so troublesome, that the crown was forced to purchase quiet at the expence of one hundred thousand crowns; notwithstanding which he still kept up an intelligence with England, and was the only person confided in by the malecontents.
- e A STRONG desire in king John to recover the important fortress of Calais, and the well-grounded opinion which Edward entertained, that there never was a more favourable opportunity for extending his conquests, induced both princes to suspend negotiation, and to refer their quarrel once more to the sword. Edward the Black Prince was sent over, with some of the young nobility, a reasonable supply of money, and a small body of old troops, into Guienne, where he was received with great joy, and carried on the war with spirit; while the French forces under Gaston Phæbus, count of Foix, and the constable de Bourbon, gave him very little opposition, because their pride and jealousy of command would never allow them to act in conjunction<sup>i</sup>. In the autumn Edward himself crossed the sea to Calais, with a good army; and having taken the field, ravaged the country to the gates of Hedin. John, having at length collected a superior army, marched directly to give him battle, and sent one of the marshals of France to offer it; but the king of England answered, that he would fight when he thought fit, and so retired again to Calais. It seems as if this expedition was undertaken on expectations that were not answered, which engaged the English monarch to act as he did<sup>j</sup>. John, perceiving clearly that this war would prove too weighty for his revenue, called an assembly of the three estates of the realm at Paris, before whom he laid a true state of his

They consented accordingly to maintain thirty thousand men so long as the war should last; revived the gabelle on salt, which had been suppressed on the death of king Philip; imposed many other taxes, and settled a committee of accounts, who were to levy, receive, and disburse the money thus granted, for the purposes to which it ought to be applied, which is a demonstrative and incontestable proof of the liberty which the French nation enjoyed at this time, and which was not inferior to that of any other in Europe (B).

King John arrests the king of Navarre, and causes some of his confidants to be beheaded in his presence.

WHATEVER satisfaction the king might receive from this condescension in the states, it could scarce alleviate the disturbance given him by the intrigues of the king of Navarre, who had drawn the counts of Loix, Namur, Harcourt, and in general all the young nobility, into his party; and, which is very singular, the dauphin duke of Normandy, whose head he filled with notions that he had not a proper degree of authority allowed him, and even went so far as to engage him to think of leaving his father's dominions, and to retire to the court of his uncle the emperor Charles. These projects were discovered in time; the king sent for his son, gave him so clear an insight into the king of Navarre's views, and made him so sensible that he meant him no better than he did to himself, who was obliged to have guards about his person, to defend him from the emissaries of this ambitious prince, that the dauphin, who had great abilities, entered thoroughly into his father's schemes, and, in order to carry them into execution, made the peace of his associate as well as his own, and then returned into Normandy. There he had the address to get the king of Navarre, and the most of his creatures, into his power; where, being surprized by the king with a small troop of determined persons, the count of Harcourt, and some of the most seditious, were beheaded upon the spot, and the king of Navarre sent prisoner to Chateau Gaillard. It was believed that this act of severity would have broke all their intrigues, and have prevented this country from becoming the seat of war; but it fell out quite otherwise; for prince Philip of Navarre broke out immediately into open hostilities, demanded and received succours from the English, so that all Normandy was in confusion. Amongst the most active in these troubles was Geoffrey de Harcourt, whom king Philip had pardoned, and who now took up arms again to revenge the death of his nephew, and in one of these expeditions he was slain; but king Edward retained such a sense of his services, that he took care to preserve his estate to his family.

Is defeated and taken prisoner.

THE prince of Wales, taking advantage of this great diversion, marched from Bordeaux with two thousand gens d'arms and six thousand archers, and, after traversing Auvergne, entered into Berry, plundered all the country round, and amassed a very rich booty. On the news, however, that the king was advancing towards him with fifty thousand men, he resolved to retire through Touraine and Poitou into Guienne; but the king, conscious of his own superiority, took his measures for surrounding him so well, and pushed him with such vivacity, that at length he came up with him at Maupertuis, two leagues from Poitiers, having so effectually secured the passes, that it was in a manner impossible for him to avoid fighting, for which, in this situation, the prince made the best disposition possible. John,

(B) This assembly of the states of France was the king's last resource; he had altered the value of money in such a manner as to create infinite disorders, and, in comparison of those disorders, with very little profit to himself. His ministers were no longer able to advise him in raising men or money, but it was his own inclination, and the confidence he had in his people, that threw him upon the states (1). They consisted of three distinct bodies, or, as some should call them, houses. The first comprehended the clergy, and very nearly resembled our convocation, having at their head the archbishop of Rheims. The second was the nobility, and (in our stile) the gentry, whose speaker was the duke of Athens. The last were the deputies of the provinces, or, as we should call them, the representatives of the commons, with the famous Stephen Marcel, provost of the merchants, at their head. The chancellor and the parliament were also present, who, on behalf of the king, represented the distressed state of public affairs, and submitted it to their consideration (2). They promised to support the king with their persons and fortunes; but, at the same time, they took notice that the nation was exceedingly distressed, and expressed their expectation, that, at the very time he accepted their assistance, the king would redress their grievances. They then proceeded immediately to vote him a supply, and to deliberate on the ways and means most proper to raise it. The method in which they inclined to do this, was by imposing taxes on the necessities of life for a short time, to be levied by persons of their own appointing; whereas the ministers were desirous of a capitation, or a poll-tax; and, upon trial, the former method being found ineffectual, they had recourse to the latter. In their second sessions they brought in a long and distinct roll of their grievances, and explained themselves, as to the means which they desired the king and the dauphin, duke of Normandy, should take for removing them; insisting frequently on their binding themselves, by oath, to comply with their demands. The ordonnance, comprehending all these particulars, is still preserved; and we are told by the French writers, that the journal of the states either is or was in the Cotton library (3).

- a at the head of a vast army, engaged him with great fury ; but, by his own obstinacy and indiscretion, he lost the battle, and was taken prisoner with his fourth son Philip<sup>d</sup>. There fell, exclusive of persons of great rank, about six thousand in the field of battle, and about fifteen thousand were taken prisoners, most of whom the English dismissed, on a promise to render themselves, or send their ransom to Bordeaux, on a certain day. After this glorious victory, the prince, with infinite difficulty, got safe to Bordeaux, for if the French had recovered from their consternation, they might easily have prevented it<sup>e</sup>. The king remained six months there, with whom prince Edward would willingly have concluded a peace ; but his father, desirous of having his share in the triumph, insisted that he should be sent into England, as he was<sup>f</sup>.
- b It is impossible to conceive a country more miserable than France, upon the falling out of this untoward event. The king had left no regent, and consequently no legal representative in the kingdom : but the dauphin, assuming the title of his lieutenant, endeavoured to supply this defect, by calling an assembly of the states, to be held at Paris, which was the more necessary, as the nobility paid him no great respect, and seemed disposed to lay hold of this opportunity to raise their own power, and to live, in all respects, like princes. The dauphin found the rest of the assembly of the states exactly in the same disposition ; so that, without attending either to his or the public distress, they began to prescribe to the dauphin whom he should turn out, or whom he should take in, so that he was glad to let them separate, under pretence of giving him time to make a visit to his uncle the emperor<sup>g</sup>. Soon after the king of Navarre made his escape, and was in a little time brought in triumph to Paris, where by his eloquence, of which he made a very free use upon all occasions, he governed the populace at his pleasure, so that the dauphin knew not what to do, or whom to trust. He was obliged to call another assembly of the states, but instead of governing them they appointed a council to govern him. Upon this he followed the example of the king of Navarre, began to harangue the citizens at their common-hall, and made, in a short time, a great progress in popularity<sup>h</sup>. An accident spoiled all. A common fellow murdered the treasurer of France, and then retired into a privileged place ; upon which the dauphin sent the two marshals of Dauphine and Champagne to take the criminal out of sanctuary and hang him, which they did. The bishop of Paris immediately exclaimed that the privileges of the church were invaded ; and the provost of the merchants, Marcel, by whose instigation the murder was done, having raised a general insurrection, went to the lodgings of the dauphin, butchered both the marshals before his face, and some of their blood flying upon him, the dauphin asked, with some emotion, if he was to share the same fate ? The provost told him that he was not ; and as a mark of security and protection, snatched his embroidered hat, or hood, off his head, and clapped his own blue one, which was the signal of the Navarre faction, upon the dauphin, who was forced to dissemble his resentment, and take all in good part<sup>i</sup>. He had been compelled to grant all the king of Navarre desired, and obliged to live upon fair terms with him ; though he suspected that a dose of poison he had received, and by which he lost his hair and his nails, and had lost his life too, had not the skill of the emperor's physician, who, by the help of a perpetual issue, hindered the venom from falling on his vitals, preserved him<sup>k</sup>. The scheme of the malecontents was to change the form of the government, to vest the supreme power in the third estate, and to leave the king his title with little or no authority ; but when the chiefs of the citizens of Paris made a proposal of this sort to the other great cities in the kingdom, it was rejected with contempt. The dauphin seeing this, conceived hopes ; and taking advantage of the king of Navarre's being in Normandy, went to the parliament, and demanded from them the title and authority of regent, which was granted ; and upon this he gave the great seal to his chancellor of Normandy, and the sword of constable to Moreau de Fiennes : afterwards he held the states of Picardy and Champagne, where he was received, obeyed, and assisted, to the utmost extent of his wishes and their power<sup>l</sup>.

WHILE the dauphin was thus employed, the miseries of the kingdom, which seemed scarce capable of any augmentation, were nevertheless heightened by so new and unexpected an evil, as, for the time it lasted, abated the consideration and even the sense of all the rest. The nobility, as we before observed, were so far from entertaining any just sentiments of the danger and distress to which the nation was exposed, that, on the contrary, they pushed their pride, luxury, and ill-timed magnificence, further than can be well imagined, pillaging the poor peasants who inhabited their lands, and using it as a common phrase of reproach, Jacque bon homme, that is, good man James, or, as we would say, the poor Jacks, shall pay for all<sup>m</sup>. The common people, in this starving condition, rendered the more conspicuous, and at the same a time the more intolerable, by that splendour and profusion which appeared in their lords houses, could not help venting their complaints to each other, deploring the hapless state they were in, and the want of any reasonable hopes of seeing things mend. It happened that some peasants about Beauvois discoursing about this subject, and inveighing against the inhumanity of their lords to themselves, their want of regard to the honour of France, and their contemptuous behaviour to the king under his misfortunes, wrought themselves at last to such a height of fury, that they resolved to extirpate the whole nobility; and laying hold of pitch-forks, staffs, reap-hooks, and such rough instruments of mischief as came in their way, began to carry their desperate design into execution, destroying, without mercy, the families of such as they could surprize, and plundered their houses. This humour diffused b itself into several provinces; and this mutinous rabble, from the circumstances before-mentioned, were stiled the Jacquerie<sup>a</sup>. The danger being general, the nobility, who in those days made the use of arms their sole profession, assembled for their own defence, and, in a little time, took a severe revenge on these undisciplined multitudes. The duke of Orleans charged them in the neighbourhood of Paris, and cut off ten thousand; the king of Navarre fell upon another body, and put twelve thousand to the sword, with their principal leader William Caillet<sup>o</sup>. The regent also laid hold of this occasion to raise an army of thirty thousand men; but, acting with more moderation, engaged many of them to lay down their arms, and at length appeared with his forces before Paris. The citizens, sensible of the ill usage he had received, endeavoured to pacify him; but the provost Marcel, foreseeing that he should be c the victim in case of an accommodation, excited a fresh sedition, and called in the king of Navarre with a body of English and Norman troops; but as these did not observe the strictest discipline, new disturbances happened, and they were expelled<sup>p</sup>. The provost and his faction conspired to deliver the city entirely into his hands; but their design being discovered at the very point of execution, the provost, with the ringleaders of his party, were destroyed, and the gates being opened to the regent, the public tranquility was gradually restored, notwithstanding the efforts made by the king of Navarre to prevent it, which at length rose so high, that he sent a public defiance to the regent, and broke out into open war<sup>q</sup>. The circumstances he was then in rendered this extremely difficult to that young prince.

King of Navarre saves France and the regent, by making a peace on reasonable terms.

As there were at this time great bodies of English troops in different parts of France, d under the command of officers who subsisted them as they could, who acknowledged no superior, and acted on no principle but that of getting the most they could, it was by the assistance of these that the king of Navarre hoped to carry his point; and what that was will not be difficult to learn, when we know that he made a solemn declaration, that, for the future, he would never acknowledge any right in the house of Valois to the crown of France<sup>r</sup>. By the help of these independent bodies of English, who were, beyond comparison, better soldiers than the dauphin's new raised troops, he so straitned the city of Paris, in which he had still a great number of friends (for, with all his faults, he had a great facility in making, and a more wonderful art in keeping them), that, at length, it became more e than probable he would have prevailed, and have had the city delivered to him by capitulation at least, if not without. But of a sudden, and contrary to all expectation, and without any visible motive, he demanded an interview with the regent, and concluded a peace with him on moderate and reasonable terms<sup>s</sup>. The writers of those days attribute this to inspiration from heaven; on the other hand, his brother Philip said he was bewitched; later writers ascribe it to the inconstancy of his temper; but all agree, that this conduct of his saved France, and the subsequent part of this history will put it beyond doubt. The truth of this perplexed business seems to have been, that, in his harangue to the people of Paris, he had suffered words to escape him to this effect, "That, if right took place, he f " had a better title to the crown of France than either he who wore it or he who pretended " to it;" which being reported in England, he quickly found that he was to expect no farther assistance from thence; for, as to what was given him by the truce before-mentioned, Edward disavowed it. The king of Navarre, therefore, began to consider what effects would follow upon the taking of Paris; and perceiving clearly that it would only serve to enrich the free-booters, his allies, in the first instance, and facilitate Edward's design of setting that crown on his own head, with whom he should be much less able to deal than with king John and the dauphin, he very wisely altered his plan, and made an equitable peace, to which his brother Philip refused to accede, but continued to carry on the war in Normandy in conjunction with the English<sup>t</sup>.

- a ALL this time king John remained in England, under circumstances none of the most pleasing. On his arrival he made a public entry into the city of London, but it was such an entry as could give him no disquiet. He rode on a white courser, which, in those days, when punctilios were much observed, was a mark of sovereignty, and the glorious prince of Wales, on a little black horse, rode by his side<sup>u</sup>. He had lodgings assigned him in the Savoy, where he was treated with all the respect due to his high rank, and with all the esteem which his great personal merit deserved. The king, the queen, the princes of the royal blood, paid him their visits, and endeavoured to comfort him: he had liberty to go where he pleased, to take the diversion of hunting, was feasted and caressed by the nobility, and adored by the people; for, with all the heat of his temper, he had an affability and a condescension that made subjects of all who approached him; and he had his favourite son Philip, to whom Edward is said to have given the surname of Hardy, for reprimanding a gentleman who served that monarch with wine before his father. But, notwithstanding all this, he had his sorrows<sup>w</sup>. His subjects had shewn but little concern for him from the time he was taken. On the contrary, in the first assembly of the states, all they laboured was to reduce his authority. His queen, though a princess of incomparable merit, being little regarded at Paris, withdrew into her son's dominions, and died in Burgundy. His ransom, or his liberty, scarce occupied the attention of any of the assemblies; and, in a word, he seemed to be so thoroughly abandoned, that he took a resolution of concluding a treaty with Edward, upon the best terms he could: but when he had concluded it, and, in conjunction with Edward, sent it over to the regent in order to have it ratified, the states thought them so hard and so dishonourable, that they refused their approbation, which equally displeased both kings, and gave Edward an opportunity of returning to France as soon as the truce expired<sup>x</sup>. This truce was made for two years; and some of the French authors seem to think, that if the cardinals who made it had not prevailed, France must have been inevitably conquered. Yet, if we consider facts, they will scarce leave us any room to doubt that this truce was more fatal to France than if the war had continued; for this afforded leisure for civil broils, left those independent corps, who were stiled companions, to plunder where-ever they were strongest; made way for other insurrections, and deprived the dauphin, and other princes of the blood, of that authority, which, with an army in the field, they must have had<sup>y</sup>. Edward was aware of all this, and, under colour of punishing such as were in the stile of his court rebels alike to both kings, he raised an army, and equipped a fleet, which plainly enough expressed his real intention to become the master, as well as to assume the title, of France; and accounts sufficiently for the alteration of his conduct towards king John, whom, with his son Philip, he committed to close prison. His fleet, transports included, consisted of eleven hundred sail, and his army, when debarked at Calais, and joined by the troops which were before in France, amounted to one hundred thousand men. He began his campaign in the month of November, and, though the season was rude, he continued in the field, on a supposition that he should quickly receive submissions from most of the provinces in France<sup>z</sup>.
- e THE regent was very sensible, that he had not either money or men at his disposal sufficient to give any direct opposition to such a force: he took, therefore, the only method that was left, and with great prudence distributed what troops he had through the principal cities and towns in the kingdom, under officers of distinguished courage and indisputable integrity. This had its effect; for, though Edward marched up and down where he thought fit, and plundered and laid waste the country at his pleasure, insomuch that he drew from the dutchy of Burgundy, by way of contribution, two hundred thousand florins, exclusive of provisions, yet no place of any consequence submitted<sup>a</sup>. At length he invested Rheims, with an intention, as the French historians say, to have caused himself to be crowned there, as soon as he became master of the city. But the archbishop, who had a considerable force in the place, defended it for about six weeks; and then the king decamping, marched towards the Loire, carrying with him his dogs and his hawks, that he might hunt and take his pleasure, and that the world might see how little he apprehended from the French arms. At length he changed his course and took the route of Paris, where the regent was with what forces he could collect, to whom he sent a defiance by a herald; but he was wiser than to change his measures, or to risk another day like those of Cressy or of Poitiers<sup>b</sup>. The pope's legates all this time solicited Edward to listen to an accommodation, in order to which the plenipotentiaries from the regent followed his camp; but, though the duke of Lancaster joined his intreaties to theirs, he shewed great coldness to these motions for peace, till, towards the close of April, being encamped in the open fields that lie round Chartres, such a storm of thunder and lightening arose as astonished his army and himself, by which many of a his soldiers, and above a thousand horses, perished<sup>c</sup>. Edward, looking upon this as a signal from heaven, sent his plenipotentiaries to the village of Bretigny, about a league from Chartres, where they met the French ministers on the first of May, and concluded their conferences on the eighth. This treaty was in the names of the two princes Charles and Edward; the regent swore to the due performance of it on the tenth, and the prince of Wales on the sixteenth of the same month<sup>d</sup>. A truce upon this took place, till things could A. D. 1360. be finally adjusted. King John passed the sea to Calais in the month of July, where the regent was permitted to visit him; but it was three months before Edward could come thither and put the last hand to the treaty; which being sworn to by both kings, John was set at liberty, on the 24th of October, after a captivity of more than four years. In his way to b Paris he was met by the king of Navarre, who promised to live with him for the future in the strictest friendship. On the 13th of December he made his public entry into the city of Paris, where the inhabitants in general, and the common people in particular, gave great testimonies of joy, and made him a present of silver plate that weighed about a thousand marks<sup>e</sup>.

The kingdom of France once more ravaged and plundered by the companies, or, as they now styled themselves, Tard-venus, or Late-comers. 1361.

THE vast ransom which the king had engaged to pay, constrained him to think of every method of raising money; and for this reason he did two things, which were very disagreeable to his subjects; the first was giving his daughter in marriage to Galeas, the son of John Visconti, duke of Milan, who purchased that princess at no less than six hundred thousand crowns; the other, was permitting the Jews to return into and remain in France for twenty c years, for which they paid largely<sup>f</sup>. To these calamities there were added two others, that were still more sensibly felt; the first was a plague, that swept away upwards of thirty thousand persons within the compass of a year at Paris; the other, an inundation of disbanded soldiers, who had formerly served in the English army, and now, under the command of officers of their own choosing, made a lawless and cruel war, to fill their own pockets. These styled themselves the Tard-venus, or the Late-comers, signifying that they had only the gleanings of the late harvest that had been made in France<sup>g</sup>. The king, after they had been disowned and declared robbers by the English, ordered the constable James de Bourbon to march against them, which he did, accompanied by many of the nobility, and an army of twelve thousand men. He had, however, the misfortune to be totally defeated, he himself d and his son were mortally wounded, the greatest part of the nobility slain, and the rest made prisoners, by which the whole kingdom was laid open to these insatiate plunderers<sup>h</sup>. They then separated into two bodies; one of which, under the command of Seguin de Badol, wasted the countries of Lyonnois, Beaujolois, and Nivernois; the other, under various commanders, took the route of Avignon, in order to ransom the pope and his cardinals. In their passage they made themselves masters of Pont St. Esprit, where they met with an immense booty, and where they elected a general, who styled himself the friend of God, and the enemy of all mankind<sup>i</sup>. At some distance of time, the king, with much difficulty, and at the expence of a vast sum of money, prevailed upon Badol to retire into his own country of Gascony; and the marquis of Montferrat, whom the pope had sent for to his assistance, e prevailed upon him to follow him into Italy<sup>k</sup>. About this time died Philip, duke and count of Burgundy, count of Artois, Auvergne, and Boulogne, and the hopes of his succession raised new disturbances. The king of Navarre conceived that he had a clear right to the duchy at least, as descending from Margaret of Burgundy, eldest sister to Eudes, grandfather to the deceased duke. King John claimed it, as being descended from Joan, her younger sister; but, being one degree nearer in point of descent, he entered under that pretence, and annexed it to the crown. The French historians may stile Charles of Navarre what they please; but whoever candidly considers the nature of his claims to this duchy, the counties of Champagne and Brie, and even to the crown of France, will think that, how bad a man soever he was, he was also very badly used. John de Bologne, the uncle of the deceased duke, by the f mother's side, had the counties of Bologne and Auvergne, and the count of Flanders the counties of Burgundy and Artois<sup>m</sup>.

King John bestows the duchy of Burgundy on his son Philip, and declares him first prince of France.

KING John finding himself much less at his ease than he expected, his court far from being so magnificent as formerly, and the power of the dauphin, since he became regent, such as in some measure restrained his own, he resolved to divert himself for some short time, by making a tour to Avignon to confer with pope Innocent VI. to whom he had great obligations, as having interposed, upon all occasions, and sometimes with more warmth than was decent, on his behalf<sup>n</sup>. In this journey he took the opportunity of visiting his new acquisition

a the duchy of Burgundy. On his arrival, the inhabitants of all ranks, but more especially the nobility and the inhabitants of great towns, applied to him, with great duty and humility, representing that they had been so long used to be governed by a prince of their own of the blood royal of France, that it was impossible for them to be happy under any other form of rule, and therefore intreated him that he would so far comply with their customs, as to bestow upon them one of his sons for their duke. It seems not improbable that the king and his petitioners understood each others mind; at least it is certain that they came very soon to an agreement, since, notwithstanding the late re-union of the duchy to the crown, John, by his letters patents, containing very high commendations of his favourite son Philip, granted to him and his heirs, procreated in lawful wedlock, that duchy, in as full a manner as it had been held by its former dukes; and, as a mark of special favour, declared this new duke the first peer of France. This was afterwards confirmed, out of respect to his father, and with little regard to the rules of true policy, by his brother Charles the Wise. This fortunate young prince Philip, by the marriage of his predecessor's widow (who was also a maid) acquired immediately the county of Burgundy, and in process of time those of Flanders and Artois, of which she was the heiress, and thereby laid the foundation of the greatness of the second house of Burgundy, which in succeeding times made so great a figure in Europe; and which, from the penning of king John's letters patents, became long after the subject of lasting and bloody disputes<sup>p</sup>. A. D. 1362.

According to some writers, king John arrived at Avignon in the life-time of pope Innocent VI. according to others, immediately after his decease. He was succeeded in the pontifical throne by William Grimaldi, abbot of St. Victor at Marseilles, who was not so much as a cardinal. At the time of his election he was minister at the court of Naples; but, being recalled to Avignon, he accepted the papal dignity, and assumed the name of Urban V. The king of Cyprus coming to intreat his favour and protection against the infidels, to whose insults his dominions were continually exposed, he entered so warmly into his interests, and recommended them with such vehemence in his sermons and discourses, that king John took the cross on Good-Friday, notwithstanding all the opposition that such of the nobility as were about him made to a project of this kind, when his dominions were in so unsettled a condition, exhausted of men and money, and so many disputes raised as to the true meaning of several articles in the treaty of Bretigny, that a war with England was more likely to ensue than peace to subsist<sup>r</sup>. But king John attributed the misfortunes of his father, and several of his predecessors, to their taking the cross, and not fulfilling their vows. He had imagined a possibility, by the help of this expedition, to carry the greatest part of the companions, the best troops and the worst men in Europe, into places where their valour might be employed, and their thirst of riches gratified, without prejudice to christendom. Besides, his lofty temper was gratified by the title of generalissimo of the Christian armies; so that he entered with great heat into this new design, for which he is grievously censured by the French historians, both ancient and modern, as a prince who sacrificed to his own humour the welfare of his subjects<sup>s</sup>. 1365.

e At his return into France, king John met with fresh circumstances of difficulty and displeasure. The hostages that had been sent into England for the performance of the treaty, and for the payment of the king's ransom, grew very uneasy at the uncertain and distant prospect of their return home. King Edward taking advantage of this, framed, with their concurrence, a kind of new convention, in which the reciprocal renunciation of claims was contained; and farther, a release from king John, from all pretensions of satisfaction for the spoil and damage committed by the companions and late-comers, in breach of the truce<sup>t</sup>. This convention did not appear very unreasonable to king John; but the dauphin and the parliament, who considered those pretensions as the only means they had to prevent the rigorous execution of that harsh treaty, disapproved the convention entirely; upon which the hostages, who had been carried over to Calais, that they might contribute, by their solicitations, to the ratification of this peace, were more closely confined. Lewis, count of Anjou, the king's son, bore this so impatiently, that he made his escape, as several others also did, both before and after, to the great grief of the king, who would not suffer him to remain in his presence, but ordered him to return to England again, pursuant to his famous maxim, that if truth and good faith were banished from the world, they ought at least to reside in the mouths and hearts of princes<sup>u</sup>. As prince Lewis did not think fit to obey him, king John took a sudden resolution of returning himself to London; from which he was not to be dissuaded, as holding himself obliged thereto by the treaty, and hoping also to bring things

Savoy.

He passed the sea in the Christmas holidays, and landed at Dover the fourth of January, where he was received with great honour. He proceeded from thence to Canterbury, where he offered a jewel of great price, according to the notions of those times, at the shrine of Thomas à Becket. He next continued his journey to London, where he was welcomed by the king and queen, and restored to his old lodgings in the Savoy: but it does not appear that he advanced much in his negotiation, though treated with all possible marks of affection and respect, and indulged in his favourite diversion of hunting<sup>x</sup>. Whether the chagrin of this, or some natural malady, was the cause, so it was, that he fell into a wasting and languishing condition, of which he died on the eighth of April, having the satisfaction, however, of being b attended in his last moments by his brother the duke of Orleans, his son the duke of Berry, and his cousins Lewis, duke of Bourbon, and John d'Artois, count d'Eu<sup>y</sup>. He deceased in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and in the fourteenth of his reign, more regretted and beloved A. D. 1364. by the English than by his own subjects; his funeral was solemnized with great pomp, at which Edward assisted in person, in deep mourning, and his corpse was afterwards sent over to France, attended by the count d'Eu. This monarch had the surname of the Good; for which some historians find themselves at a loss to account, because they behold him in the light of an impetuous, obstinate, and over-bearing prince, who listened only to his own notions, which were commonly dictated by his passions<sup>z</sup>: but, as they confess, he was unfeignedly pious, candid, honest, and sincere, as brave as any man of his time, generous, magni- c ficent, and affable. Posterity may, perhaps, be inclined to think that some surnames might be mentioned, even amongst the French kings, that were not at all better founded; be this as it will, he left his dominions in a deplorable condition, and his son and successor under great difficulties, notwithstanding he had done all in his power to deliver them. But negotiation was not his talent, and the hopes he had of persuading, in conjunction with the king of Cyprus, Edward III. to close his victorious reign by a crusade, deceived him; for that king answered civilly, but coldly, that he was now arrived at too great an age to think of seeking foreign adventures, though he was some years younger than king John, and of a much more robust constitution (C).

(C) The history of this prince's reign sufficiently demonstrates his character; but, in order to do him justice, the reader must remark, that luxury was at a prodigious height in his time, and corrupted all ranks and degrees of people; so that being a very honest man himself, he was very liable to be deceived, and being also of a very hasty disposition, punished with little regard to form, and, it may be, with too much severity (1). He is charged with carrying the royal authority too high; and yet it is allowed that he summoned assemblies of the states frequently, and remitted his concerns into their hands; but both he and they were ill served; for faction prevailing, some busy intriguing men betrayed both the king and the people, in order to serve their private purposes, which did not hinder their being involved in the general ruin which their arts produced (2). His first consort, for she was never queen, was the princess Bona of Luxembourg, daughter to John, king of Bohemia, and sister to the emperor Charles IV. by whom he had Charles the dauphin, duke of Normandy, Lewis duke of Anjou, John duke of Berry, and Philip duke of Burgundy. He had likewise by the same princess five daughters; Joan, queen of Navarre; Mary, who espoused Robert, duke of Bar; Agnes, who died young; Margaret, who became a nun; and Isabel, who espoused John Galeas, duke of Milan (3). His second consort, Joan, widow of one duke of Burgundy and the mother of another, was, at the time of their marriage, about twenty-nine years of age and esteemed one of the most beautiful and one of the most prudent ladies in his dominions. She retired, during his captivity, into the territories of her son the duke, and died there, in the fortieth year of her age (4). By this princess king John had two daughters, who died young. It is reported the king had an amour in England, and some attribute his return into this kingdom to that cause, but this is very uncertain (5). There is somewhat more credit due to another report, as if he had once thought of espousing the famous queen Joan of Naples; but upon his arrival at Avignon, he received such a character of her from her own subjects, as put an end to all thoughts of that kind (6). There is an odd story in one of our old historians, and not to be met with any where else; he says, that on his death-bed, king John acknowledged to king Edward that he had employed persons through his dominions to export gold beat into thin plates, and arms, into France, which would have appeared more probable, if he had not added that he asked king Edward's pardon also, for having usurped the crown of France, which he obtained (7). His corpse being brought over into France, was interred in the abbey of St. Denis, with all outward testimonies of respect, but with little real sorrow or affection (8): and the same disposition prevails even amongst modern historians, so little regard is shewn to the unfortunate, even though they are princes (9).

- a into Paris, with great magnificence, in which he was never deficient on such occasions, tho' <sup>ims by which he raised France.</sup> remarkably frugal at other times<sup>a</sup>. He found the kingdom in a distracted and distressed condition; he bent his utmost endeavours to recover and restore it, and he did this slowly and silently, by making choice of wise ministers and able generals, reserving to himself the great secrets of state, and issuing his orders with the same coolness and punctuality, when his affairs were in the worst and in the best condition. The king of Navarre was in arms in Normandy, at the time of his father's decease, and had a good army there, well paid, under the command of John de Grailli, captal de Buch. Charles had not either men or money to oppose him; but he sent Bertrand du Gueslin, an officer of great reputation, to command in Normandy, and he, partly by his arts, but chiefly by his fame, raised a considerable body of
- b forces, with whom he beat and made prisoner the captal, at the battle of Cocherel. It was no great affair; but we find it as particularly described by the writers of those times as any action that happened in France, out of regard, as they say, to the generals, who became afterwards the most distinguished of their time; but, in reality, because it was the first dispute of any note in which the French troops had been victorious, since the battle of Cressy<sup>b</sup>. The king came soon after in person to Rouen, where he caused a nobleman of a great family and considerable fortune, to be beheaded, for being in arms against him at that battle. He declared du Gueslin marshal of Normandy, and count of Longueville, which county reverted to the crown by the death of prince Philip, brother to the king of Navarre. This method of punishing and rewarding with éclat the king commonly followed, and with good effect<sup>c</sup>.
- c He confirmed his father's grants to his youngest brother, augmented the appenages of his other brothers, and rendered great kindnesses to all the princes of his blood, contrary to the maxims of his grandfather Philip de Valois, who did all he could to keep them low. Yet <sup>Pullishes an edict of resumption, and uses other means of supplying his treasury.</sup> to fill his coffers, in some degree, he had recourse to an act of resumption, making it his choice rather to disoblige the great than to oppress the little<sup>d</sup>. In Bretagne, the war being renewed, the young count de Montfort defeated Charles le Blois in the battle of Auray, in which he fell. The king, who managed every occasion with great address, laid hold of this, admitted the count to do homage as duke of Bretagne, and secured to the widow of Charles le Blois the title of duchess of Bretagne, for her life, a pension of forty thousand livres, and the county of Penthièvre for her children, with the remainder of the duchy to them, in case
- d of the failure of heirs in the reigning family<sup>e</sup>.

THE new duke of Bretagne, who was much of the same age with the French king, came to Paris to pay his homage, in virtue of the treaty; and, at this interview, both princes shewed great marks of esteem and condescension for each other. Bertrand du Gueslin, who had been taken prisoner in the war of Bretagne, was set at liberty; and the duke perceiving how great his credit was at the court of France, confirmed to him the grants that had been made by his predecessor; at the same time the king took Oliver Clifson, and other Bretons, into his service, without giving the duke any offence. But he could not draw that prince into a marriage to his satisfaction, upon the loss of his wife, who was a daughter to king Edward, but on the contrary he espoused the daughter of the princess of Wales, by her first

e husband, so that he still maintained his connection with England<sup>f</sup>. The captal de Buch, though a prisoner, was extremely well received by the court of France. Charles was an excellent judge, and a liberal rewarder of merit; and having seen the dexterity with which the captal managed a treaty between himself and the king of Navarre (which, as we have shewn in its proper place, was concluded upon terms very favourable for France), resolved to gain, at any rate, one who, as it now appeared, was as able a statesman as he had shewn himself a general. The captal could not resist the king's caresses, who released him without ransom, and who, on his coming into his service, made him a present of the county of Nemours. But, upon his going to Bordeaux, the prince of Wales telling him, that it was impossible to serve two masters, he returned the king his patent for the county of Nemours, f and remained with his old lord<sup>g</sup>. The low state of his finances continued still to give the king a great deal of trouble; because the situation of his subjects in general was such, that it was not either prudent or safe to impose any new taxes, or even to exact, with the usual rigour, those they had been formerly accustomed to pay<sup>h</sup>. This obliged the king to have recourse to methods not very agreeable either to his rank or to his nature. His uncle Philip duke of Orleans, who had been long prisoner in England, had a very large estate, a considerable part of which arose from grants that had been made by the late king; and these, in the present state of things, the king had a mind to resume. The process was no sooner commenced with this view, than the duke of Orleans, instead of defending himself, declared in full parliament, that, though he thought and believed he possessed nothing but by a legal right, yet, knowing the king's motive, he surrendered the whole into his hands, and should be content with whatever he thought fit to restore<sup>1</sup>. This defeated Charles's scheme, who only accepted of his uncle's renunciation to confirm his titles in the strongest manner. The king, however, had recourse to sumptuary laws for repressing luxury, which was still at a great height; and for encouraging industry, as the sole means of relieving his people; and enforcing these, not so much by penalties as his own example, they had their effect.

The grand companies ravage France, and reduce the king and his subjects to the utmost distress.

THE composition of affairs in Bretagne, and the peace concluded with the king of Navarre, seemed to leave France much at ease, and to allow king Charles leisure to put in practice the schemes he had formed for restoring prosperity to his subjects; and yet from these treaties followed an evil, that brought the nation into greater distress than ever it had felt before. While the war lasted, Bretagne, which did not belong to the crown of France, and Normandy, felt the weight of it, while other provinces had time to breathe. But now these mischiefs were carried into every part of the kingdom, by the troops that were disbanded on all sides on the conclusion of those treaties<sup>1</sup>. This flowed chiefly from the manner in which armies were formed in those days, and was the most terrible scourge to which any country could be exposed. For these soldiers did not straggle about the country, either singly or in small bands, robbing and pilfering at their pleasure, but were formed into large corps, under the command of some knight or officer of distinction, who, having raised himself in service, but having no estate, chose this method of supporting himself, and those who adhered to him<sup>m</sup>. When these corps appeared single and separate they were stiled the Malandrins; but, after six or seven of these knights entered into a confederacy, though their corps were at a considerable distance, to march to each other's relief, in case of any attack, they assumed the name of the Grand Companies, and became very formidable in point of strength, as well as dreadfully oppressive<sup>n</sup>. One of these knights, who stiled himself the archpriest, had such a strength, that, after spoiling Champagne and Burgundy, he made an irruption into the territories of the empire, and had done more mischief, if some of his own soldiers had not murdered him in a fit of resentment. The king saw, with the greatest anguish of mind, his subjects oppressed and exhausted, and himself treated with contempt, without any power of redress. With small forces, or even larger bodies of the troops hastily raised, there was nothing to be done; and to set on foot an army required money, which he had not<sup>o</sup>. In the mean time this evil was intolerable. He complained of it to king Edward, a great part of the companions being his subjects. It touched the king of England in honour as well as in interest; he therefore issued a proclamation, requiring them to lay down their arms, and no longer to molest the people of France. Some few obeyed, and but a few; the rest sent him for answer, that they held nothing from him, and that they would not abandon the places they had seized, or disband their corps, for him or any prince living. This so provoked Edward, that he resolved to pass the seas with a numerous army, if king Charles had not declined his assistance, having, as he said, found out a method of relieving himself: on which Edward swore, he might trust to that method, for help he should have none from him, if they drove him out of his dominions<sup>p</sup>. But Charles was by no means willing to have Edward again in France at the head of a potent army; for reasons that will appear.

Bertrand du Gueslin engages them in an expedition into Spain with the king's consent.

THE man who delivered the king and his subjects, when in this terrible dilemma, was Bertrand du Gueslin, who undertook to persuade the companions to quit France of their own accord; and, having opened his project to the king, he approved, and offered him all the assistance in his power<sup>q</sup>. Thus encouraged, he went to a meeting of their chiefs, who were all his old acquaintance, and most of them his intimate friends; after being, for some days, a companion of their mirth, he observed to their chiefs, that it was a base and dishonourable kind of life they led, and that the shame of it, instead of being alleviated, was heightened by their birth and rank. They pleaded necessity; to which du Gueslin replied, that the Moors were still in possession of Granada, and other rich provinces in Spain; that it would be more safe, more advantageous, as well as more honourable, to turn their arms against those infidels; that he would undertake to procure them the means, in every respect, of doing this, and would accompany them in the expedition<sup>r</sup>. This they readily accepted; upon which thirty-five of their chiefs went to Paris, where they were kindly received, and magnificently feasted, by the king, at the temple, and, besides rich presents, had two hundred thousand franks given them for the current expences of their expedition. Their rendezvous was fixed for Chalons on the Soane, where du Gueslin joined them, with three hundred of the most gallant gentlemen in Bretagne. Charles sent a marshal of France to see them out of his dominions, and to conduct them with as little prejudice to his subjects as possible.

- a possible. The route that they took was to Avignon. The pope, alarmed at their approach, sent a cardinal to meet them; who demanding what they were, and why they came, du Gueslin told him, they were thirty thousand crosses, marching against the infidels, and that they were desirous to have the pope's absolution, and a couple of hundred thousand florins by way of alms<sup>a</sup>. The cardinal promised the absolution at the first word, but hesitated as to the money. However the pontif, seeing there was no remedy, taxed the inhabitants of Avignon at one hundred thousand florins, in hopes they would be content with that sum<sup>b</sup>. A. D. 1365: But du Gueslin told the cardinal, they did not come to plunder poor people, but to receive alms from the rich; that therefore he must take back the money, and restore it punctually to those from whom it was taken, and bring them two hundred thousand florins from the pope and the college, who could spare it; which, as there was no remedy, he was obliged to do, together with a plenary absolution<sup>c</sup>.

- BEFORE they passed the Pyrenees, du Gueslin acquainted them with his true design; which was to dethrone Don Pedro the Cruel, and to advance his brother Henry, count of Trastemara, to the throne. We have already reported the progress and event of this expedition, and it shall suffice to say here, that Charles the fifth never gave a stronger proof of his consummate policy than in the assistance he afforded to count Henry, though it might seem very extraordinary for a monarch, whose dominions and whose treasures were equally exhausted, to advance such prodigious sums in favour of a young prince, whose title was none of the best, and by whom at this time he was not so much as personally known<sup>d</sup>. His penetration shewed him, that nothing could be more advantageous for France than this undertaking, which, at the bottom, had the approbation of the pope, and at the same time his address enabled him to persuade the new king of Castile, that what he had done was out of pure generosity, and that as he acquired, so he had no other means of preserving, the crown, but by the support of France, which gained him a firm and constant ally, and put such a check on the kings of Arragon and Navarre, as fully compensated the succours afforded to the king Don Henry, even supposing them to have had no other motive<sup>e</sup>. The famous black prince having, from a point of honour, taken the dethroned Don Pedro under his protection, improving the mistake of Don Henry, who had too soon dismissed the greatest part of the companions, and employing his interest to draw off the rest, who were either English or Gascons, defeated Don Henry in the famous battle of Navarette, made du Gueslin prisoner, and reelected Don Pedro on the throne<sup>f</sup>. Charles did not, upon this, change his measures, but relieved Don Henry with the same alacrity and apparent generosity as before, furnished him with troops and money, negociated for him at several courts, procured him the liberty of du Gueslin, though set at a high price, and therefore contributed, in a great degree, to change once more the face of affairs in Spain, and the fortune of her kings, replacing Henry on the throne, to which he made his way, not only by the defeat but the death of his brother; an event which, in its consequences, had a great operation on the political system in that age<sup>g</sup>.

- WHILE these things happened abroad, Charles administered with the utmost prudence, and with indefatigable diligence, the public affairs at home; he restored the credit and authority of parliament, by assisting there frequently in person, by causing the judgments given therein to be strictly executed, and by introducing persons of established probity and learning in its principal dignities. He looked into the management of his finances narrowly; he remitted some impositions, abated others, and levied all with great moderation<sup>h</sup>. He granted new privileges to the cities, rendered the roads safe, and, by many new devised encouragements, repeopled his dominions. He repressed luxury by his own example, and by the sobriety of his court, where a well-managed magnificence appeared on public occasions, and the strictest frugality at all other times<sup>i</sup>. He neglected nothing that might conciliate the friendship of the neighbouring princes. The pope was entirely in his interests, so was the emperor, and several of the princes of Germany; the count of Flanders (whose daughter Margaret, the widow of the last duke of Burgundy, was the greatest heiress in Europe), he held in continual suspense. The count was inclined to marry this rich princess to a younger son of Edward of England; but this could not be done without a dispensation, and Charles had so great an interest with the pope, that it could not be obtained<sup>j</sup>. He afterwards proposed his brother Philip duke of Burgundy, and procured a dispensation, about which there had been so much difficulty<sup>k</sup>. By these arts, and more especially by rewarding liberally men of parts of all characters, the king found himself in a situation of making the most of any opportunity that should offer. It was not long before one presented itself to his view, the most favourable that he could wish, and he managed it with such calmness and dexterity, as drew from it such events as none but a true genius could have discerned it would produce: his neighbours looking on his conduct as the effect of an humble and placid spirit, from which they had nothing to apprehend<sup>c</sup>.

He begins to controul the black prince in Guienne, and prepares for a war.

At the time the gallant prince of Wales returned from his Spanish expedition, he found a melancholy alteration in his affairs. Pestilence and a very hot climate had consumed the greatest part of his army. Don Pedro, in deceiving him, left an immense debt upon his shoulders, instead of the mighty reward he had promised him; and, which was worst of all, a latent disease, which degenerated into a dropsy, brought upon him great infirmity of body, which rendered him the less able to apply proper remedies for stopping the declining state of his affairs. The war had drawn him into a prodigious expence, and into a variety of engagements, which he knew not how to discharge. Six thousand of the companions, all that remained of those dreadful troops, were quartered in his territories, till their wages could be paid. Besides, he could not bear the thoughts of retrenching his court, which had been hitherto at least as magnificent as those of Paris or London<sup>d</sup>. This obliged him to impose a florin upon every hearth within his territories; which, though submitted to in most places, yet in Guienne it was opposed with the greatest vehemence, the count of Armagnac and other great lords looking upon it as a violation of their privileges; which, at all events, they determined to maintain<sup>e</sup>. Charles, considering that two-thirds of his father's ransom was paid, most of the hostages redeemed, his people in a great measure recovering, his neighbours well-affected to him, and the concerns of Edward such as left him less able to maintain a war, than at any time since the peace of Bretigny, began to listen to the complaints of the Gascons, had his emissaries in the county of Ponthieu, and in other parts of the English conquests, where they found a great spirit of discontent, which they took all possible pains to cherish and increase<sup>f</sup>. At length, he laid the treaty of Bretigny, and all the subsequent proceedings, before his court of peers, and demanded their advice; in consequence of which he summoned the prince of Wales to appear, and answer the complaints made against him by his barons. To this he answered with disdain, that he would appear, but it should be with a retinue of sixty thousand men; and he likewise caused those, who had summoned him, to be arrested<sup>g</sup>. Hostilities did not immediately follow; on the contrary, a negociation ensued with the court of London. King Edward insisted, that the crown of France had no sovereignty over the provinces he possessed, and the appeal of the Gascon lords was an act of rebellion: on the other hand, Charles asserted, that Edward, having never renounced his pretensions to the crown of France, the duchies of Normandy, Anjou, and Maine, he still retained the sovereignty over Guienne and the rest of the provinces<sup>h</sup>.

By the assistance of his estates, Charles finds himself in a condition to begin a war.

As the embarking in a new war was a very dangerous step, Charles proceeded very deliberately, and with seeming irresolution; by which he gained time to enter into distinct treaties with his allies, held his enemies in suspense, and called an assembly of the states in the month of May, that it might appear he did nothing but by the advice and with the consent of his subjects. In this assembly he managed all things with such address, that the clergy declared the king, in all his proceedings, had acted in a manner suitable to the principles of religion and equity<sup>i</sup>. The nobility promised to assist him with their lives and fortunes, and the third estate applauded his majesty's justice and moderation, with a promise to support so good a cause to the utmost of their power. As the king wanted no more at this time, they were dismissed without so much as the mention of new taxes; but, in consequence of these declarations, Charles, without ceremony, declared war against Edward; who resumed the title of king of France, and prepared to punish what he stiled temerity and breach of faith. The war, on the side of Guienne, was rather favourable to Charles; for the companions revolted, in a great measure, to him, which surprised the prince of Wales, who had also the misfortune to lose the lord Chandos, one of the wisest men, and one of the ablest officers, in his service, who was killed in a skirmish<sup>j</sup>. The county of Ponthieu, in Picardy, revolted; but the fleet, which the king had assembled at Harfleur, with an intent to invade England, was rendered useless by the arrival of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, and a great body of English troops; for this obliged the king to oppose to him his brother Philip of Burgundy, with the forces that should have embarked for a naval expedition. There was, however, very little done on this side by either party; for Charles had expressly prohibited his brother from fighting, and the attempt made by the duke of Lancaster to burn the fleet was also very

- a luckily prevented<sup>a</sup>. In September, the states met again, and, upon a detail of what had happened since they had been held last, they unanimously agreed to impose the same taxes that had been levied for the release of king John, with the addition of hearth-money; which was esteemed a more equal, though a heavier, tax than a capitation. A method of proceeding which astonished all Europe, who supposed France to be quite exhausted<sup>o</sup>. A. D. 1370.
- In consequence of these great aids, the king augmented his forces; and, upon the resignation of the good old constable Fiennes, determined to recall Bertrand du Gueslin out of Spain; who not only very readily obeyed, though amply provided for by the king of Castile, but negotiated and signed a treaty with that monarch, by which he agreed to assist king Charles with a force by sea. On the arrival of this celebrated officer in France, he was first employed
- b in Guienne, where the king's brother made no scruple of serving under him, though he had no title, or so much as a regular command<sup>p</sup>. He recovered many places in a short space of time, and had, without doubt, made a greater progress, if the king had not sent for him to oppose Sir Robert Knolles; who, with a body of English forces, after having ravaged Champagne, advanced into the neighbourhood of Paris, and burnt some small towns in the sight of that city, where the king was with a considerable number of troops; but he would not be drawn out, or run any hazard: on the arrival of Bertrand, he had the sword of constable delivered to him, and was directed, with a small sum of money, to raise what forces he could<sup>q</sup>. The king might have given him greater forces, but he was afraid he would hazard a battle. The constable, with the few troops he had, stopped the progress of
- c Knolles, and recovered most of the places he had taken: the king commended his prudence highly, though now and then he ventured on a bold stroke. His success revived the spirit of the French nation, and made them endure with patience the heavy taxes which the last assembly of the states had imposed, the rather, because the king took the precaution of engaging the clergy every-where to preach up the justice of his cause, and to urge the necessity of continuing a war, that was of equal importance to the crown and to the people<sup>r</sup>. About this time died pope Urban the fifth, who had done that monarch essential services, and who was succeeded by Gregory the eleventh, whom he likewise gained to his side. To balance these advantages, king Edward drew over the duke of Guelderland to his party, and would have made a greater progress amongst the princes of the empire, if Charles had not
- d prevented him, by augmenting their pensions, and by inviting several of them to his court, where they were treated with all possible attention and respect. He could not, however, prevent the king of Navarre from passing privately into England, where he concluded the treaty of Clarendon with king Edward, the substance of which was not known in France till some years after; but Charles, however, took his measures so prudently, that it had no effect<sup>s</sup>. 1370.

Through the king's management it is carried on with advantage on all sides.

- THE constable returned in the winter to Paris, and concerted with the king the operations of the next campaign; in regard to which the greatest difficulty was to find the funds requisite for the payment of the troops. By the counsel of du Gueslin, the king gave a gentle squeeze to the officers of his treasury, who, it was suspected, had stole, but who, it was
- e certain, could spare: he borrowed likewise large sums of the lawyers: and the clergy, who having so often declared to the people the justice of the war, could not refuse to support it. But these were temporary expedients, which the king knew might, in their consequences, do him more hurt than good; and therefore he appointed commissaries for the payment of his troops, who accounted to the constable, and the constable to the king; and out of the money he saved, he punctually paid his debts<sup>t</sup>. He had this year five corps in the field; none of any great force, but sufficient to take towns, more especially by intelligence, and to harass the English army, instead of coming to a battle; for he still remembered Creffy and Poitiers; though he kept a numerous body of troops about his person, that he might push any extraordinary success, or repair any unforeseen misfortune, without delay<sup>u</sup>. The king of Navarre, who was returned
- f from England into Normandy, perceiving that he made war with success, and took all his measures with so much precaution, consented, upon hostages given, to confer with the king, concluded a treaty with him, and left his children in his hands, notwithstanding his late treaty with England. For, knowing that neither of these monarchs wished him well, he held it best, either by force or by fraud, to provide for himself<sup>v</sup>. About this time Charles of France concluded a treaty with Robert king of Scots, and established the Scots gens d'arms at a hundred men; but it was St. Lewis who first formed this corps, intrusting his person to twenty-four of that nation<sup>w</sup>. D. 1371. it was to be the counsellor of the king and pope at the same time, laid down his office of a chancellor, in which, however, he was succeeded by his brother; for it was not the king's custom to disgrace his ministers<sup>y</sup>. In the mean time the prince of Wales, vexed at the success of the French, resolved to recover Limoges, which he suspected had been delivered to them by treachery; and, having reduced it, he caused a great part of the inhabitants to be put to the sword. This was his last exploit; for, perceiving the people chagrined, being himself afflicted for the loss of his son Edward, and, in a manner, wore out by his disease, he returned into England. He left the government of Aquitaine to his brother John duke of Lancaster, having first taken an oath of fidelity from the barons, who troubled themselves little about it after his departure; for the imposition, feuage, and other duties, had alienated their affections, which he formerly commanded<sup>z</sup>.

Don Henry of Castile sends a fleet to the assistance of France, which does great service.

By the treaty which the constable had concluded with Henry king of Castile, that prince was bound to assist the French monarch with a fleet; and as he would certainly have done this out of gratitude, so he was not the less willing to do it, when, from an unexpected event, it became visibly his interest. The duke of Lancaster, having espoused the daughter of Don Peter the Cruel, assumed thereupon the title of king of Castile and Leon; soon after which he returned to England with his brother, who had married her younger sister, leaving the command in Aquitaine to the famous capital de Buch, with the title of constable. Don Henry, who knew the connections which the duke of Lancaster had with the king of Navarre, and suspecting his intentions to make a new irruption into Spain, in case the war with France had a favourable issue, sent a fleet of forty sail of large ships, and thirteen frigates, with instructions to act as the king of France should direct<sup>a</sup>. Charles, having early intelligence of a great succour, under the command of the earl of Pembroke, that was to be sent to Rochelle, gave timely notice of it to the Castilian admiral; who attacked that fleet on the eve of St. John, within sight of the port; and, being much superior in strength, defeated, and almost destroyed it entirely, made the earl of Pembroke, with many other persons of distinction, prisoners, and, amongst other large vessels, sunk that which had the treasure on board for the pay of the troops; so that it may be very truly affirmed Don Henry repaid, by this naval succour so opportunely given, whatever support or assistance he had received from the French crown<sup>b</sup>. The constable du Gueslin took advantage of the consternation this occasioned to make an irruption into Poitou, where he took several places of great strength, and afterwards joined<sup>c</sup> the duke of Berry in the Limosin. It is, however, uncertain what the fate of the war would have been, if the capital de Buch had continued to command; but he, being surprised and taken prisoner in a skirmish, was sent to Paris, where he was confined in the temple; and, though immense sums were offered for his liberty, he ended his days there, after five years confinement<sup>d</sup>.

The constable du Gueslin conquers great part of the English possessions.

IMMEDIATELY after this accident, Poitiers opened her gates to the constable; at which the king was so agreeably surprised, that he declared noble the mayor, the sheriffs, their descendants and successors; St. John de Angeli, Taillebourg, Angoulesme, Xaintes, and several other places, followed the example of Poitiers. The city of Rochelle would willingly have followed their example, but there was an English garrison in the castle. The French mayor was too hard for the English governor, whom he invited to dinner, and produced to him an old letter, under king Edward's seal, knowing that the governor could not read; who, after he looked upon it a little time, returned it. You see, said the mayor, that the king commands we should muster both our garrisons together, that the people may be better acquainted with, and have greater confidence in, each other, and I shall leave the time and manner to you. The governor drawing out his garrison the next day, the mayor surprised the castle; but, before he would render the place to the constable, he insisted upon having the king's consent to raze that fortress, and a charter for the town as ample as that of Paris; both which were obtained, and the mayor actually demolished the castle before he delivered the keys<sup>e</sup>. The progress of the constable's arms received some check from the gallant defence of Fontenai-là-Comte, in which the lady of Sir John Harpedon commanded; who, though young and handsome, exposed her person as much as any private man during the siege, and even when the place came to be stormed, nor once offered to capitulate, till on the point of being taken; when the constable, who was a gallant man, gave her leave to prescribe her own terms. The remains of the English officers and troops threw themselves into Thouars, which was a very strong place, and which they meant to defend to the last extremity; but the constable offering to allow them till the feast of St. Michael for the succours they expected, they consented to surrender, if not relieved by king Edward or the prince of Wales. Edward assembled and embarked an army, commanded by himself and

- a his sons, which, if it had arrived in time, might yet have changed the face of affairs; but, meeting with contrary winds, they were constrained, not without great hazard, to regain the English coast; so that, at the time appointed, Thouars submitted<sup>f</sup>. The constable had afterwards the good fortune to beat John d'Evreux, who came with twelve hundred men at arms to relieve the castle of Chisai, made himself master of that place, and surprised Niorp, which was stronger, and of greater consequence, all in a day; so that Poitou was entirely reduced, and the king gave that county to his brother the duke of Berry<sup>g</sup>. The best part of the expence of this campaign was borne by the Jews, to whom the king sold a permission to remain ten years longer in France, at a very high rate; though this event is placed lower in his reign by many historians<sup>h</sup>. A. D. 1372.
- b THE duke of Bretagne, who, as we have shewn, still maintained his connections with the English nation, as having a grateful remembrance, that, to their assistance, he owed his dominions, found himself in a wretched dilemma from the ambition and artifice of the king, who never discovered his discontent till it was in his power to make himself felt severely. The constable and Oliver de Clifton were not the only Bretons provided for in his service; and, besides those in his pay, he had many of the nobility in pension; so that he ran no great hazard in summoning the duke to attend him as his vassal, with all the forces he could raise. It was in vain that he pleaded he was allowed a neutrality by the treaty of Bretigny; it was to little purpose he distinguished between his homage for the duchy, and for his county of Montfort<sup>i</sup>. The constable entered Bretagne, with an army, on one side, Oliver Clifton, with his forces, on the other, the nobility and the people revolted in most places; so that, having distributed the English succours into Brest, and some other towns of importance, he retired into England<sup>k</sup>. But it was not long before he returned with John duke of Lancaster, who debarked at Calais an army of fifty thousand men, with which he proposed to restore his father's affairs, and to rival his brother's great exploits in that kingdom. He began his march towards the end of July, and passed through Picardy and Champagne, leaving behind him every-where sufficient marks of his resentment. Charles had three armies in the field; one commanded by his brother the duke of Burgundy, another by his cousin the duke of Bourbon, and a third by the constable, which consisted chiefly of cavalry. Besides these, the king had a corps of four thousand gens d'arms, and a numerous body of infantry, under his command<sup>l</sup>. The two dukes coasted the English army on each side, the constable followed in the rear, so that there were frequent skirmishes; but as none of them had a strength sufficient, and were besides restrained by the king's orders, there was no battle. The duke of Bretagne pressed the duke of Lancaster to march into his duchy; but that prince persisting in his resolution to proceed to Guienne, there was never after a right understanding between them<sup>m</sup>. The duke of Lancaster, however, pursued his own measure, traversed Burgundy and Auvergne with great rapidity, and suffered so much in this long march through an enemy's country, that, when he arrived, in the Christmas holidays, in the neighbourhood of Bordeaux, he had scarce a fifth part of his army left. In the course of this year, the king lost his two great ministers, the chancellor and his brother the cardinal de Beauvais. He replaced the former by Peter d'Argemont, by the election of the parliament, and the latter by the bishop of Amiens, by his own choice; but, tho' fortunate in these respects, yet this year was alike fatal in Italy and England, as well as France, by a severe famine, and by a devouring pestilence that followed it<sup>n</sup>. The king, however, did all he could to keep up the spirits of his people, and obliged the clergy to do all that was in their power likewise to cherish and relieve them; shewing such a vigilance and activity, even in the minutest things that regarded the public welfare, as contributed greatly to maintain a tranquility that had never been seen before under circumstances of a like kind, and which contributed as much to the support of his character, and preserving the affections of his people, as the victories he had gained, and the great turn he had given to the affairs of France<sup>o</sup>.
- f THE pope, who had sent repeated admonitions, and employed different legates to reconcile the two kings, now pressed things so warmly, and set the epidemic diseases reigning throughout their dominions in so strong a light, that they, at length, agreed to send their plenipotentiaries to Bruges, in order to conclude a peace, or at least a truce. At the head of these plenipotentiaries, on one side, were the king's brothers, Lewis duke of Anjou and Philip duke of Burgundy, and at the head of the other John duke of Lancaster. All hopes of peace were lost, by the English insisting peremptorily, that Edward should hold Guienne in sovereignty; to which the French would not harken. At length, however, a truce was concluded for a year; but without making any mention of Bretagne<sup>p</sup>. This was a great stroke of policy between the two kings, to relieve their own territories, and give their subjects time to breathe; but at the same time to nourish the flame of war in a corner, that such as wanted either a will, or the means, of being quiet, might find employment, and prevent the reviving of the companions. In consequence of this, John duke of Bretagne returned into his own dominions, with a considerable body of English troops; where, from the inveterate spirit that prevailed between the two parties, much blood was shed, the duke considering the opposite party as rebels, and Oliver Clifton openly professing his intention to exterminate the English, though he had served amongst them with great vigour in the beginning of this war. The duke, however, was very near seizing him, and most of the other chiefs, whom he had reduced to the last extremity, and to whom he refused all terms, if they had not been rescued from his vengeance by renewing the truce of Bruges for another year; in which Bretagne was included.<sup>a</sup> Charles willingly seized these short intervals of peace, in order to accomplish many things he had in his mind for the benefit of himself, his family, and his people. He made an edict to fix the majority of the kings of France at their entrance into their fourteenth year; whereas Philip the Hardy had fixed it at fourteen complete. Charles caused this edict to be registred in parliament, and then declared it a fundamental and irrevocable law of the kingdom.<sup>c</sup> The death of his uncle the duke of Orleans was a loss to him in some respects; but it augmented his revenue considerably. He was so provident, that, from the time of the first truce, his coffers were always full, and yet there never was a prince more liberal. He was continually giving lands and estates to the constable, who sold them almost as fast as he received them, and spent the money; yet he was so far from being extravagant, that he did not so much as affect magnificence; but he suffered no service to pass unrewarded, he left no man of merit that he knew in distress.<sup>b</sup> The king, who was perfectly informed of this, took care to support a generosity that was of such use to his service. The king did the like with regard to his ministers; he had many in different departments, and, in cases of difficulty, he took the advice of them all; reported them to three or four persons in his cabinet, and determined with them what was to be done. His maxim was, that, even in matters of state, reasoning might be public, provided the resolution was kept secret.<sup>c</sup>

of the death of the prince of Wales, and of king Edward,
to ruin the affairs of the English.

THE next year died the great terror of France, Edward the black prince, for whom the king caused a solemn service to be performed; not so much, say the French writers, out of respect to their kindred, as through esteem for his person, and for his virtues. Immediately after, and he could not have chose a more proper season, he published a general amnesty; knowing that there were many of his subjects who had hitherto adhered to the English interests purely out of gratitude and affection to the prince of Wales, and it had a good effect.<sup>d</sup> It happened otherwise in respect to the embassy he sent to Avignon, in order to dissuade pope Gregory from returning to Rome; and this notwithstanding he sent his brother and the duke of Anjou. The truce was renewed for another year; but the hopes conceived on both sides for a peace were defeated. The truth seems to be, that Charles had never any intention to conclude it; for at this time he entered into fresh alliances with the kings of Castile and Scotland; and, as soon as the truce was expired, the joint fleets of France and Spain came upon the English coasts, made several descents, and attempted more; but, except burning the town of Rye, did nothing very considerable. It was by the prisoners taken in this expedition that the French had an account of king Edward's death; which happened near a month before, but had been concealed by an embargo.<sup>e</sup> This was a kind of signal, upon which the armies of Charles attacked the English on all sides. One army, under the command of the duke of Burgundy, entered Artois; another entered Auvergne, under the command of the duke of Berry; that which acted in Guienne was commanded by the duke of Anjou; and the forces in Bretagne were under the constable: the king himself had a powerful body of troops, that he might be able to repair any accident that happened through the chance of war. The constable joined the duke of Burgundy, who found it difficult to deal with Sir Thomas Felton and the seneschal of Bordeaux. Soon after his arrival, the constable attacked and defeated them, making both their commanders prisoners of war.<sup>f</sup> This victory was so well pursued, that, at the close of the campaign, Bayonne and Bordeaux, with the districts about them, and the fortress of Calais, with its dependencies, were all the places left to England on the continent; and a strong appearance there was that they would not long keep these; for, besides the weakness natural to a minority, there were already great divisions in the English councils.<sup>e</sup>

It is reckoned a very singular honour by the French historians to this reign, that the emperor Charles the fourth, and his son Wenceslaus king of the Romans, came to make the king, who was the emperor's nephew, a visit at Paris. They were received with all possible marks

- a of respect, and entertained with all imaginable kindness, as well as with the utmost magnificence; but, with all this, Charles took care not to push his complaisance so far as to afford the smallest foundation for those claims of superiority, which some princes have been inclined to make from being invested with the imperial dignity. He took occasion, on the contrary, to make some use of this interview, by procuring his son the dauphin to be declared perpetual vicar in the county of Dauphine, and the ancient kingdom of Arles, which were still reputed dependent on the emperor<sup>a</sup>. About this time happened the famous process against the king of Navarre, on a charge of intending to procure the king to be poisoned; for which some persons suffered, and that king lost his valuable possessions in Normandy, by which he had been so troublesome to the French crown, and his lordship of Montpellier; which was all he
- b had for the counties of Champagne and Brie, and the duchy of Burgundy; and at this very juncture he was on the point of being deprived of the rest of his dominions, by the infant of Castile; but Edward the third was now dead, which abated the terror of the English arms<sup>a</sup>. The reigning queen of France, and the dowager queen Joan, deceased this year; which gave the king great concern. Pope Gregory the eleventh also died; upon which the cardinals elected an Italian prelate, who assumed the name of Urban; but, as he had the misfortune to disoblige the cardinal of Amiens, the French minister, whom he charged with being an enemy to peace, he and his associates chose another, who took the name of Clement the seventh, fixed his residence at Avignon, and procured himself to be acknowledged by all the crowns in alliance with France, except the king of Castile, who would acknowledge neither<sup>b</sup>, but maintained a prudent and exact neutrality.
- c THE king thought he could not have any season more proper for executing the great design he had formed, of annexing the duchy of Bretagne to the crown; in order to which he proceeded against the duke before the court of peers in parliament, with all possible solemnity; procured him to be attainted of felony, and his duchy, with the rest of the lands he held, to be confiscated, notwithstanding the opposition given by the widow of Charles de Blois, in respect to the claim of her children on the extinction of the reigning house<sup>c</sup>. But, contrary to all probability, what was intended for the ruin, produced the restoration, of the duke; for the nobility, who had hitherto followed the French party, revolted, recalled and received their natural prince, with all possible testimonies of loyalty and affection, and drove the French out
- d of the province. The king, listening to the insinuations of the cardinal of Amiens, shewed some coldness to the constable, who thereupon offered to resign his office, and to retire into Castile; from which he was, with great difficulty, diverted; and even then declared, without ceremony, that he would not serve against his country<sup>d</sup>. Another egregious slip of the king was, the disbanding at once all the Breton officers and soldiers in his service; by which the duke was furnished with a complete army of his own subjects, formed and disciplined at the expence of France; with which he gained such advantages as produced a negotiation, and a sort of project for a peace. The English, while the king was thus occupied, began to restore their affairs, and had recovered some considerable places in Guienne, and several castles in Auvergne and the Limosin. The constable was sent, with a considerable body of troops, to
- e repress them; and with these he laid siege to the castle of Chateaufort de Randan, in which there was a numerous garrison; who, after a long siege, entered into a capitulation, by which they promised to surrender, in case they were not relieved by the twelfth of July. On that very day the constable died, and the governor of the fortress, notwithstanding, brought the keys, and laid them at the feet of his corpse<sup>e</sup>. The king, as he had reason, expressed great concern for his death, and ordered his body to be interred in the abbey of St. Denis, between the tomb of the queen his wife, and that intended for himself. The earl of Buckingham, uncle to Richard the second, arrived at Calais with a strong corps of troops, and traversed all France, though not without some loss, in order to throw himself into the country of Guienne; which he, at length, performed; and, before the king could well receive advice of this, he was
- f advertised, by the stopping of the issue in his arm, that he had but a short time to live<sup>f</sup>. He thereupon sent for the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, to whom he gave his last instructions as to the government during his son's minority; advised them to give the constable's sword to Oliver de Clisson, to marry the young king to a princess of Germany, in order to strengthen their alliances, and to remove, as speedily as it was possible, that heavy load of taxes which the necessities of the times had obliged him to impose. He supported the approach of death with great constancy of mind, and, in his last moments, shewed much piety, and a perfect resignation. He breathed his last at a country palace near the wood of Vincennes, in the forty-fourth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign<sup>g</sup>, exceedingly

regretted by his subjects, and respected, as a wife and religious monarch, by all the princes <sup>a</sup> of Europe (D).

Charles VI. CHARLES the sixth, at the time of his father's decease, was about twelve years old, and consequently under the necessity of having a guardian; but who that was to be was not easily determined. The duke of Anjou, the eldest of the king's uncles, who had quitted the command of the army on the news of his brother's illness, claimed the regency as his right; and, upon a hearing before the parliament, it was allowed him <sup>b</sup>. The duke of Berry, less able, but not less ambitious, being for the present excluded, the care of the king's person and education was committed to the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, the former his uncle by the father, and the latter his uncle by the mother's side. The young king was, with great splendour, crowned at Rheims, and the duke of Burgundy took place of his elder brother, the regent, at table, as being the first peer of France <sup>c</sup>. The sword of constable was given to Oliver de Clifton, and most of the heavy taxes were suppressed; but this was only for a little time. The regent, whom Joan queen of Naples had adopted, and who, upon her decease, determined to assert his pretensions to that crown, seized all the late king's treasure, which amounted to many millions, his jewels, plate, and whatever else he had of value, to defray the expence of this expedition <sup>k</sup>. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy plundered also; and though not with equal success, yet, taking all they could, the heavy taxes, so lately laid aside, were again to be imposed. The late king's servants were ill-treated; the chancellor, who had opposed the duke of Anjou's regency, was glad to resign and retire <sup>l</sup>. The bishop of Amiens, whom the young king hated, fled to Avignon, with an immense sum which he had amassed; <sup>c</sup>

(D) The sagacity of this prince was as much celebrated in his life-time as after his demise, and yet it was not more considerable than his modesty. He did nothing without advice, which he received thankfully, and heard patiently; but, in the end, squared his actions by his own judgment, which was always acknowledged to be right, because it was always attended with success (1). He had a singular felicity in judging of the characters of men, which was much assisted by his conversing with them very familiarly. He chose his ministers and his generals with great caution; but he treated them with confidence, and never disgraced them. He had an eye to every thing himself, and he had two maxims in economy that were very remarkable. The first was, that he paid liberally; for he had a notion, that, when a king was cheaply served, he was generally cheated: and he paid in ready money, without deduction; which, he thought, went as far again (2). He left an immense treasure behind him, for which he has been censured by some, and commended by others; but, without question, his aim in collecting it was good. He had seen the monarchy on the very point of perishing for want of money, and this, as wise as he was, made him think he could never have too much; he repented this when it was too late, and remitted some of the heaviest taxes the very day that he died (3). He was the founder of the royal library, which is now become one of the principal ornaments of France; he left therein nine hundred volumes; whereas his father king John had not above twenty (4). He was rather knowing than learned, but he was a lover of learning, and a great patron of learned men, and took so much pleasure in their conversation, that some of the nobility, who were not of that number, took it amiss; upon which Charles said once what ought to be ever remembered, "It is true I love (clerks) men of letters, and I hope my successors will ever esteem them; for so long as learning is cherished and promoted, so long shall this monarchy flourish, and, when it loses its reputation, this kingdom will dwindle and decay (5)". His private life was perfectly regular; he rose early; was punctual in his devotions; dined before noon; slept after dinner; took moderate exercise; was never idle; and went to bed betimes (6). He had a calmness in his temper which those about him often mistook for coldness; with which they sometimes reproached him, which he bore with great patience; and very often they had the news of things being effected, for which they were soliciting his orders; and then the king smiled at their confusion (7). He was less solicitous about glory than any of his predecessors, or rather he considered it in another point of light, making the public utility his sole aim, and giving himself very little trouble about what the bulk of his courtiers either said or thought. He was very determined, with a great appearance of irresolution, taking his measures while he seemed to deliberate; by which he frequently defeated oppositions that could not otherwise have been overcome: he was more solicitous about discipline than numbers in his armies, and took care himself about magazines and provisions, which former princes thought beneath them; and had so perfect a comprehension of whatever might happen, that he never wanted resources, either for repairing a loss or improving an advantage (8). His consort Joan, the daughter of Peter duke of Bourbon, was a princess of exquisite beauty, admirable parts, and exemplary in her conduct; for which reason the king took her into his councils, and advised with her about every thing he did, with a view chiefly to enable her to act as regent during the minority of her son; but she died before him in labour, in 1378. He had by her Charles, who succeeded him; Lewis duke of Orleans, from whom descended the two royal houses of Orleans and Angoulême; five daughters who died young; Katherine, who espoused John count of Montpensier, son to his brother the duke of Berry, by whom she had no issue (9). His body, by his own direction, was interred at St. Denis, his heart at the cathedral of Rouen, and his entrails at the abbey of Mauvaisson. Theatrical entertainments were first introduced into France in his reign.

a and a gentleman of the old king's chamber was forced to discover where his private treasure, consisting of many ingots of gold, lay concealed between two walls; this, however, he did not do, till the duke of Anjou sent for an executioner to put him to death. In fine, all things fell into confusion, the duke of Bourbon alone acting in a manner becoming his rank, and his near relation to the young king; and even his good intentions were, in a great measure, frustrated by the duke of Burgundy, who, though he had promised to take care of the young monarch's education, made his court to him by flattering his humour, and indulging him in all kind of diversions, in which lay his sole delight; and this proved, in the course of his life and reign, one principal cause of his misfortunes<sup>m</sup>.

In such a situation as this, the English might have done much towards restoring their affairs, The people in Languedoc, and the inhabitants of Paris, rise in arms, and are punished in pursub if the general policy, or rather perfidy, of the age, had not prevented them. The earl of Euckingham, with English forces, had passed the winter in Bretagne; where, at the request of the duke, they had laid siege to Nantes, the only place of consequence in this duchy that was still in the hands of the French; but, while they were thus employed, he took the opportunity of treating with the crown of France; and, having obtained as good terms as he could desire, agreed to quit the English interests, and oblige them to return into their own island; which, without much difficulty, he performed<sup>n</sup>. The duke of Berry, tired of living like a private man, demanded, or was put upon demanding, the government of Languedoc; in which he was supported by his brother the duke of Anjou, from whom it had been taken in the late reign, on account of the exorbitant oppressions of which he had been guilty, and bestowed
 c on the count of Foix: but when the duke of Berry came to take possession of it, the people peremptorily declared, they would not receive him; upon which it became necessary to reduce them by force<sup>o</sup>. The young king, who had a martial spirit, proposed to have marched in person; but this the duke of Burgundy hindered: however the duke of Berry prosecuted his design with the greatest strength he could collect, but was beaten by the count de Foix; who reflecting on the consequences of his own victory, and how dear he might be made to pay for this triumph, compromised matters in time, and, withdrawing into his own dominions, left the government in dispute to the duke of Berry<sup>p</sup>. The people of Paris enraged, and unable to pay the old and new taxes that were laid upon them, broke out into an insurrection; in which, having armed themselves with mallets, they were from thence stiled Maillotines. They rendered his capital unsafe for the king and his council, and, in the first transports of their resentment, were guilty of some cruelties and violences not to be excused<sup>q</sup>. The more substantial d inhabitants, taking their measures in the night, assembled such a force as dispersed these rioters, and restored the public tranquillity: but the duke of Anjou, who knew there was nothing to be got by prosecuting beggars, made these burghers accountable for the mischiefs done by those they had dispersed; and, having engaged the king his nephew to act against them, in the end extorted one hundred thousand livres for their pardon; which was all that he wanted. Thus the king's guardian plundered his subjects<sup>r</sup>. A. D. 1381.

An eager desire to gain possession of the crown of Naples was what induced the duke of Anjou to act in this rapacious manner. When he had accumulated all he could, he proceeded e to Avignon, to the great joy of the whole nation; and from thence into Italy, with a better army than either of the two last kings had been able to raise; where, without performing any thing remarkable, except wasting all his treasure to the last shilling, he died of chagrin<sup>s</sup>. Upon his departure the duke of Burgundy had almost the sole management of the king, whom he led with an army of twenty thousand gens d'arms, and sixty thousand foot, to the assistance of his father-in-law Lewis count of Flanders, who were in arms, on account of the enormous taxes he levied to maintain a dissolute court, and to squander on his mistresses and parasites<sup>t</sup>. The chief of the commons was Philip Artevel, the son of James the famous brewer of Ghent; and though he was forced into these troubles, yet, being once engaged, he acted with great spirit and prudence, but it may be with too much ferocity, when he ordered no quarter to be f given to the French, except to the little king Charles, whom he directed, if taken, to be brought to him, that being bred up at Ghent he might learn to speak good Flemish<sup>u</sup>. The first operations of the war were favourable to the Flemings, but in a general action at Rosebecque they were entirely defeated, with the loss of twenty-five thousand men, amongst whom was their chief. This was followed by the most outrageous acts of severity; and the king having humbled the Flemings, as well as restored their count, returned into his own dominions with a victorious army, disposed to obey any orders, without presuming to distinguish whether it could be for the king's service to cut the throats of his subjects, who were in no condition to resist<sup>v</sup>. 1384.

The young king

pedition into Flanders, and sends relief to the Scots.

In their young king's absence the people of Paris had fallen into fresh tumults, and been a guilty of various acts of indiscretion, urged by the weight of their taxes, and the scandalous manner in which they saw them consumed. They knew the king, or rather his uncles, were exceedingly displeased, and therefore they dreaded his return: but to put the best face they could upon the matter, they armed thirty thousand men very completely, and marched out to meet their monarch by way of parade, but in reality in hopes of making some impression *. In this, however, they lost their aim, their force was despised, and the insult was punished. The little king marched into his capital at the head of his forces, took possession of it as if he had entered it by storm, broke some of their gates, beat down the chains, and shut up their streets, compelled them to deliver up their arms, arrested between two and three hundred of their principal townsmen, put some of them to death every day for a fortnight, and amongst b them the advocate-general, who had been often a mediator between the crown and the people, who was upwards of seventy years old, and whose greatest offence consisted in having been of the party of the duke of Anjou †. After this the king deprived the city of its privileges; and having extorted an exorbitant sum from the rest of the burgeses, discharged such of his prisoners as were still in prison, and had not been included in those warrants by which others were put to death. Much the same conduct was used to the cities of Rouen, Troyes, and Orleans, and several other great towns, by which incredible sums were extorted from the poor people, and so little of them applied to the king's service, that the greatest part of the army was disbanded, without being paid. The English, under the command of the earl of Buckingham, now duke of Gloucester, landing at Calais, marched through Picardy and Artois c to the assistance of the Flemings (for the people of Ghent still held out), and in conjunction with them besieged Ypres; to the relief of which the king marched with a potent army, which the allies being too weak to resist, raised the siege, and the English quitting the places they had taken, were at length obliged to fortify Bourbourg, where they made so gallant a defence, that at length it was agreed to permit them to retire, with all the honours of war, to Calais ‡. The duke of Bretagne, at whose request it was done, was deeply censured, notwithstanding which he had credit enough to negotiate a truce between the two crowns for six months; and his power of doing this by dint of influence at the court of London, made him more suspected and more hated §.

THE year following was remarkable for the death of Lewis, count of Flanders, which hap- d pened towards the end of January; by which the king's uncle, Philip, added to his duchy of Burgundy that county, together with those of Artois, Retel, Nevers, and several other lordships, of which he went in person to take possession †. There was a negotiation at this time carried on between the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bretagne, on one side, and the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester on the other, for a peace; but it ended only in a continu- e ance of the truce ‡. The duke of Anjou, the first of the second French line of the monarchs of Sicily, died about this time, under circumstances which have been before-mentioned; the king took his widow and his son under his protection, procured the pope to acknowledge the young prince in quality of king of the Two Sicilies, and sent an army to establish him in the county of Provence, which he held by the same title. The king being now seventeen, of a e very robust and sanguine constitution, his uncles thought it time that he should marry; and this being once declared, a great many princesses were mentioned, such as a daughter of the duke of Lancaster, a daughter of the duke of Lorraine, and several others; but the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, reflecting on the strict charge the late king had given them, that his son should espouse a princess of Germany, they were more inclined to the princess Isabella, daughter to the duke of Bavaria, of whose wit and beauty they caused a very high report to be made to their nephew §. The king declared that he would not follow the custom of princes in binding himself for life to a woman he had never seen; and therefore insisted upon an interview with this princess. This was at length stipulated should be at Amiens, where she was brought f by her aunt, the duchess of Brabant, who took care to give her all the instructions necessary for securing the heart of the young monarch, which she did so effectually at first sight, that he declared immediately his resolution to conclude a marriage, which proved equally fatal to himself and to his subjects ¶.

THE fixing and celebrating the king's marriage did not so entirely occupy the thoughts of his uncles, and other counsellors, as to take off their thoughts from the war; on the contrary, conceiving that the possession of Calais, which put it in the power of the English to make an offensive war on France at their pleasure, was the true reason why they stood upon such high terms, and would not hear of peace without the restitution of Normandy as well as Guienne,

- a they projected an invasion of England, as the most likely means to bring their enemies to reason. As this enterprize required long and vast preparations, they began early, and the port of Sluys was appointed for the place of rendezvous<sup>f</sup>. The inhabitants of Ghent, and the Flemings in general, who continued in arms against the duke of Burgundy, having intelligence of this, and having lived long in connection with the English, framed a project for burning the French fleet in the harbour. This scheme, which was so well laid by the inhabitants of Danz that it could scarce have failed, was discovered by one who had engaged in it, which so provoked the king, that he was very easily prevailed upon by the duke of Burgundy to transfer the seat of the war into the Low Countries; where having in person made himself master of that place, and punished the people severely, it so much affected the burghers of Ghent, that
- b they entered into a negotiation with the duke of Burgundy, and submitting to him on certain terms restored peace to the Low Countries<sup>g</sup>. This was a point of great consequence to the duke, who, in the management of the king's affairs, took care to make them turn to his own advantage; for having married the king to a princess of Bavaria, he from thence took an opportunity of marrying his own son to the daughter and heiress of Albert of Bavaria, count of Zealand, Hainault, and Holland, by which he secured to his family that important succession, and vastly augmented his own power, which the French patriots considered as but too great before that accession<sup>h</sup>. The same year John de Vienne, admiral of France, was sent with a powerful succour to the assistance of Robert II. king of Scots, and, in conjunction with that prince, gained considerable advantages in the north of England; so that high and well-
- c founded hopes were entertained of a peace, to be made on advantageous terms, in consequence of this diversion; but the admiral becoming amorous of one of the king's nearest relations, and his officers imitating his gallantry, they found themselves quickly upon so bad terms with their allies, that they were glad to seize the pretence of a short truce to return home, without having done any thing but discrediting their country<sup>i</sup>. Many of the French historians reproach the Scots with their coldness, stupidity, and clownishness, upon this occasion; but a modern writer very fairly owns, that the admiral and those about him were the only people to blame, and who sacrificed to their pleasures their interests and their duty<sup>k</sup>. A. D. 1385.
- d THE duke of Burgundy, who both proposed and disappointed the expedition against Eng- land, the preceding year, in order to serve his own turn in the Low Countries, was now very forward to carry it into execution. Having disposed the king's forces in such a manner as to prevent any impression from being made on his dominions, he at length assembled a very numerous army in the neighbourhood, and a prodigious fleet in the harbour, of Sluys. Some writers say twenty thousand horse, twenty thousand cross bows, and twenty thousand foot, differently armed, and, which is much more extraordinary, upwards of twelve hundred vessels<sup>l</sup>. There was besides a vast wooden edifice, or floating town, which was contrived for the protection of the soldiers when landed; and yet all these stupendous preparations, which cost so much time, trouble, and expence, and of which such great expectations had been raised, came to nothing, through the indolence of rather the obstinacy of the duke of Berry, who, having been originally against this measure, carried on his part of the armament so slowly, that he did not arrive at Sluys till the middle of September, when it was found that the season was too far advanced, and that no invasion was then practicable<sup>m</sup>. A storm that happened soon after drove the greatest part of the fleet on shore, and beat the wooden edifice all to pieces; the remains of which the king bestowed upon the duke of Burgundy, to which he also gave the port of Sluys, which was then very commodious, and of the utmost importance. This consoled him for the misfortunes of the campaign, and all kind of diversions were contrived to amuse the young king, and render him less attentive to the clamours of the people, who bore with great impatience the prodigious impositions laid upon them without pity, levied with the utmost violence, and then diverted to private uses, or squandered to no purpose<sup>n</sup>. 1386.
- f In a state weakly governed, every man, who has a high spirit and a competent proportion of power, is apt to fancy himself independent, and to act as if he really was so. The duke of Bretagne had long acted in this sort, and was much suspected of corresponding with the English; but he was possessed of great abilities as well as power, and he saw that these rendered him so much respected, that he ventured on an action as unaccountable as it was inexcusable. The constable of Cliffon had ransomed the two sons of Charles de Blois, and had given a daughter of his to the eldest, who continued to bear the arms of Bretagne, contrary to treaty; the duke resented this extremely. Having summoned an assembly of his estates, he cajoled the constable till he got him into his power, and then seized and sent him prisoner to a fortress near to the sea side, where, in the height of his passion, he more than once ordered him to be murdered, but those who received his orders were too wise to execute them : at length the duke, after obliging him to render the fortresses he had in his territory, extorted a vast sum of money from him, by way of ransom, and then set him at liberty<sup>o</sup>. The constable complaining to the king of this usage, he was inclined to do him ample justice ; but his uncles, who disliked the influence of the constable over his young master, obliged the duke to restore the fortresses, refund the money, and let the thing rest there<sup>p</sup>. At this juncture the young king of England, Richard II. had made an entire change in his administration, not without exciting great commotions amongst his subjects, of which the constable thought to take advantage, by landing with a great body of troops in his dominions ; which project was entirely overthrown by this management of the duke of Bretagne, who, it was thought, received an equivalent for the restitutions he had been obliged to make in France<sup>q</sup>.

Charles VI.
frees himself
and his subjects by assuming the government, and naming a new

THE duke of Burgundy prevented the king's attention to his own affairs the next year, by engaging him to turn his arms against the duke of Gueldres, who making a speedy submission, left Charles at liberty to return into his own kingdom, and to execute the design he had been long meditating, of becoming in fact, as well as in show, the sovereign of his people : he kept his secret till he found a favourable opportunity of doing what he proposed, and then confided it only to those who were to be employed in bringing it pass : he called a council at Rheims, at which were present his uncles, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, the princes of the blood, the constable, the archbishop of Rheims, the chancellor, and many other persons of distinction in the church and of the robe<sup>r</sup>. The king then acquainted the assembly, that he was under great obligations to his uncles, as well for the trouble they had taken in giving him instructions, as for the pains they had been at in governing the realm, but that, for the future, he was determined to discharge his duty himself, with the assistance of such a council as he should think fit to appoint. The chancellor explained the subject more at large, and then collected the opinions, beginning with the cardinal of Laon, who, in a succinct speech, approved and applauded the king's intentions, and, in shew at least, his sentiment was approved by the rest ; but the dukes of Berry and Burgundy were extremely displeased, and the cardinal being the chief object of their malice, perished soon after by poison<sup>s</sup>. Of his uncles, the king only retained the duke of Bourbon ; and the constable, the chancellor, with some other of his father's old officers, made up the new council. The face of affairs was immediately changed ; a truce with England was concluded for three years, that the king might have leisure to look strictly into the state of his affairs, and to give what ease he could to his people<sup>t</sup>. He began by reforming the parliament and his household, lessened the number and expence of both, restored the liberties and privileges of Paris, abolished taxes and imposts, received whatever petitions were brought him, and redressed grievances of every kind with such alacrity, as plainly shewed, however his name might be employed, they did not take their rise from him<sup>u</sup>. As all historians agree he was the best made, the best bred, and the best tempered man in his dominions, it is easy to conceive that, by this change of measures, he became highly popular, insomuch that his subjects bestowed on him the surname of the Well-beloved, which he certainly deserved. He was so far from being suspicious, that the most malevolent insinuations made no impression on him ; " I had rather (said he) believe well of an ill man, than run the hazard of conceiving an ill opinion of one who behaves well." Being told that a courtier, to whom he had been very kind, spoke amiss of him, he answered, without emotion, " It cannot be true ; for how can a man speak evil of us who have done him much good ?" He had a very retentive memory, and as he passed through the streets, upon public occasions, not only returned the salutes of private persons, but spoke to them by their names, and enquired after their families. With all this affability there was nothing of artifice, and though he made many promises he never failed to make them good. So many good qualities scarce ever centered in one who made so indifferent a prince<sup>v</sup>.

HE loved spectacles ; and to indulge this humour caused the queen to make a public entry into Paris, after which she was crowned with great solemnity : he then made a tour to Avignon, where he saw his cousin Lewis, duke of Anjou, crowned by pope Clement king of the Two Sicilies. In his return he examined strictly into the state of affairs in Languedoc, received all applications to him graciously, and, in redressing grievances, forgot that the duke of Berry, who was the author of most of them, was his uncle, though he treated him upon all occasions with great personal respect<sup>x</sup>. In this progress also he visited the count de Foix, Gaston Phœbus, one of the most accomplished princes of that age ; or, as others say, he was visited by him at Thoulouse. He was so well pleased with the respect shewn him by a Charles, that, having no children, he declared him his heir: and as he died soon after suddenly, the king might have annexed that county to the domains of the crown, if he had not, at the intercession of the duke of Berry, regarded the rights of the count's nephew; yet the duke had not interest enough to preserve his own government, which the king gave away, to prevent his revenging himself upon those who had laid open his tyranny and oppression<sup>y</sup>. The same year his brother the duke of Touraine, afterwards duke of Orleans, espoused Valentina, daughter to the duke of Milan, and his cousin german, after a great disappointment in regard to the heiress of Hungary, to whom he was contracted, and who by real or pretended force was prevailed on to espouse another prince<sup>z</sup>. A. D. 1389.

THE king, who was of a very active disposition, who delighted in feats of arms, and who was desirous of distinguishing himself in the field, had often great enterprizes in his head. Sometimes he thought of marching against Bajazet, emperor of the Turks; at other times he proposed putting an end to the schism which had subsisted for so many years, by putting pope Clement the seventh, who resided at Avignon, in possession of Rome: but his ministers, and more especially the constable, shewed him so clearly what dreadful consequences would follow in case he embarked in either of these enterprizes, that, being convinced, he acquiesced in their council. But they sent troops to the assistance of the Genoese, and other allies, and shewed all possible attention to whatever concerned, even in a distant degree, the honour of the crown<sup>a</sup>. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy, though they kept within the bounds of their duty, were extremely mortified by their exclusion from court, which they attributed entirely to the constable; and by their contrivance at least, if not encouragement, the duke of Bretagne made no great haste in the performance of his treaty, and particularly in restoring the lands which belonged to the count de Pentbievre, son-in-law to the constable; upon which he invaded the territory of the duke, and great disorders were committed on both sides<sup>b</sup>. The duke of Lancaster came over to negotiate a peace, in which finding much more difficulty than he expected, he contented himself with renewing the truce for another year. The death of the duchess of Orleans gave the king an opportunity of bestowing on his brother that title and duchy, not much to the satisfaction of the inhabitants, who were very unwilling to fall under the dominion of a prince of the blood<sup>c</sup>. This was chiefly owing to what had happened to the people of Languedoc, under the administration of the duke of Berry, and what they were still like to suffer; for that prince had obliged the baron de Chevreuse, his successor, to leave it, and resign the government into the king's hands, by threats of causing him to be assassinated<sup>d</sup>. At length, not without difficulty, the king restored peace on the side of Bretagne, or rather suspended the war; for the duke remained the irreconcilable enemy of the constable, who was no less hated by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, all the malecontents referring their supposed grievances to him, because he was at the head of the council, and stood highest in the king's favour; and because that, from being a private gentleman, he had raised himself by his merit to such high honours, and by his prudence and œconomy had acquired an immense fortune; which his enemies not only envied, but in case of a confiscation were in hopes they might share<sup>e</sup>. 1390.

AMONGST the lords who made a figure at court, there was one Peter Craon, a man of parts and pleasure, but very profligate. He had been the confidant of the regent duke of Anjou, and was intrusted to bring him supplies of money when he was in Italy; but he betrayed his trust, and lavished in his debaucheries at Venice, what should have supported his master and his friends at Naples, who perished for want of it<sup>f</sup>. At his return to France he was prosecuted, and paid a large fine; but being well with the rakes at court, and becoming the declared favourite of the duke of Orleans, he had more credit than ever. The knowledge he had of that prince's intrigues proved his ruin; for, hoping to gain the esteem of the duchess, he informed her of some things; she, to bring about a reconciliation, gave him up to the duke, who would have had him assassinated; but the whole tale coming to the king's ears, he forbid him the court, and ordered him to retire to his own estate, which he did<sup>g</sup>. There, distracted with his disgrace, which he attributed entirely to the constable, he took the cruel resolution of murdering him, and having dispatched a band of assassins, one by one, to Paris, he followed them thither. As the constable returned from court about midnight, with a few attendants, he attacked him with his band of ruffians, and left him for dead, after they had given him fifty wounds<sup>h</sup>. Craon making his escape fled into Bretagne, where the duke, out of enmity to the constable, received and protected him. In a month's time that great man recovered, to the amazement of the court, and to the great joy of the king.

king his master, who caused such of the assassins as could be seized to be put to death, condemned Craon to the like punishment, causing his house to be demolished, which has since been converted into a church-yard <sup>i</sup>.

The king
marching into Bretagne, is attacked with a sudden phrensy.

THE king having demanded Craon to be sent him in chains by the duke of Bretagne, that prince answered that he knew nothing of him; to which the king yielding no credit, marched with all the forces he could collect into his territories, notwithstanding the pains taken by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy to appease him, who, after being so long kept from court, were recalled to accompany him in this expedition <sup>k</sup>. The army arriving at Mans, the king was seized with a slow fever, but could not be prevailed upon to rest or take physic. On the fifth of August, having marched all day in the heat of the sun, a miserable, ragged, wild-looking fellow, darted from behind a tree, and laying hold of the bridle of his horse, cried out, "Stop! where are you going king? you are betrayed," and immediately withdrew again into the wood. The king passing on, not a little disturbed, it happened that one of the pages who rode behind him and carried his lance, overcome with heat, fell asleep, and let it fall upon the helmet which was carried by the other; the king hearing a tinkling noise, looked behind, and seeing the page lifting the spear killed him immediately; then riding furiously with his sword drawn, he struck on every side and at every body, till having broke his sword, one of his gentlemen leaped up behind him and held his arm <sup>l</sup>. He fell soon after, and lay as if he had been dead; so that being taken up and tied in a waggon, he was carried back to Mans, where he fell into a lethargy that lasted for two days, and then he came a little to himself <sup>m</sup>. This accident put an end to the war. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy seized the government, excluding the duke of Orleans, whom his brother, at the time he became frantic, had like to have killed. At their return to Paris they sent the king's principal ministers to several prisons, bestowed the office of constable on Philip de Artois, count d'Eu, Oliver de Clifson having retired into Bretagne, where he defended his lands against the duke with such spirit and courage, as at length forced him to seek a reconciliation <sup>n</sup>. In the winter the king so far recovered, as to save the lives of his ministers, whom his uncles had procured to be condemned, but he was obliged to banish them, to gratify those in whose hands he was <sup>o</sup>.

His indisposition is augmented by another singular
and unfortunate accident.

HISTORY scarce affords any parallel of a court or country more corrupt, and at the same time more miserable, than that of this unfortunate prince and his subjects, in consequence of his misfortune: all was discord and confusion, intrigues, debauchery, and dissension. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy ruled the kingdom, excluding the duke of Orleans, under pretence of his youth, from any share in the government, and even from the shadow of power. It was not so with his duchess, the daughter of the duke of Milan, and the grand-daughter of king John; young, beautiful, and insinuating, she acquired such an empire over the king, that she governed him at her pleasure; and, which is more extraordinary, it was she only that could govern him, for in the time of his malady he knew nobody else, not even the queen <sup>p</sup>. This offended the duchess of Burgundy extremely, who could not endure to see so much court paid to that princess, for the sake of the influence she had over the distempered king; and, as is too frequently the case, the quarrels between the wives extended themselves to their husbands, and produced that furious and implacable hatred, which in its effects was so pernicious, and in the end was very near proving destructive to France. To render the duchess of Orleans odious to the people, it was given out that she had bewitched the king, and, to heighten the odium, it was laid that the duke of Orleans had also bewitched the queen. But the most candid writers confess, that there was no ground to suspect any other kind of magic than what flowed from the assiduity of the young and handsome, when unrestrained by principle or sentiment they give a loose to their passions. When the king, through the care of his physician, seemed to be tolerably well recovered, another unlucky and unforeseen accident deprived him again of his senses <sup>q</sup>. The queen married one of her ladies of honour, a German, to a person of distinction about the court, and the marriage was to be kept with great solemnity at the palace of the queen dowager, relict of Philip de Valois. Amongst other amusements there was to be a masque, which gave occasion to some young lords to appear in the dress of savages, made of linen, which sat close to their bodies, covered with rosin, which while hot had been powdered over with down, that they might appear like satyrs; the count de Joigny, Jobain natural son to the count de Foix, the son of the count de Valentinois, Nantouillet, and Guisai, one of the esquires of the body, were of this party, and the king made the sixth <sup>r</sup>. This trivial secret was so well kept, that, when they came to the ball, they were not known, but their whim was mightily applauded; the duchess of Berry, seeing him robust and well-made, a laid hold of the king, and told him she would not part with him till she knew who he was. In the mean time the other five began the dance, when the duke of Orleans, out of levity, making a shew of running a lighted torch against one of the savages, set his habit on fire, which quickly communicated the flame to the rest, and changed this scene of wanton mirth into sorrow and distress.

In the midst of their torments, the masks roared out continually save the king, save the king. The duchess of Berry immediately recollected that he must be the mask which stood by her, and thereupon throwing her robes over him, and wrapping them close about him, put out the fire: Nantouillet, by jumping into a cistern of water, saved his life; the other four were so terribly burnt that they died in two days; and the king was so much affected with the fright and with grief, that it caused a relapse<sup>a</sup>. After this the king had four or five fits every year to the time of his death. He grew heavy and uneasy the evening before the fit, and the next morning, as he awaked, appeared either furious or foolish. Sometimes he was boisterous and cruel, at others melancholy and full of tears; and sometimes he would laugh and play like a child, but knew nobody, and would take nothing, save only the duchess of Orleans, and from her hands<sup>b</sup>. In his lucid intervals his uncles took care to amuse him with diversions of every kind, and, to the utmost of their power, hindered his addicting himself at all to business, under colour of concern for his health: this was of a piece with their politics in the time of his minority; but they acted more wisely in another respect, since, contenting themselves with the annual and entire revenue of the crown, they did not, as before, oppress the people with taxes; and perceiving that the passion which prevailed at court for gaming began to extend itself into the provinces, they took care, by good laws, to stop the progress of this malady, and to substitute martial and manly exercises, instead of such methods of consuming their leisure time<sup>c</sup>. They shewed likewise great respect to the parliament, which now began to sit through the year, with only some short vacations, according to the regulations prescribed by the king, who made several other rules, that were so prudent and useful as to be ever since retained<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1393.

THE government of France did all that lay in their power to compose the schism that had so long disturbed the church, and laboured earnestly to persuade the two popes to resign their dignities, to facilitate a measure of so great importance. But the pontiffs, who never could agree in any thing before, understood each other's mind in this, and concerted their excuses so well, that Clement, who resided at Avignon, died in possession of the papal character; and, notwithstanding the opposition of the crowned heads, the cardinals of his faction chose Peter de Luna, a Spaniard, who assumed the name of Benedict the thirteenth, and proved even more intractable than his predecessor<sup>e</sup>. The truce with England was prolonged from time to time, till at length king Richard II. found it expedient to marry the princess Elizabeth, the daughter of Charles, though a child; upon which they had an interview with each other, and concluded a truce for thirty years. On this occasion Charles prevailed upon the king of England to restore the important fortrefs of Brest to the duke of Bretagne, who had mortgaged it to his grandfather for an immense sum of money: he also redeemed Cherbourg in Normandy, which belonged to Charles the Noble, king of Navarre, to whom he gave the duchy of Nemours, as an equivalent for his estates in that province, and for all his other pretensions<sup>f</sup>. On the other hand, the king of England procured the pardon of Peter Craon, and the restitution of his lands, who, at his return to Paris, shewed himself a most exemplary penitent, and employed his revenues in making satisfaction to a multitude of persons whom he had injured<sup>g</sup>. The Genoese, wearied with domestic troubles and foreign wars, put themselves under the protection of France<sup>h</sup>. On the contrary, the count of Perigord having assembled a considerable body of troops, made use of them to subdue by force several places to which he had pretensions, without respecting the arrears of parliament, or the king's orders. One of the marshals of France being sent against him, beat his troops, besieged him in one of his fortresses, and, having constrained him to surrender, carried him prisoner to Paris, where his process was quickly made, in consequence of which he was condemned to lose his head and his lands. The duke of Orleans interposed, and by that means preserved the one and acquired the other; for this young prince was yet more violent and more rapacious than his uncles, and one way or other had amassed prodigious wealth, besides many counties and seigniories, omitting nothing that could extend his power or augment his wealth<sup>i</sup>.

pretence, since he had carried away by force, and espoused, the heiress of Hungary, at a time when she was contracted to the duke of Orleans<sup>c</sup>. However, the great humility of the application having effaced the memory of the affront, the flower of the French nobility marched to his assistance. At the head of these forces was John, duke of Nevers, eldest son to the duke of Burgundy, the count de Eu, constable of France, the count de la Marche, prince of the blood, the marshal de Boucicaut, the sieur de Coucy, John de Vienne, admiral of France, the princes of Bar, the sieurs Sempi and Tremouille, Rainald de Roie, with upwards of two thousand gentlemen, at their own expence. It is agreed, that there never appeared a body of troops better equipped, more warlike, or more wicked<sup>d</sup>. They forced king Sigismund to fight the Turks at great disadvantage; the battle was lost entirely through their imprudence, in which the admiral John de Vienne was killed on the spot; the count de Eu,<sup>b</sup> and the sieur de Coucy died in prison; the count de Nevers, the marshal de Boucicaut, and the rest of the princes, were ransomed at a vast expence, which did not displease the duke of Burgundy his father, who, under colour of his son's ransom, levied twice as much upon the people<sup>e</sup>. This was the famous defeat of Nicopolis, which rendered the French equally odious in the eyes of the Turks and of their own allies. The office of constable was bestowed on the marshal de Sancerre<sup>f</sup>. The next year the king had more frequent returns of his malady than ever, and was once surprized so suddenly, that he called to the duke of Burgundy to take his dagger from his side; adding, "I had rather die than injure any of my subjects." His daughter the princess Mary, a child of five years old, was sent to a nunnery, in pursuance of the king's vow; and the queen dowager Blanch of Navarre, widow of Philip de Valois, died universally regretted<sup>g</sup>.

THE emperor Wenceslaus made a tour into France, in order to visit the king, and to concert measures for obliging pope Benedict to resign, as the only effectual means for putting an end to the schism; but the king being attacked by his disease, during the emperor's residence at court, the projects concerted with him came to nothing. The marshal de Boucicaut, however, was sent to besiege the pope in his palace, which he did, but with very little effect; for the duke of Orleans, merely because he was attacked by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, became his protector, and in the king's lucid intervals set aside what they did by their own authority at other times<sup>h</sup>. Henry earl of Derby, son to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, having been banished from England, after visiting other foreign countries came<sup>d</sup> into France, where he was received very kindly, and treated with great marks of esteem; but returning into England, under pretence of demanding his inheritance on the death of his father, he found the affections of the people so much alienated from the king his cousin, that he found it no difficult matter to depose Richard, and to seat himself on his throne<sup>i</sup>. The French were not much disturbed at this event, because they flattered themselves that the people of Guienne, and more especially the inhabitants of Bordeaux, where Richard was born, and where he was still exceedingly beloved, would have revolted. But they found themselves mistaken; upon which the king sent the sieur Albret to king Henry to demand his daughter, who with some difficulty was restored; but, as the French writers say, no part of her dowry was returned. The next year died John the Valiant, duke of Bretagne, full of years,<sup>e</sup> and covered with glory<sup>k</sup>.

HE left his children to the protection of the duke of Burgundy, and to the care of his old enemy, but older friend, Oliver de Clisson, who, after his disgrace at the court of France, retired to his own estate in Bretagne, where, with the troops which his own reputation and the assistance of his friends, particularly of the duke of Orleans, enabled him to assemble, he defended himself so gallantly against the duke, that he proposed a truce and a conference, and sent his son to Clisson as a hostage for his safety. Clisson complied with the invitation, and carried the young prince with him. The duke, amazed and confounded at this act of generosity, after what had passed between them, frankly granted him his own terms, and ever after confided in him as his best friend, leaving to him the regency of his dominions when he went to the court of France, and, as the highest testimony of esteem, the care of his children at his death<sup>l</sup>. How well he merited this act of confidence immediately appeared. He was himself ill, and kept his bed at the time of the duke's death. His daughter the countess of Penthièvre, who had married the competitor to the late duke, proposed to him roundly dispatching the duke's children to make room for her own. Instead of making her an answer, Clisson laid hold of the javelin that stood at the head of his bed, and threw it after her as she ran down stairs; she tumbling through fear and haste broke her thigh, and, by<sup>f</sup> her lameness ever after, testified her father's honour and her own disgrace<sup>m</sup>. The duke's eldest son succeeded, and from his care received an excellent education.

WENCESLAUS, emperor of Germany, being deposed by the electors, who sent the duke of Bavaria, the queen's father, to the court of France, to justify what they had done, the duke of Orleans, notwithstanding his regard for the queen, declared in favour of Wenceslaus, and led an army into Germany to restore him; but having secured the duchy of Luxembourg, which that prince had sold him, and finding that Wenceslaus himself was content with the kingdom of Bobemia, he returned without performing any thing of importance<sup>n</sup>. About this time also the marshal de Boucicaut returned from Constantinople, which city he most gallantly defended against the Turks; and not long after came the emperor Manuel Paleologus himself, to intreat further assistance against Bajazet; from whom, for the present, he was delivered by the famous Tamerlane, who, after his victory, is said to have written letters to king Charles, and to have made a treaty with the crown of France. Archambaud de Grailly, brother to the famous captal de Buch, by the death of the count de Foix, inherited that country: but having taken possession of it without the king's consent, the constable was sent against him with an army; and though he was not very successful, yet the count thought fit to come to Paris, where having made great submission, and done homage to the king, he was received into high favour, the rather, because he frankly declared that he never would have quitted the English interest, but for the murder of Richard of Bourdeaux, the son of his beloved master the black Prince<sup>o</sup>. The king's disease was now grown to such a height, that, even during his lucid intervals, his brain was so weak, that it was improper to trouble him with business. In this situation he granted commissions to the proper officers, for executing justice and expediting public affairs<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Burgundy making a tour into his own dominions, the duke and duchess of Orleans made so good use of that opportunity, and of the influence they had over the king and queen, that they prevailed upon Charles, who was then in his senses, to grant a commission, creating the duke his brother lieutenant-general and governor of the realm, at such times as, through the visitation of God, he was himself unable to administer public affairs<sup>q</sup>. The duke of Orleans, in virtue of this commission, imposed a general and heavy tax, from which even the ecclesiastics were not exempted: the weather being very unseasonable, and the scarcity of necessaries great throughout the whole kingdom, this gave the duke of Burgundy great advantage, inasmuch as, at his return, he avowed publickly in parliament, that what was alleged of his consent to that edict was an absolute falsity, since, notwithstanding an offer had been made him of an enormous sum of money, he had constantly refused it<sup>r</sup>. The two dukes arming, and each of them having his allies, the kingdom was in great danger of being torn by a civil war. At length the duke of Bourbon interfering as their common friend, engaged them both to quit the court till things could be adjusted. When the king was next in health he put the question in his council, his uncle and his brother being absent, so that their votes were free; in which situation the majority of votes was for the duke of Burgundy<sup>s</sup>.

In quality of tutor to the young duke of Bretagne and his brothers, the duke of Burgundy certainly rendered a very considerable service to the crown of France, by bringing the three young princes, John, Arthur, and Giles, to Paris, which entirely defeated the views of Henry IV. of England, who, by marrying their mother the duchess dowager, had in view strengthening the English interest in Bretagne<sup>t</sup>. The duke of Orleans, who, though inferior in age and prudence, was to the full as ambitious as the duke of Burgundy, sent a challenge to king Henry; who answered, that, as a king, he could not take notice of such letters if they did not come from a crowned head. The duke replied that he was no king, but a traitor, a murderer of his prince, and a usurper. Henry rejoined in the same language, that the duke was a turbulent and ambitious prince, who had bewitched his brother, that he might seize the royal authority, which he was unable to manage. These disputes occasioned animosities, and even hostilities, between the two nations; which, though entirely founded in pique and self-interest, yet both sides endeavoured to colour by specious pretences<sup>u</sup>. The French exclaimed, that the marriage portion received with queen Isabel was not restored, which the English admitted, but offered to deduct it out of what was still due for king John's ransom<sup>v</sup>. The constable Sancerre dying, the king bestowed the sword upon Charles, lord of Albret, his cousin, a young man, very nobly born, but without experience. The queen was delivered of a son, who succeeded afterwards to the crown<sup>w</sup>. The marshal de Boucicaut was sent to command in Genoa, where he governed with so much severity that he rendered

The death of the duke of Milan, father to the duchess of Orleans,<sup>a</sup> weakened the interest of the French in Italy; and the schism still continuing, served to disturb and distract their affairs; so that the residence of one of the pretenders to the papacy at Avignon did them no good<sup>y</sup>.

THE close correspondence between the duke of Orleans and the queen, which was not without scandal, enabled them, however, to maintain their authority, and to plunder the people, which they did without mercy. On the other hand, the duke of Burgundy, either grown wiser from experience, or out of a desire of opposing them, was a constant enemy to the imposition of new taxes, and laboured all he could to relieve and protect the people; and this occasioned his death, which happened at Hall in Hainault, to be exceedingly regretted<sup>z</sup> (E). He was succeeded in the greatest part of his dominions by his son John,<sup>b</sup> count of Nevers, who, in point of ambition, was equal, in courage superior, but in abilities, or at least in moderation, very unlike his father. The queen and the duke of Orleans excluded him entirely from the government; and if they had acted with any tolerable temper and prudence, they might very probably have preserved the authority they had gained; but while they had nothing so much at heart as this, they acted as if it had been their intention to lose it. They took all possible methods, mean as well as oppressive, to amass wealth, and, when they had acquired it, they spent it as unworthily<sup>a</sup>. The queen was said to send large sums into Germany, that, in case of any accident, she might have wherewithal to subsist: as for the duke, he was continually purchasing lands, though he would never pay his debts. Their courts were numerous and splendid, while those of the king and his children were so ill provided, that the people began to murmur. The king, in one of his lucid intervals, hearing how his children were used, sent for the dauphin's governess, and upon her owning that they sometimes wanted food, and often cloaths, the king, fetching a deep sigh, gave her a gold cup, out of which he drank, adding, that pomp was ridiculous where necessities were wanting<sup>b</sup>. He ordered, however, a general council to be called of all the princes of the blood, to which the duke of Burgundy was expressly summoned. He came accompanied with a considerable force; and then the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the kings of Navarre and Sicily, declared openly against the queen and the duke of Orleans, who thereupon

(E) Philip the Hardy, duke of Burgundy, was going to take possession of the duchy of Brabant, in the name of his second son, when he was seized with an epidemic distemper, which then prevailed, at an inn, that had for its sign the great hart, in the town of Hall in Hainault, where he deceased on the 27th of April, 1404, in the sixty-third year of his age. He was the favourite of his father; and some historians have thought it a weakness in his brother Charles the Wise, that he so earnestly laboured to procure him the heiress of Flanders, by which he became at least as rich, and very near as potent, as himself. These historians did not certainly consider, that, in whatever light it appeared to them, both king John and his son Charles the Wise esteemed it a great act of policy; and it is but reasonable to suppose, that, in their own times, they could judge better of their own affairs than we at this distance. It may not be amiss to observe, that his consort Margaret, daughter to Lewis III. count of Flanders, though a maid, was the widow of Philip de Rouvre, the last duke of Burgundy, of the former line; so that it was probably with a view to this match, and at the same time to gratify the affection that he had for his favourite son, that, after solemnly uniting Burgundy to the crown of France, king John separated it again in favour of Philip, though he did not live long enough to accomplish this marriage. Lewis, count of Flanders, had been always in the English interest, and proposed marrying his heiress to one of the sons of Edward III. which he knew would have been very acceptable to his subjects, and which, as Charles the Wise very rightly foresaw, would sooner or later have been the ruin of France; which shews us that, after all, his confirming the duchy to, and procuring this marriage for, his brother, was no such solecism in politics as has been pretended. Yet, whether a right or wrong step, it had never been compassed but for the zeal of the young heiress's grandmother, who was so zealous in the cause of her country, which was France, that she told the count her son, if he persisted in his design of marrying his daughter to a son of Edward, she would cut off the breast that suckled him; which shews what a point was made of this marriage, and of what consequence it was esteemed. By this marriage he became very powerful, and had as large a revenue as any monarch of his time; but he had a mind still greater than his fortune, and the magnificence with which he lived swallowed up all, inasmuch that, when he came to be buried, as he was with great magnificence in the chartreuse at Dijon, of which he was founder, the duchess his widow, according to the practice of those times, took off her girdle, with the purse and bunch of keys hanging to it, and laid it by his effigies, which had been carried in state, signifying thereby that she renounced, for herself and children, all claim to his personal estate, which came to, and was divided amongst, his creditors. Philip the Hardy had by this princess three sons and as many daughters; John, who succeeded him in the duchy and county of Burgundy; Anthony, who became duke of Brabant and Limburg; and Philip, who became count of Nevers and Rethel; Margaret, who was the second consort of William of Bavaria, count of Holland and Zealand; Mary, who espoused Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy; and Katherine, who became the consort of Leopold III. duke of Austria. It is necessary to observe, that Margaret, his widow, died of an apoplexy, on the 20th of March following, at the age of fifty-five; on which her son John, duke of Burgundy, succeeded to Flanders, and all its dependencies, which rendered him as formidable as ever his father had been, and inspired him with the hopes of governing France in the same manner he had done, without considering that himself was the cousin only to the reigning monarch, whereas his father Philip was his uncle.

a withdrew to Melun, and attempted to carry away the dauphin and the king's children: but the duke of Burgundy, to whose daughter he was contracted, and whose son was to marry his sister, pursued and brought him back<sup>c</sup>. Things continued for some time in very great disorder, inasmuch that a civil war was apprehended; the duke of Orleans's party having attacked the duke of Berry in his house in the night; but being repulsed, and finding his party too weak, and himself too much hated, to do any thing by force, he acquiesced in a provision, that, during the times of the king's absence (which was a phrase they made use of to express his madness), the kingdom should be governed by a council of state, composed of the princes of the blood; upon which a kind of outside reconciliation ensued<sup>d</sup>. A. D. 1405.

As the two dukes continued to hate one another as passionately as ever, and were reciprocally framing plots to each other's prejudice, the other princes of the blood persuaded them rather to shew their courage and their power by expelling the English out of the kingdom: pursuant to this advice, the duke of Orleans marched into Guienne, where the constable had already taken several places, and extorted a great sum of money from the inhabitants of Bordeaux; and the duke of Burgundy at the same time, at the head of very numerous forces, entered Picardy<sup>e</sup>. They could not have a more favourable opportunity of achieving what they proposed; for Henry IV. found himself so embarrassed by secret conspiracies and open rebellions, that it was not in his power to carry on the war with France as he would otherwise have done. Yet both the princes failed; the duke of Orleans rising before Blaye, which he had besieged, and, on his return to Paris, procuring the king's orders to the duke of Burgundy to quit the siege of Calais, in which he had made very little progress<sup>f</sup>. These disappointments made the princes more furious; the duke of Burgundy attributing his disgrace entirely to the duke of Orleans, and the latter affirming, that, during his campaign in Guienne, he had not been properly supplied with money: new intrigues were commenced, new violences committed, and a new civil war was on the point of breaking out, when the duke of Berry interposed, who had been very ill treated by the duke of Orleans, and who had no great cause to be satisfied with the duke of Burgundy: but they were both his nephews, and his intercession was so cordial, and his whole conduct so impartial, that, overcome with his importunities, they consented to a reconciliation, which was sealed with the solemn rites of the altar, both of them swearing, in the presence of God, to live in perfect friendship and fraternal unity for the future<sup>g</sup>. Within three days after this solemn act, the duke of Orleans being, as usual, at the queen's lodgings, where he spent his evenings, a person came in haste to inform him that the king desired to speak with him immediately, on an affair of importance; the duke, mounted on his mule, preceded by two pages, and followed only by two of his domestics, set out for the Hotel de St. Pol, where the king lodged, and in his passage was attacked by a company of about twenty ruffians, commanded by one whom he had removed from a trifling office in the king's service, who with his pole ax cut off his hand that rested on the side of his mule<sup>h</sup>. He cried out immediately, "I am the duke of Orleans!" It is he, replied the assassin, for whom we wait, and with a second blow cleft his skull. One of his servants, a Fleming, endeavoured to cover his body with his own, and was dispatched with him. The assassins then made their escape with such expedition and address, that they were none of them known<sup>i</sup>. This execrable action was committed on the twenty-third, or, as some say, on the twenty-second of November. The author for some days was not known or suspected, appearing publicly, and assisting at the funeral of the duke (F). But the provost of Paris being sent for by the council, to know what discoveries

(F) Lewis of France, duke of Orleans, count of Valois, Luxembourg, d'Ast, Blois, Dunois, Beaumont, d'Angoulême, Perigord, Dreux, Soissons, Vertus, Portien, and Poitiers, lord of Cussy, Montargis, d'Epernai, and Chateauthierry, was in his person the most amiable man of his time, more elegant and less robust than the king his brother. He had great natural parts, and these were improved by a good education, under the care of his uncle the duke of Bourbon; so that he was, in all respects, a most accomplished prince: but thro' the licentiousness and corruption of the times, his manners were wholly spoiled, and he had not only great but opposite vices. He was ambitious and indolent at the same time, avaricious to a degree of rapacity, and yet profuse to the utmost degree of extravagance; amassing all he could, and by all means; but so void of justice, that he paid nobody, and treated his creditors with scorn and ridicule. By fits, and as he was alarmed by any untoward accident, religious, we should have said superstitious, but that his last will plainly shews, in his serious moments, he made a right judgment of things, knowing very well that foundations and alms were not acts of piety, when not accompanied with justice and equity: but his great vice was women; and, as if this had not been sufficient to render him odious, he is said to have kept a cabinet, in which were the pictures of his mistresses, and to have celebrated his success in amours by poems and songs. The scandal he was under, with respect to the queen, did him great hurt, and the violent methods he took to enrich himself made him universally hated. On the other hand, his duchess Valentine, who was wonderfully handsome, had a great deal of wit, and such an ascendancy over the king, that she alone was known to and approached veries or what enquiries he had made, he demanded leave to search the houses of the princes themselves, which was given him<sup>k</sup>. The king of the Two Sicilies looking at this time upon the duke of Burgundy, saw him change countenance; and soon after he confessed to that prince, and to the duke of Berry, that it was by his order the duke of Orleans was killed; upon which they advised him to retire, which he did, accompanied only by five persons. The admiral assembled a company of one hundred and twenty knights, with whom he would have pursued him, but the council interposed, and obliged him to desist<sup>l</sup>. The duke of Bourbon expressed great displeasure that he was not arrested; and equally abhorring the wickedness of some, and ashamed of the pusillanimity of others, left the court, and retired to his own estate. The council being informed that the duke of Burgundy was raising troops, and had published a manifesto, in which he avowed and justified the murder, were much alarmed. The king, who had a long lucid interval, went to the parliament, and held his bed of justice on the twenty-sixth of December, and there published an edict, by which he directed that the eldest sons of France, of what age soever, at the time of their accession, should be esteemed kings, anointed and crowned, and that all public acts should run in their name, and not in that of any regent whatever<sup>m</sup>. This seems to have been calculated to secure the crown to his sons, then all of them children.

The duke of Burgundy comes and forces the diseased king to grant him a pardon.

THE duke of Berry, and other great lords, were sent to persuade him not to add the insult on the king's authority to the death of the duke of Orleans, but to qualify things in the best manner possible, and to demand in general terms a royal pardon. The duke making use of his superior force, rejected all propositions of accommodation, marched triumphantly to Paris, demanded and forced an audience from the king, insisted upon justifying himself publicly, which he did by the mouth of his apologist Dr. John Petit, who, in the presence of the dauphin and the princes of the blood, defamed the deceased duke of Orleans as a tyrant and a traitor, inferring from thence, that, instead of considering the duke of Burgundy as a criminal, they ought to respect him as the king's best subject, and the deliverer of the kingdom<sup>n</sup>. This was heard with silence and secret dislike; and the queen and most of the princes of the blood withdrawing, the duke, who had the king in his power, obtained from him as full a pardon as he could desire or devise. He was not satisfied with this, but obliged him likewise to remove the admiral, and to appoint the Sieur de Chatillon to that office, who was in his interest<sup>o</sup>. A sedition at Liege, where the people had expelled his brother-in-law, who pretended to be their bishop without being a priest, induced the duke of Burgundy to march with all his forces to his assistance. On his retiring from Paris, the queen and the princes of the blood returned with what forces they could raise, and sent for the duchess dowager of Orleans, who entered with a great train all in deep mourning. A week after came the young duke, who had espoused the queen dowager in England, with the same marks of distress; the process against the duke of Burgundy was formed in the accustomed manner, his pardon declared null and void, and himself a public enemy<sup>p</sup>. As this change was very sudden and surprizing, so it lasted not long; for the duke of Burgundy having defeated the people in Liege, slain twenty thousand of them in the field, and left his brother-in-law, who stiled himself bishop, to murder some thousands more, for having dared to dispute his claim to that title, returned once more into France, with a numerous army<sup>q</sup>. At first the queen and the princes of the blood thought of fortifying Paris, of raising an army and meeting him in the field; but finding the citizens were most of them in his interest, and that it would be difficult to raise the supplies necessary for carrying on a war, they judged it more prudent to retire, with what forces they had, to Tours, which they executed with great prudence, and carried the king with them. The duke of Burgundy sent the count of Hainault to treat with the queen and dauphin, to whom the king had committed the management of public affairs<sup>r</sup>. He was well received, and sent back with the lord Montague, who had the direction of the finances, and who offered to him, as the final resolution of the court, two pro-approached him safely in his madness, fell under a greater load of odium than he, from the vulgar persuasion, that she had enchanted him, as if beauty, wit, and youth, stood in need of magic. The clamour, however, ran sometimes so high, that she was obliged to be absent from court, where she was not much beloved by the queen, and mortally hated by duchess of Burgundy. By this princess, when murdered in the flower of his age, the duke of Orleans left three sons and one daughter; Charles, duke of Orleans; the count of Vertus, contracted to the daughter of the duke of Bur- gundy, but not married, who left only a natural son, stiled the bastard of Vertus; and John count of Angoulême. The daughter, Margaret, became the wife of Richard, count of Eslampes, son to John V. duke of Bretagne. This duchess Valentine survived the duke little more than a year, and is much celebrated for her affection for his natural son John, stiled the bastard of Orleans, whom he had by Mariette de Enghein, the wife of Aubert de Cani, a gentleman of Picardy, of whom we shall have occasion to speak very largely in the course of this history.

a positions; first, that he should make a clear and satisfactory submission to the king in public, and next, that he should abstain from coming into his presence for some years; which offer he rejected with contempt, and so terrified Montague, that, to make his peace, he promised to render him all the service that was in his power<sup>1</sup>. The duke proceeding to Paris, entered it with his forces; and having remained there for some time, received, by the indefatigable endeavours of Montague, such terms as he thought fit to accept, and which perhaps had not been obtained, if the duchess dowager of Orleans had not died of grief<sup>2</sup>. But, notwithstanding he gave law in this manner to the king and the princes of his family, he lost that credit which hitherto he had maintained through the greatest part of his kingdom, by the licentious behaviour of his troops, and by the miseries which this civil war occasioned, which was now imputed to his ambition, and the desire he had of ruling all<sup>3</sup>.

A SUBMISSION in general words to the king, and a desire of being reconciled to the duke of Orleans and his brothers, expressed in the same manner, and supported by a short declaration from the duke himself, that the person who spoke them expressed his sense, was all that could be exacted from the duke of Burgundy: but in hopes of rendering real a reconciliation, supported by solemn oaths and promises, not only of the parties, but of the princes and great lords on both sides, the duke of Burgundy gave his daughter to the duke of Vertus, brother to the duke of Orleans, with an annuity of four thousand livres, and a portion of 150,000 crowns in ready money<sup>4</sup>. The whole court returned to Paris, where the duke of Burgundy finding it extremely difficult to maintain himself by mere dint of superior force, began to practise on the princes, and by a great shew of respect drew over the duke of Berry, as, by fair promises of doing him justice, he also did Charles the Noble, king of Navarre, who had been neglected and hardly treated. The queen, seeing the duke's authority so well supported, practised in her turn on the mind of the dauphin, and engaged him to retire with her to Melun<sup>5</sup>. The duke took the occasion of her absence, and a relapse of the king, to seize the lord of Montague, master of the king's household, who had the supreme direction of the finances. This man was immensely rich, excessively vain, and universally hated; his process was made, the rack forced him to become an evidence against himself, and, being thus convicted, he was publicly beheaded. At the time of his death he declared his confession to be false, and extorted by pain; vindicated the memory of the duke of Orleans, and shewed more firmness than could have been expected from his former course of life<sup>6</sup>. He had two brothers, the one archbishop of Sens, and chancellor of France, the other bishop of Paris; and his daughters were married into great families, but were unable to save him: however, the sentence was afterwards reversed, and his memory vindicated by a judicial process, at the expence of a convent which he had founded; who sold their plate to defray the expences of the suit; a circumstance that deserves perpetual memory<sup>7</sup>. When the king recovered, he was amazed at the fate of his minister; but, being told that he suffered by due course of law, he was, or at least seemed to be satisfied. The queen also, which is still more extraordinary, having a part of his forfeiture, and her brother Lewis duke of Bavaria another part, was reconciled to the duke of Burgundy, tho' Montague's greatest crime was his attachment to her service. The privileges of the city of Paris were entirely restored, and particularly the power of the militia; but the inhabitants were become so very wise, that they thanked the king for his favour, and declined accepting it: abundance of unnecessary pensions were suppressed, and several extravagant grants were resumed: the truce with England was on neither side observed, and yet no war declared. The city of Genoa revolted, and the French lost their influence in Italy<sup>8</sup>; which had been principally useful in their commerce.

A GREAT council of the princes and peers being summoned in the king's presence, it was decided therein, that, for the future, when the king was indisposed, all acts of government should run in the name of the dauphin. This made it not only proper but necessary that he should be taken out of the hands of the women, and consequently it grew to be a point of the highest importance who should be intrusted with the care of this young prince, because it was, in effect, to trust them with the government<sup>9</sup>. In point of decency, the king demanded first the advice of his uncle the duke of Berry, who, with much warmth, and without the least hesitation, recommended the duke of Burgundy, to whose daughter the young prince was contracted; but when, in consequence of his nomination, he saw this office on the point of being conferred upon him by common consent, he grew uneasy, and would have substituted himself; but it was too late, the duke of Burgundy was appointed; and the duke of Berry, unable to shew his resentment any other way, retired from Paris<sup>c</sup>.

 This very probably gave him little disquiet at the time; but it very soon appeared that this prince was no insignificant enemy. The duke of Orleans, who had lately lost his consort, the queen dowager of England, quickly repaired to him, and declared his resolution to revenge his father's death. The duke of Bourbon joined him also, with several other persons of the highest quality; but, while they meditated the means of restoring the government, the duke of Bourbon died. He maintained to the last that excellent character he acquired in his youth. He suffered with the state; but was so far from deriving any thing to himself from the distress of the crown, that he declared the duchy of Bourbon, which was his proper hereditary estate and appenage, revertable to the crown, in case a failure should happen of heirs male<sup>d</sup>. His piety was sincere, but without any mixture of bigotry; his friendship b warm and disinterested; yet, in a particular instance, it proved highly beneficial to his family. He protected the lord of Beaujeu against the count of Savoy; and that lord dying without issue, bequeathed to the duke's posterity Beaujolois and the sovereignty of Dombes<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Berry, finding his own strength, published a manifesto, and marched towards Paris: the duke of Burgundy also assembled an army, and had the king on his side; A. D. 1410. but when things were on the point of coming to extremities, it was proposed, as the only certain and effectual method of preserving peace, that all the princes should quit the court, and that the king should appoint new ministers of his own choice. The duke of Burgundy executed this treaty fairly; and, after taking leave of the king, with great testimonies of duty and respect, withdrew into his own dominions; but the duke of Orleans, though often summoned, would never dismiss his troops, but, on the contrary, secretly omitted nothing that could be done to extend his party, and to augment his forces<sup>f</sup>.

Resentment between the two factions runs higher, and is productive of greater mischief than ever.

AT Paris the king and his people were in great hopes they should, at length, enjoy some degree of quiet; the new ministry were frugal and circumspect; they were sensible, that not only their authority but their safety depended on their behaving as they ought; and, from this principle, they were very attentive to their duty. But, while they were thus employed, the court was alarmed by letters from the duke of Burgundy, assuring them that the princes were about to raise new troubles, in order to make themselves masters of the persons of the king and dauphin, and of the government; for which reason he advised the king to make a new governor of Paris, and to provide for his own security<sup>g</sup>. The inhabitants of Paris d opposed this, because the duke of Berry was still their governor. The king laboured to compose these troubles; the queen undertook to mediate; and the duke of Orleans seemed to acquiesce, as the duke of Burgundy really did. But the former, when he found himself strong enough, challenged the latter; and, throwing off the mask, declared war<sup>h</sup>. The queen also espoused the cause of the duke of Orleans; which so enraged the Parisians, that they now desired the duke of Berry might be removed, and the count de St. Pol appointed in his stead<sup>i</sup>. They had their desire, and had very soon after reason to repent it. The first act of the count's government was raising a kind of guard, consisting of five hundred butchers, who, having once arms put into their hands, made the whole city tremble. All France was now divided into two parties; such as favoured the duke of Orleans, who, from e his father-in-law (for he was again married) were stiled Armagnacs, and those who adhered to the duke of Burgundy, who, from one Caboché, were stiled Cabochines; the former, by way of distinction, wore a white scarf, with what we call a St. George's cross, the latter a red one, with the cross of St. Andrew<sup>k</sup>. The dauphin, on the march of the duke of Orleans and his forces towards Paris, wrote to the duke of Burgundy to come to the assistance of himself and his father, and was quickly obeyed. The duke of Orleans advanced towards him with a numerous army; but, when they were on the point of engaging, the duke of Burgundy decamped; for many of his Flemish lords, having served their time, began to retire: the duke of Orleans, laying hold of this opportunity, caused his forces to block up Paris, which he must have reduced, if, when it was least expected, the duke of Burgundy f had not suddenly entered it with a small body of choice troops. This succour soon changed the face of affairs, the people of Paris recovered their spirits, and, having joined the duke of Burgundy, recovered several places, and at length constrained the duke of Orleans to decamp and retire<sup>l</sup>.

Charles puts himself at the head of an army against his uncle and his nephew.

THE king, who had been out of his senses the best part of the time his capital was blocked up, shewed very strong resentment when he recovered, and declared his resolution to punish his uncle and his nephew to the utmost. He was so hurried by his passion, that he took no kind of offence at the duke of Burgundy's having demanded succours from England, though that step had alarmed the people of Paris prodigiously; more especially when they saw, that the best part of the succour he brought consisted in these troops; but they behaved

- a so well in the field, and observed such an exact discipline in the place, that they were quickly reconciled to them<sup>m</sup>. The king, to shew how much he was in earnest, removed the constable Albret, and bestowed the sword upon the count de St. Pol. He made some other changes of the same nature; and, as soon as an army could be assembled, marched directly into the duchy of Berry, with an intent to besiege Bourges. The dukes of Berry and Bourbon were there in person, with a good garrison; sent to make their compliments to the king; but, notwithstanding that, defended the place with great vigour. They had some persons near the king, who promised, upon a sally made into his quarter, to seize and put him into their hands; but this scheme miscarried, and their confederates, being discovered, were publicly executed<sup>n</sup>. The siege still went on; the duke of Orleans had no army in the field, yet the duke of Berry never stooped to propose any terms of accommodation. The mystery was soon revealed, by the landing of the duke of Clarence in Normandy, with a complete army from England. The princes, who, while they blocked up Paris, accused the duke of Burgundy of treason, for having accepted a body of six thousand English auxiliaries, commanded by the earl of Arundel, had notwithstanding concluded a treaty with king Henry in the month of May, by which they promised to obtain the restitution of all the places he claimed in France, and many other things, provided he sent an army to their assistance; and upon this relief, which was now come, they depended<sup>o</sup>. In the situation things now stood in, both parties were inclined to peace, but neither would propose it. The count of Savoy, who was nearly related to the duke of Berry, and who had espoused the duke of Burgundy's daughter, drew them out of this difficulty; and, the terms being previously settled, the dauphin had the honour of dictating a peace. The old treaties were renewed, and sworn to afresh; the duke of Berry gave up the place, and had it restored to him again; the princes renounced their treaty with England, and their league against the duke of Burgundy: and, on the other hand, the king reinstated those whom he had removed. It was also agreed, that all names of reproach should be abolished, and great rejoicings were made for this new reconciliation; which was sealed with fresh oaths and protestations on both sides<sup>p</sup>. There still remained one great difficulty: this was, how to dispose of the English A. D. 1412. Bourges. The duke of Orleans had sent for them, and he was to pay them; but he had no money; he was constrained to give his brother the count of Angoulesme, and other nobles, as hostages, till he could raise it; and the duke of Clarence, having accepted these, directed his march to Guienne. By this time, or at least soon after, Henry the fourth had breathed his last, and his son Henry the fifth was seated in the throne<sup>q</sup>.
- HOWEVER short the struggle may be, the miseries of a civil war are long felt; the dukes of Berry and Burgundy returned with the king to Paris, and seeing clearly, that a war with England was likely to ensue, for which they were totally unprovided in all respects, they called, or advised the king to call, an assembly of the states, which had no other effect, than to learn from them the disagreeable news, that the whole nation was so totally exhausted, and at the same time so generally dissatisfied, that in this way they had nothing to expect<sup>r</sup>. The assembly being dismissed, Lewis dauphin of France, a very high-spirited young prince, resolved to take the actual as well as nominal direction of affairs upon himself; and, having some persons about him of good sense, and it is not improbable of good intentions, began to make various regulations, which had an air of public spirit. This, like all the attempts of reformation during the present reign, commenced with the persecution of those who had been employed in the finances, and of whom the states had loudly complained<sup>s</sup>. At the head of these was Pierre, or Peter des Effards, the creature of the duke of Burgundy, who had been raised to the supreme direction of the finances by the destruction and death of Montague. Effards, finding himself pressed for two millions of crowns, produced to the dauphin the duke of Burgundy's receipts, and at the same time acquainted him, that the duke had formed a design of assassinating all the princes of the house of Orleans, or, as others report, the three dukes of Berry, Orleans, and Bourbon<sup>t</sup>. This discovery restored him to the dauphin's good graces, who thereupon made use of him to secure the city of Paris; which he was to do by taking possession of the Bastile with a body of men that might be depended upon. Effards was so cautious, that he would take no step without the order of the duke of Burgundy as well as of the dauphin; and the latter applying to the former for such an order, he presently divined the truth, but signed it at the same time, as if he had not had the least suspicion<sup>u</sup>.
- f THE affair being conducted with great silence and secrecy, Effards became master of the fortrefs without the least disturbance; but he was scarce master of it, before he found it invested by an infinite croud of people, with the band of butchers at their head, under the a command of Simon de Caboche, and John de Troye, a surgeon. These were quickly after joined by two knights, who were declared partizans of the duke of Burgundy; which made it evident enough from whence the storm came. The dauphin, therefore, was forced to have recourse to that prince to allay it; and he, pretending to use his influence on the people on his behalf, persuaded Pierre de Effards to surrender; to whom he gave assurances of friendship and protection, till he came to the scaffold, where, notwithstanding this usage, he behaved with great decency and dignity, without uttering any complaints but of himself, for having, through a principle of ambition, been instrumental in Montague's death<sup>w</sup>. The same ruffians surrounded and attacked the palace, in which the dauphin resided, tore several b of his friends and servants from his presence, amongst whom was his uncle Lewis of Bavaria, and put one of them, James de la Riviere, his chamberlain, to death. The same insolent rabble constrained the king, who was now in his seniles, with the dauphin, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, to go to the parliament, and register edicts of their framing; and so low were they fallen, that, either to make their court to, or for fear of, the populace, they wore white hoods<sup>x</sup>. On this occasion, Arnold de Corbie, chancellor of France, was deposed, and several other persons of rank, who were replaced as these reformers thought fit. Helion de Jaqueville, whom they had made captain of Paris, hearing fiddles one evening in the dauphin's apartment, broke in, with a croud of his attendants, and, though the duke of Burgundy was present, treated him, and those about him, with the utmost indignity, and even put them c in danger of their lives, though the duke pretended all the time to pacify them, and often whispered the dauphin, that he should not let the people see he was afraid<sup>y</sup>. It is no wonder that prince should think a life like this insupportable, or endeavour at all events to free himself. The method he took was to write in his father's name, and with his consent, to the duke of Orleans; who, communicating his letter to the rest of the princes, they speedily assembled a sufficient force, and advanced towards Paris. The king declared his inclination to peace; conferences were, for this purpose, set on foot; and John Juvenal des Ursins, advocate general, having disposed the better sort of people in Paris to exert themselves, the citizens declared for peace. The Cabochins endeavoured to revive the old spirit; but it was too late, and some of them being slain, the rest quitted the city, and withdrew into d

Flanders, whither they were quickly followed by the duke of Burgundy; who, having failed in an attempt he made to seize the king while he was hunting, and the dauphin having frighted him in his turn, thought it most convenient for him to retire<sup>z</sup>.

The duke of Burgundy sets on foot fresh intrigues, in order to recover the administration.

Upon this revolution, the dukes of Bavaria and Bar, who were both prisoners, recovered their liberty; the former was made governor of the Bastile, and the latter of the tower of the Louvre. The rest of the princes repaired speedily to Paris; where they were well received, and the duke of Burgundy as universally condemned as he had been lately admired.
This the duke of Anjou, called by courtesy king of the Sicilies, carried so far, as to send him back his daughter, whom he had contracted to the prince his son; which created an irreconcilable hatred between the two families<sup>2</sup>. In the mean time a treaty of marriage c was set on foot between Henry the fifth of England, and the king's daughter the princess Katherine, which was managed, on one side, by the duke of York, and, on the other, by the princes lately returned to court; but, for the present, this produced nothing more than a truce. Before the close of the year came ambassadors from the duke of Burgundy, to make his excuses to the king for quitting Paris in so abrupt a manner, and to assure him of his duty and submission<sup>b</sup>. The true design of the embassy, however, was to know the disposition of the courtiers and citizens, and to encourage and keep up the spirit of his friends; which he did by assuring them, not only there but in several other great towns, that he was raising forces secretly, in order to come to the deliverance of the king and dauphin; the latter having written him, as he affirmed, letters, in very strong terms, representing the confinement and distress in which they were, and importuning him, without delay, and f without paying any respect to letters of another tenor that he might receive from them, to assemble an army, and come to their assistance<sup>c</sup>. This had its effect; his friends believed all that he said, while those of the duke of Orleans and the princes, and even the princes themselves, knew not well what to think with respect to his assertions, or what measures to take to prevent his bringing about another change, as sudden as that which themselves had effected<sup>d</sup>.

As the king was at this time indisposed, the queen called a great council, in which the dauphin, the princes of the blood, the great lords, and particularly the count de Armagnac, the chancellor of France, the heads of the university, which in those days had great weight,

- a and some of the principal citizens of Paris, were present. The first step that was taken was <sup>marches a-</sup> to impose an oath of secrecy; and then the chancellor, in a long speech, laid open the <sup>gainst the duke</sup> misfortunes of the state; insisted on the dauphin's youth, the vivacity of his spirit, his <sup>of Burgundy.</sup> proneness to pleasure, his neglect of business, and the facility with which he was misled by some idle young men who were about him. The dauphin was surprised, and on the point of shewing his anger, when the princes and great lords, in their turns, spoke to the same purpose, and declared, that the safety of the state depended upon some speedy and effectual remedy. This was presently applied, by removing those from about him who were suspected, and especially one who was believed to have prevailed on him to write to the duke of Burgundy<sup>c</sup>. The dauphin was forced to acquiesce, to write letters, requiring the duke to lay down his arms,
- b and others to the principal towns in the kingdom, denying and disavowing the facts contained in the duke of Burgundy's manifesto. The king, recovering, acted with still greater warmth; the university condemned the apology of Dr. John Petit for the murder of the duke of Orleans, as full of heretical and detestable doctrine. The duke of Berry, as governor of Paris, disposed every thing in a proper manner for its defence, by the advice of the count de Armagnac, father-in-law to the duke of Orleans. It was by his persuasion that the better sort of people took arms and did duty, and by his persuasion the princes of the blood, in their turns, went their rounds every night. The dauphin, to clear himself from all suspicion, was remarkably active and steady<sup>d</sup>. The duke of Burgundy proceeded in his own way; advanced with a great army; made himself master of Compiègne and Soissons; had St. Denis betrayed to him, and brought his army within
- c sight of Paris. He next sent a herald to acquaint the citizens, that, at the express desire of the king and dauphin, he was come to deliver them out of a shameful confinement, and therefore demanded admittance. The count de Armagnac received the message with contempt, and sent the herald back without an answer. The duke approached the gates with his army in order of battle; but finding every thing in perfect order, and not the least tumult or confusion, though he continued there some hours, withdrew, and soon after retired into his own territories<sup>e</sup>. The king then published a manifesto; in which, beginning with the murder of his brother, he represented him as the great author of the calamities of France, declared him a public enemy, and exhorted all his good subjects to treat him in that light. A potent army being quickly formed, the king, accompanied by the dauphin, put himself at the head of it,
- d reduced Compiègne by capitulation, and, having taken Soissons by assault, caused two persons of distinction, who defended it, to be beheaded. He proceeded from thence into Artois, where he was met by the duke of Brabant and the countess of Hainault, brother and sister to the duke of Burgundy; who interceded for him, and assured the king, that he desired nothing more than to come and justify himself to his majesty. The king answered, with great firmness, if that be all, let him come with a proper train; if he has any thing to demand we are ready to do him justice; if he will confess his errors, and demand pardon, he shall have it<sup>f</sup>. The king then wrote to the states of Flanders, to know whether they meant to make the quarrel of their count their own; upon which they sent deputies, who declared roundly, that, whatever conduct the duke of Burgundy, their count, thought fit to pursue, they would
- e behave themselves as his majesty's good subjects. The duke of Burgundy, upon this, sent A. D. 1414. the duke of Brabant, and the countess of Hainault, with full powers to make peace, which was signed on the sixteenth of October, upon the king's terms. The dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, with the archbishop of Sens, refused to subscribe; alleging they had never broke the former peace, which was the basis of this; but the dauphin, sensible of his own power, said, "My lords, if you mean to keep the peace, you must subscribe;" which they did, though with a bad grace. The king returned in triumph to Paris, and his subjects once more entertained hopes of seeing the public tranquillity settled on a solid basis<sup>g</sup>.
- f THERE had been, ever since the accession of Henry the fifth, a kind of negotiation between Henry V. the two crowns for a general peace; in which, without doubt, the French were in earnest. <sup>negociates with</sup> Henry's ambassadors, who were many, and some of them persons of the first quality in the <sup>Charles, in</sup> kingdom, expressed the like disposition in very strong terms; but, from the propositions <sup>order to disco-</sup> they made, one might be led to suspect their sincerity; for having first demanded the crown <sup>ver the state of</sup> of France, and afterwards many vast concessions, they at length stuck to three points<sup>h</sup>. The first <sup>France.</sup> was the entire restitution of all that was stipulated by the treaty of Bretigny, which, through this whole negotiation, was stiled the great treaty; next a moiety of the county of Provence; and lastly, what was still remaining of king John's ransom; which points once adjusted, the king would treat of a marriage with the princess Katherine, then about fourteen, provided he might be assured of having with her a round million. The French court was exceedingly embarrassed, as perceiving plainly, that the English were well apprised of the distracted state a of their affairs; and therefore they offered great cessions, together with the princess Katherine, and a fortune of six hundred thousand crowns<sup>1</sup>. The English ministers acknowledged they had no power to conclude a marriage, and desired to return home by way of Honflur, which was granted them. They were presently followed by a splendid embassy from France, at the head of which was the archbishop of Bourges, who gradually advanced the fortune to within fifty thousand crowns of what had been demanded; but, perceiving that the English ministers only amused him, as their ambassador had been amused at Paris, and that they were on the point of invading France, he demanded an audience of leave, and returned with his colleagues<sup>m</sup>. This prelate acquainted the king, that the parliament, influenced by the clergy, had embarked the English monarch in a war to preserve their own power and possession; that there was no doubt b to be made of his reviving his claim to the kingdom, and very great reason to believe, that the duke of Burgundy still held a correspondence in England. Before any great use could be made of this intelligence, Henry, embarking with a potent army at Southampton, landed in Normandy, after beating a French squadron, and invested Harfleur, at the mouth of the river Seine<sup>n</sup>. It is highly probable the French ministers had depended upon a party they had in England, at the head of which was Richard earl of Cambridge, the lord treasurer Scroop, and Sir Thomas Grey: most of our historians say, that their design was to kill the king; but it is more probable, that they meant to carry off a part of the army, and to proclaim the right heir of Richard the second; for the support of which project they had stipulated with the court of France an advance of a million of livres; but, the whole business being discovered, the c French saved their money, and the persons engaged in this plot lost their heads<sup>o</sup>.

He makes a descent in Normandy, takes Harfleur, and marches toward Calais. The constable d'Albret, who commanded in Normandy, had a considerable army under his command, in the neighbourhood of Rouen, with which he did nothing considerable; yet, the garrison of Harfleur defended themselves with great courage and spirit, but were at length compelled to capitulate, and to agree, that, in case they were not relieved, they would render the place on the 18th of September; but when the day came, they very imprudently endeavoured to elude the promise they had made, which so provoked Henry, that he caused a general attack to be made, carried the place sword in hand, reserved a few persons of distinction prisoners, put the rest to the sword, and gave the town to be pillaged by his army<sup>p</sup>. His satisfaction at this success was very much qualified by the miserable condition in d which he found his army, harassed and diminished in a moist climate and marshy soil, the flux prevailing amongst them, the season advanced, and the weather so bad, that the best part of his fleet was retired into Calais road. In these circumstances he took a resolution of marching thither by land; the little opposition he had hitherto received persuaded him that he should meet with nothing to impede him<sup>q</sup>. He quickly discovered his mistake; for the king, the dauphin, and the rest of the princes of the blood, having taken the field, he saw his forces in a manner surrounded. He passed, however, the river Sonne, where he found it fordable; but, when he was on the other side, he discovered the French army in the plain near the village of Agincourt<sup>r</sup>. The king being ill, the dauphin and the duke of Berry were forced to remain with him; so that the command devolved upon the constable, who made e but an indifferent choice of the field of battle, which was, in truth, little better than a quagmire; but he took his measures to hinder the enemy's march so effectually, and king Henry found the dispute so very unequal, that he had recourse to a negotiation, in which he offered to restore Harfleur, and to pay the expences of the war, provided he was allowed a free passage to Calais. The constable, the marshal de Boucicaut, and most of the old officers, were for accepting this offer; which, they said, was gaining a victory without blood: but the young nobility, particularly the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, were of another opinion, and the herald was sent back without answer<sup>s</sup>.

Henry forced by the French to fight, gains a complete victory at Agincourt. THE constable, however, would not fight till he had the king's express orders, who was by this time recovered. His army consisted of about sixty thousand men, though some f writers make them double that number. The English were about twenty-two thousand, of whom near one half had the flux. On the 25th of October, about nine in the morning, the armies were in sight; the English had their archers in the center, the gens d'arms on their right, and the infantry on their left, all perfectly well posted, and twelve hundred choice archers in different ambuscades<sup>t</sup>. The army of France had so many dukes, counts, and great lords, who were above being commanded, that all was in confusion from the very beginning. To shew that their courage was equal to their rank, they were all in the first line; so that the bulk of the army was without any officers of distinction. They marched pre-

- a cipitately as to an assured victory; whereas the English advanced very slowly, and discharged such flights of arrows as did great execution. When they drew near, the archers, perceiving they were out of breath, charged them with great vigour, broke them in less than half an hour, and then fell upon the main body, which made very little resistance, as having no body of consequence to command them. Henry, with his gens d'arms, put an end to the dispute, bearing down such separate corps as here and there endeavoured to remain firm. On the part of the English, fell the duke of York, uncle to the king, very few persons of distinction besides, and about seventeen hundred private men; on the other side, the constable, the admiral, the duke of Alençon, the duke of Brabant, the count of Nevers, both brothers to the duke of Burgundy, three princes of the house of Bar, the count de Vaudemont, brother to the duke of Lorraine, the archbishop of Sens, one hundred and twenty lords carrying banners, eight thousand gentlemen of family, and about two thousand private men. There were likewise fourteen thousand prisoners, and amongst these the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendosme, and Richmond, the marshal de Boucicaut, and about two thousand knights. The news of this defeat being carried to Rouen, amazed the king and those who were about him. The surprize was still greater at Paris, from an apprehension that the duke of Burgundy would return into France with an army. The duke of Bretagne, with a great body of troops, joined the poor remains of the French army within fifteen miles of the field of battle; and if, without loss of time, they had attacked Henry again, they might very probably have repaired the mischief; but, no attempt of this sort being made, he arrived safely at Calais, where he began instantly to take measures for the next campaign.

- In the mean time the duke of Burgundy acted a double, or at least a perplexed part; he sent Henry a defiance for the death of his brother the duke of Brabant, at the same time he marched, with a great body of cavalry, towards Paris; which augmented the public confusion. He sent deputies to desire an audience of the king, who were to see in what situation the court stood, which was now returned to Paris; they were haughtily treated by the dauphin, who charged them to command their master, in his name, to disband; but, before their departure, the dauphin was seized with a dysentery, of which he died in a few days, not without suspicion. He was about nineteen, tall, robust, and active in his person; eager and desirous of having a great measure of power, though at the same time he hated business; much given to wine and women, and, if not the victim of his father-in-law, that of his own vices. The queen, to support herself, and to secure the public tranquillity, sent for the count of Armagnac, to whom, on his arrival at Paris, the king gave the sword and the envied title of constable of France, and never was it bestowed on one more able to discharge it.

- In critical conjunctures things seldom fail of taking a great turn, when men of real abilities are called to employments, to which those employments are suited. The count de Armagnac had so deep a judgment, so quick a penetration, and was withal so active and so vigilant, that, as it were in an instant, he brought order out of confusion, obliged the duke of Burgundy to retire into his own territories, and so harrassed his army in his retreat, as to render him contemptible even in the sight of the people of Paris. In the king's lucid intervals, the constable gave him so true an insight into his affairs, made him comprehend so clearly how they might be restored, and so fully convinced him of his own fidelity, that he made him superintendant of the finances; so that, in effect, the whole power civil and military was lodged in his hands. He acted so resolutely, that he broke intirely the faction of Burgundy in Paris, executed several of the duke's emissaries, purged the university, and dissolved such of the corporations as were devoted to his interest. He also made a tour into Normandy, where he gained some advantages over the earl of Dorset, caused Harfleur to be blocked up by sea; but the Genoese vessels, being but half-manned, were beaten by the English, and the place relieved. The emperor Sigismund made a tour to Paris, in order to engage the king to concur in the measures taken in the council of Constance to put an end to the schism, by deposing all the three popes, Gregory the seventh, Benedict the thirteenth, and John the twenty-third; he was received with all possible marks of respect, and treated, during his stay, with all imaginable marks of kindness and esteem, in hopes that, by his influence, a peace might be concluded with England; but taking offence because he was not allowed to act as a sovereign while in the French dominions, he made a short turn, and, instead of remaining a mediator, became the ally of Henry the fifth, and sent his old friend Charles a letter of defiance. But what embarrassed the court

A. D. 1416. most was the behaviour of John duke of Touraine, who, by the death of his brother, was become dauphin. He was at this time in Hainault, where he married Jaqueline the daughter and heiress of the count, who afterwards espoused the duke of Bedford<sup>f</sup>. He was about eighteen, and, being either persuaded or awed by the count of Hainault, entered into the interests of the duke of Burgundy, and came with his father-in-law, escorted by a body of troops; but refused to go to Paris, to pay his duty to his father, unless the duke of Burgundy was recalled; or rather the count of Hainault made his declaration, in his name, to the queen<sup>g</sup>.

A general spirit of falsehood
and deceit prevails through all courts at this period,
and destroys all credit.

AT his return from Paris, where he was very near being arrested, to Compiègne, the count of Hainault found the dauphin dying. This young prince had an imposthume in his ear; which, breaking inwardly, had choked him. The faction of Burgundy, being able to make no more use of him living, charged his death upon the constable de Armagnac, without either proof or probability. The constable, to pay them in their own coin, asserted, that the emissaries of the duke of Burgundy had poisoned the dauphin Lewis<sup>h</sup>. But the duke, seeing that stories of this kind made no lasting impression, digested all the grievances of the nation into a kind of manifesto. This he sent to most of the great towns in the kingdom, inviting them to join with him in a league for the public good; which had the greater effect, as the dukes of Berry and Anjou were lately dead, and the rest of the princes of the blood prisoners in England<sup>i</sup>; but, after all, perhaps his schemes had failed, if, in the midst of these miseries and misfortunes, there had not happened a new division at court<sup>k</sup>. The dauphin, entirely governed by the constable, consented to seize great quantities of plate and jewels, which the queen his mother had deposited in various convents and churches, and applied it for the public service. The queen, in high discontent, retired to Vincennes; where she kept a very gay splendid court, the expence of which little suited the state of the kingdom, or the diversions which were such as could not be reconciled either to the dignity of her rank or the modesty of her sex<sup>l</sup>. The constable, an austere man, could not see his master thus dishonoured in silence; he mentioned it to him therefore, and the king, making a tour to Vincennes, received such satisfaction from his enquiries, that he caused one of her gallants to be put to death, and banished her and her daughter Katherine to Tours<sup>m</sup>. Henry the fifth, landing with a new army in Normandy, conquered a great part of that province, the constable having been obliged to recal the greatest part of the troops from thence, in order to oppose them to the duke of Burgundy; whom he baffled in various attempts, and might probably have obliged to retire once more into his own dominions, if the queen had not, forgetting her rank, her duty, and her character, to gratify her revenge, written to him, and demanded his protection<sup>n</sup>. In this expedition he was fortunate; he delivered her from her captivity, and, in return, she co-operated with him for the destruction of the king and kingdom. In order to this she republished an old edict, by which, in the minority of her eldest son, the king had declared her regent; of which she now resumed the title and authority. She fixed the seat of her government at Troye, where she created a new chancellor, a new parliament, and formed a new great seal. She gave the title of constable of France to the duke of Lorraine, declaring the count de Armagnac unworthy of that dignity; but, though she was bountiful in bestowing titles, yet all the power was reserved to the duke of Burgundy, who made a very bold attempt to surprise Paris; which, though very well concerted, did not succeed<sup>o</sup>.

IT would require a volume of no inconsiderable size to explain all the dark and insidious practices that were at this time carried on, and which plainly demonstrate, that the extreme misery brought on the French nation was owing to nothing but the corruption of their manners; which having, on the one hand, introduced a luxury unknown to former times, excited, on the other, a passion for wealth and power, which quickly stifled all principle<sup>p</sup>. Hence the very end of negotiating was lost; for instead of seeking to put a stop to prevent disputes, by an amicable and equitable decision, the parties aimed only at deceiving each other, and kept faith no longer than they thought it their interest to keep it. The duke of Burgundy had, by letters patent under his hand and seal, acknowledged Henry the fifth for the lawful owner of the French crown, though certainly he never intended to set it on his head<sup>q</sup>. The French princes were so uneasy at their imprisonment, and saw so little hopes of being delivered, that they likewise entered into a negotiation with Henry, the basis of which was their beginning to have a good opinion of his title, and the object of it procuring leave for the duke of Bourbon to go to France, there to negotiate a peace upon the king's terms; and, if that could not be brought about, then to acknowledge his title, and do homage to him as their lawful prince<sup>r</sup>. The duke went, and failed; but at his return, himself and the rest of the princes refused to perform their engagements, for which they were all closely imprisoned,

- a and Henry, against his will, was forced to depend upon his sword. This reluctance of his did not at all proceed from his diffidence of beating the French army, of which, in the present state of things, he was in a manner sure; but conquest was not to be obtained but by a numerous army, and he was already so effectually undone by the expence, that he had been forced to pawn his crown and all his jewels to furnish the necessary supplies for the next campaign; and this, notwithstanding he had received from his subjects all that it was in their power to give<sup>s</sup>. In the mean time a negociation had been set on foot for reconciling the queen and the dauphin's party in France; in which such difficulties occurred, that the ministers employed on both sides agreed to leave the terms to be prescribed by the legates of pope Martin the fifth; and their decree was, that the king should devolve his authority on the
- b dauphin and the duke of Burgundy jointly, to which both parties willingly agreed; yet this did not produce a peace; for the constable de Armagnac, though he could not open the eyes of the dauphin, prevailed upon the chancellor to declare that he would not put the seal to such a treaty<sup>t</sup>. For this he is highly blamed by most of the French historians, as if he had manifestly sacrificed the public to his private interest; but iure, if they had attended to his reason, they could scarce have done him this injustice; for he alleged, that he could not think of delivering the royal person and power into the hands of one who had made a treaty against both; which, being denied by the duke of Burgundy, was the cause that the writers of those times censured the constable, as supposing that he invented this as a pretence; but, since we are now sure of the matter of fact, we are certainly better judges of that point than they,
- c and it is but just, that we should speak of things as the light of history directs us<sup>u</sup>.

- THE constable, perceiving that not only the dauphin but the people were displeased, judged it necessary, towards keeping up their spirits, to send out part of his forces to recover Montlheri and Marcoussi, which they performed; but nevertheless this success proved his destruction. There was one Perrinet le Clerc, the son of an ironmonger, who had been ill-treated by the domestics of one of the king's counsellors, of which he had complained, without being able to obtain redress: his father, in right of his post in the militia, had the keys of the gate of St. Germain, which, to gratify his revenge, the young man stole from under his head when asleep, opened that gate, and admitted eight hundred of the Burgundians, under the command of the lord Lisle-Adam, on Saturday the twenty-eighth of May. The very day after
- d the populace, in spite of the constable and the chancellor, had proclaimed peace<sup>w</sup>. The Burgundians were quickly joined by several thousands of low people, who surprised the chancellor, several prelates, and at length the constable, who was discovered by a mason, to whose house he fled for shelter; and these, together with two archbishops, they conducted to prison. But a few days after, that they might have an opportunity to plunder, they took arms again, forced the prison doors, and murdered the greatest part of them, by throwing them from the top of the edifice upon their companions pikes, and afterwards dragged the bodies of the constable and the chancellor de Marie about the streets<sup>x</sup>. The duke of Burgundy returned soon after with the queen, and the king, either through weakness or fear, received them very kindly. It was not long before the duke found himself under great difficulties from the very
- e spirit which, in so unlooked-for a manner, put him in possession of the capital, the people assuming a liberty of doing what they pleased, which at first he durst not prevent. This was carried to so great a height, that the common hangman walked about the city in his robes; and, when they had a mind to plunder any rich family, those about him cried they were Armagnacs; upon which he dispatched the master of the house, and perhaps his sons, and the people took all that they had. This executioner had the folly to go to the duke of Burgundy's palace, and the impudence to shake him by the hand; but the duke, sending the best part of the city troops to recover the towns the constable had taken, laid hold of this opportunity to hang the hangman; and, by bringing in a body of his own troops, kept the people in better order<sup>y</sup>. He would have treated with the dauphin, whom his mother earnestly invited back
- f to Paris; but that prince was either not inclined, or was persuaded by those about him not to trust her. He fixed himself therefore at Poitiers, where he assembled the remains of the parliament of Paris, appointed a new chancellor, besieged and took Tours, with many other places.

WHILE these strange adventures happened in France, king Henry reduced the greatest part of Normandy, but offered at the same time to treat with the dauphin and with the duke of Burgundy, though both these treaties were mere amusements; the king telling the pope's legate, that he might see the finger of God in the chastisement of France; and that having himself a good title to the crown, Providence seemed to have opened him a fair path to the possession of it <sup>a</sup>. In all these treaties, therefore, there was nothing of sincerity on any side; the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy vainly deluded themselves with the hopes of gaining Henry as an ally; whereas the king of England meant to close with neither, but, by treating with both at a time, to thrust himself like a wedge between them, and thereby hinder their coalition, which was the single event he had to fear. It may suffice, therefore, to say, that, though on the part of the duke of Burgundy the treaty was managed by the queen in person, who carried with her the princess Katherine, to whose beauty the king was far from being insensible, yet he was so much a hero and a politician, that in spite of his passion his interest prevailed; so that, notwithstanding many propositions were made, they separated without coming to any conclusion <sup>a</sup>. Henry, during the time of this treaty, remained at Mante, and the French court at Pontoise, the conferences being held at a place at a convenient distance <sup>b</sup> between these two towns, and terminated in the beginning of the month of May, very little to the satisfaction of the duke of Burgundy, who saw plainly, that he began to lose his interest with the French, and that at the same time he was less considered by the English. A circumstance that led him to repent the contributing as he had done to their invasion and success <sup>b</sup>.

In this confusion the dauphin enters into a treaty with the duke of Burgundy;

THE dauphin, alarmed at his mother's treaty with the king of England, and knowing to how great a degree he was hated by her, resolved, if possible, to accommodate matters with the duke of Burgundy, as the most effectual means to repel the English, or at least to procure somewhat milder terms. He sent Tannegui du Chastel, who had been governor of the bastile, and who (taking him out of bed in his shirt) had preserved him the night that Paris was surprised, to Pontoise, to propose an interview with the duke, which was brought about through the persuasion of madam Giac, of whom the duke was passionately fond <sup>c</sup>. This interview was held the eleventh of July, at Souilli-le-Fort, a league from Melun, with great marks of esteem and tenderness on both sides, and with the most profound submission on the part of the duke of Burgundy. They swore perpetual friendship and unity on a cross, presented by the bishop of Laon; and, at parting, agreed on another conference at Montereau-Faut-Yvonne <sup>d</sup>. Henry was quickly apprised of this, and that both parties had agreed to carry on the war against him with vigour, which seemed to be a most perfidious act in the duke of Burgundy, considering the terms on which he stood with that monarch; yet, in reality, the king of England had no great reason to complain, since in treating with the dauphin he had offered to join with him in the conquest of Flanders, provided he might retain the sovereignty after it was reduced; with which proposition the dauphin acquainted him in their interview <sup>e</sup>. By way of revenge, the king sent a strong detachment of his forces to surprize Pontoise, where the marshal Lisle-Adam commanded, who made his escape, with some difficulty, in his shirt, together with six thousand men, the greatest part of them in the same condition. The news of this greatly qualified the joy which the people of Paris had expressed upon proclaiming the peace, and with good reason, for the English took all the treasure, equipage, and baggage, of the court in that place, to the value, as it was computed, of two millions <sup>f</sup>. In Lower Normandy the forces of the dauphin recovered several places; and in a brisk action at Mortain were victorious, and killed the English about four hundred men, the duke of Burgundy remaining all this time in a state of confusion and inactivity, as if he knew not which side to take.

The dauphin is murdered by his connivance at least, if not command, at a conference at Montereau

IN this situation the dauphin sent to put him in mind of his appointment, and of the necessity of their conferring together at Montereau. The duke went thither unwillingly, and by the persuasion of his mistress <sup>g</sup>. The conference was upon a bridge, with ten persons of confidence on a side. The duke, on the approach of the dauphin, bent his knee, and in that action threw his sword too far behind him; upon this he laid his hand on it to pull it right, on which Tannegui du Chastel, who had been a domestic to the duke of Orleans, cried with a stern voice, "It is time," and immediately, with his pole ax, cut off the duke's chin as he was kneeling, and, before he was able to rise, or put himself in a posture of defence, he was dispatched by several mortal wounds. Noailles, who was the nearest him of any of his own party, drawing his dagger, was killed upon the spot; eight more of his friends secured, and only Montague, by leaping the barriers, which was thought impossible, made his escape. This tragedy was acted on the tenth of September <sup>h</sup>. Most writers say it was in the dauphin's presence; others, that two of his own people withdrew him before the duke was killed: certain it is, that he disavowed it by a manifesto, and as certain that this was generally believed. At Paris they expressed the utmost horror and indignation; and the queen's chancellor, for there were now double officers of every denomination, prevailed to have the first a president sent to the new duke, to condole; in the name of the king, the queen, and the city of Paris, on the loss of his father <sup>1</sup>(G). On the seventeenth of October a treaty of union was signed, by deputies from several great cities, at Arras, for revenging his death; and on the second of December a truce, between the kings of France and England, under the mediation of the duke of Burgundy, that all parties might act with the greater vigour against the common enemy, that is, against the dauphin <sup>k</sup>.

In the spring of the succeeding year, the court being at Troyes, the duke of Burgundy came thither with a numerous attendance, and was received with the greatest kindness and respect; soon after came the king of England, attended by his brothers the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, a great number of English lords, and an escorte of sixteen hundred men; and after

b a few days spent in visits and ceremony, proceeded to ratify on the twenty-first of May a treaty, which had been settled the preceding year at Arras, by which the whole constitution of France was overturned <sup>l</sup>. This treaty contains thirty-one articles; the chief of which were, that Henry should espouse madame Katherine of France; that after the death of Charles he should succeed him as his next heir; that, in the mean time, he should exercise the regal power, but with the stile and title only of regent and heir of France; that, in succeeding times, the realms of France and England should be governed by the same person, but that both nations should live according to their own laws <sup>m</sup>. After the ratification by Charles, his queen, the duke of Burgundy, and a multitude of great lords, who swore fealty to Henry and his heirs, he was contracted to the princess Katherine, whom he espoused on the second of June; and then the treaty being approved by the parliament, was proclaimed in most of the great towns, and the dauphin declared an enemy to the state, and incapable of the succession <sup>n</sup>.

HENRY, king of England, and heir of France, judging rightly that, as his title was acquired, so it must be supported by force, instead of wasting his time in celebrating his marriage with jousts and tournaments, to which the French lords were inclined, marched the next day to reduce Sens, which submitted without any resistance. The king, having made his entry, turned to the archbishop, whom the dauphin, for his attachment to the duke of Burgundy, had expelled, and who performed the ceremony of the king's marriage, and made him the following compliment: "We are now even, my friend; yesterday you gave me a wife, and to day I restore yours <sup>o</sup>." He proceeded to Montereau, which was reduced with like facility; when the duke of Burgundy finding his father's corpse interred in his cloaths, caused it to be put in a lead coffin, embalmed, and sent to Dijon: the army next besieged Melun, which was defended with great spirit and bravery for four months, and then surrendered by capitulation, which the French writers say was not exactly kept <sup>p</sup>. The season being pretty far advanced, the two kings returned to Paris; where, notwithstanding they were in a very miserable and starving condition, the inhabitants were forced to exhaust themselves in

(G) John, surnamed the Fearless, duke of Burgundy, was the heir as well of Flanders as of his father's territories, which rendered him able to support his party in France, and to carry his pretensions as high as his father had done, though they were not so well founded (1). He had all the good qualities requisite to render a prince admired and beloved: he was prudent, liberal, eloquent, affable, and brave: his great, indeed his only, foible was ambition. After the murder of the duke of Orleans he was never easy. Whenever any strangers approached him, he took them for assassins: he increased the number of his guards: he grew jealous and suspicious: he made treaties with a view solely to his personal interest, without regard to the welfare of the state, or of posterity: he quickly saw the ill consequences of these engagements, declined executing, and even acted contrary to them (2). By these steps his misfortunes were brought on; and, in respect to his death, he was under a kind of infatuation, for he had intelligence of what was designed against him from more than one quarter. He hesitated, and even stopped, at the several barriers; and at last put himself into the hands of the servants of the duke of Orleans, whom, with the same treachery, and with the like false assurances upon oath, he had drawn to the like dismal kind of death (3). Some of his murderers were punished; but Tannegui du Chastel disavowed any intention to assassinate him, which his son accepted as a justification; and there were others also who escaped (4). He was not fifty at the time of his decease. He espoused Margaret of Favaria, daughter to the count of Hainault, who, as a certain Flemish historian affirms, was forced by the duke of Orleans, and who, in resentment of this injury, instigated her husband to the assassination of that prince (5): but the French writers, who mention her amour with the duke of Orleans, are silent in respect to the violence, and only suggest that jealousy was one of the principal motives to that bloody action (6). He had by this princess Philip the Good, his successor; Margaret, who espoused Lewis the dauphin, and afterwards Arthur of Bretagne, constable of France; Katherine, who died unmarried; Mary, who espoused Adolph, duke of Cleves; Isabella, who married Oliver de Blois, son to the count of Penthièvre; Anne, the consort of the regent duke of Bedford, and Agnes, who became the wife of Charles, duke of Bourbon (7). Margaret, duchess of Burgundy, deceased January 23, 1214.

rejoicings upon this occasion. A few days after the duke of Burgundy demanded justice of the king, for the murder of his father, which was promised him; and, in an assembly held in the presence of both kings, the dauphin being summoned to appear and justify himself against the charge brought by two proctors, in the name of the duke of Burgundy, he was condemned for contumacy, as failing to appear, declared convict of murder, banished France for ever (as the historians say, tho' the sentence is conceived in general terms), and adjudged unworthy and incapable of the crown; which sentence was pronounced by John le Clerc, who had then the office, or at least the title, of chancellor of France<sup>a</sup>. In the month of December was held an assembly of states, in which a subsidy was demanded of an eighth part of the money every man possessed, to which, it being to little purpose to dispute, the deputies consented, and it was raised by paying heavy money at the exchequer, and receiving light in the proportion before-mentioned<sup>b</sup>. We must now pass to the other court. The dauphin, now in the seventeenth year of his age, assumed the same title with Henry, stiling himself regent and heir of France. All the provinces beyond the Loire declared for him without scruple; most of the princes of the blood, and many of the nobility, chose to follow his fortunes. The prince of Orange, as a partizan of the house of Burgundy, was the only enemy he had in the south of France; and by giving the government of Languedoc to the count of Foix, he made his efforts in that cause ineffectual<sup>c</sup>. But the count of Foix affecting to render himself independent, and having with this view demanded a patent for the same government from the king, the dauphin found it necessary to deprive him, though of his own naming, which he did, and replaced him by the count de Clermont, eldest son of the duke of Bourbon<sup>d</sup>. He likewise found means to get more money than the two kings, by their edict for debasing the coin; for he raising the nominal value much higher than they, as soon as their new coin appeared, drew the best part of it into the cities under his obedience, which enabled him to pay his troops; while at Paris, the winter being remarkably hard, the people perished by hundreds in the streets with cold and hunger<sup>e</sup>.

Queen Katherine goes over into England to be crowned, and the king raises forces for the war in France.

THE affairs of his hereditary dominions obliged Henry to make a tour to England, whither he likewise carried his new queen, leaving the duke of Exeter to command in Paris, and to take charge of the court of France. The earl of Salisbury was made governor of Rouen; but the command of the army, and the chief direction of affairs, was committed to his brother the duke of Clarence. The duke of Burgundy, at the same time, returned likewise into his territories; and the truth was they both stood in great need of forces, those they had brought from England and Burgundy being wore out, either by sickness or service, and they were afraid of trusting to an army composed for the most part of French troops<sup>f</sup>. Henry was likewise desirous of seeing his queen crowned in England, obtaining the sanction of parliament to his treaty of Troye, which he considered as the constitution of his new monarchy, and a large supply of money, that he might be able to complete the conquest of France. He succeeded in most of these points; but had the misfortune to be told by his parliament, that England, exclusive of fame, was so far from being a gainer by his conquest, that the acquisition of France was like to become her ruin, which chagrin'd him exceedingly; for he sincerely loved his country, and saw he had impoverished it with regret. He loved his family likewise, with a tenderness not altogether governed by prudence: a strong instance of this appeared in permitting his brother, the duke of Gloucester, to steal Jaqueline, duchess of Brabant, from her husband, on account of the great dominions which she possessed in her own right; for this gave a great disgust to the duke of Burgundy, as well on the score of the outrage done to his cousin, as because the establishment of this young prince in the Low Countries would have been very unacceptable to himself, as the king might easily have foreseen<sup>g</sup>.

The Scots forces under the command of the earl of Buchan defeat the duke of Clarence at Bauge.

THINGS in the mean time took a new turn in France; for the dauphin having received a supply of six or seven thousand Scots, under the command of the regent's son John Stuart, earl of Buchan, he sent them to defend his frontier on the side of Anjou, and appointed the Sieur de la Fayette, with a corps of French forces, to assist them<sup>h</sup>. These Scots being quartered at Bauge by themselves, the duke of Clarence had intelligence of them; and making no doubt that he should be able to surprize them, marched with fifteen hundred men at arms, and the best archers he had, with that view, leaving orders for the earl of Salisbury to follow him, as soon as he conveniently could, with the rest of his forces. The earl of Buchan, having posted his troops as advantageously as he could, received him gallantly; and the duke,

- a being desirous of obtaining an undivided victory, exposed himself in such a manner, that after performing all that could be expected from his birth and courage, he was slain upon the spot, and his troops defeated: there fell likewise the earl of Kent, lord Grey, the lord Ross, and about three thousand men; the earls of Somerset and Huntingdon, with some other persons of note, were taken prisoners. This victory, though it cost the lives of fifteen hundred French, was, as their writers very justly observe, of great consequence, since it proved that the English were not invincible; and it did great honour to the earl of Buchan, who killed the duke of Clarence with his own hand<sup>2</sup>. The French army next besieged Alençon; the earl of Salisbury marched that way to raise the siege; but finding the enemy too strong he retired; and though he did it with great caution, his rear suffered in his retreat. Henry landed at Calais with twenty-eight thousand men, of which four thousand were horse; he marched directly to the relief of Chartres, which was besieged by the dauphin, who retired at his approach, and he followed him as far as Orléans<sup>3</sup>. On his return, at the request of the people of Paris, he besieged Meaux, which held out for eight months, and, when it surrendered, the king caused the governor to be beheaded. This, and some other instances of rigour, particularly sending the marshal de Lisle Adam to the bastille, for something he took amiss in his looks, chagrined the French exceedingly: but, notwithstanding this, they thought it prudent to make great rejoicings on the news of queen Katherine's being delivered of a son at Windsor, who was considered as the successor of both kingdoms<sup>4</sup>. As for the unfortunate Charles, he would have been more pitied if he had shewn any sense of his misfortunes: but he seemed to be altogether without feeling: and as for the queen, her implacable aversion to the dauphin, her particular kindness for the princess Katherine, who very much resembled her, and the respect paid her by her son-in-law, who was the first prince in Europe, kept her from seeing the real misery of her condition; so that, upon all occasions, she appeared with a freedom and spirit, which, at the same time that it raised the odium of the French, made her contemptible to the English<sup>5</sup>. A. D. 1421.

- HENRY* resolved to open the next campaign with driving all the dauphin's garrisons out of Picardy, and took the field for this purpose in the month of June, having with him the poor infirm king and the two queens. He staid some time at Senlis, while the earl of Warwick cleared the adjacent country; but was suddenly recalled to Paris, by intelligence that the dauphin had friends there, who meant to put him in possession of the place. On his arrival he found a woman, who had been apprehended with letters to such as were privy to this design; and, as she acknowledged her fault, he directed that her accomplices, being secured, they should be thrown together into the river<sup>6</sup>. After this detection and disappointment of his enemies, he returned again to Senlis. The dauphin, in the mean time, invested Coné upon the Loire, with twenty thousand men, and obliged the governor to consent that he would render the place into his hands, if it was not relieved by the duke of Burgundy by the middle of August. The duke, piqued at this, challenged the dauphin to name a day of battle; which being accepted, Henry resolved to be present, and with that view ordered his forces to march from Paris and Picardy through Champagne, to join those of the duke of Burgundy; but finding himself very much indisposed at Melun, he directed his brother, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Warwick, to join the duke of Burgundy as soon as possible, and retired himself into Vincennes<sup>7</sup>. There his distemper increased to such a degree as left little hopes of recovery: this distemper was a fistula, the nature of which, being then little understood, was so ill managed, that a mortification ensued. In his last moments he recommended to the lords that were about him three things; the first was to preserve, by all means possible, the friendship of the duke of Burgundy, and to give him, in case they could engage him to accept it, the regency of France, which, if he refused, he confided to the duke of Bedford: in the next place, he forbid them to set at liberty the French prisoners, till his son should be of full age; and, lastly, he commanded them, in case they should ever be forced to make a peace with Charles de Valois (so he called the dauphin), to secure the duchy of Normandy, and annex it, as an independent sovereignty, to England<sup>8</sup>. He declared Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, regent of England, and appointed the earl of Warwick governor of his son's person. This done he prepared for death, with great calmness and constancy, ending his days on the last of regency, the duke of Bedford assumed it, but governed entirely by his and the queen's advice.

 The unfortunate Charles was daily declining in his health; and, being seized with a quartan ague, died on the twenty-first of October (H), in the fifty-fourth year of his age, the forty-third of his reign, and the thirtieth from the loss of his senses: he was little deplored by his subjects, still less by the English, and there was not so much as a single prince of the blood to attend his funeral<sup>b</sup>.

The state of France under her two kings, Henry and Charles, who are both proclaimed.

At this time, the whole French nation had the heavy misfortune to be considered as rebels and traitors, whatever side they took. At the interment of Charles the sixth, Henry of Wind- sor was proclaimed king of France and England, being then about ten months old; but the sword of state was carried before the duke of Bedford, who, with the title of regent, had all b the power of king<sup>2</sup>. The dauphin Charles was in the twentieth year of his age, a mild prince, of a very gentle and affable disposition, by which he became very acceptable to all who approached him. We meet with very different characters of him in history; but, if we advert to facts only, we shall find that he very much resembled his grandfather; and that those who say his good fortune, in having able ministers and great captains in his service, stood him instead of courage and conduct, do him great wrong; for, if he had not been both a wise and a steady prince, he had never raised France from the wretched condition in which he found her<sup>b</sup>. About ten days before his father's death, he was preserved, by what was then esteemed a miraculous interposition of Providence, from a sudden and miserable death. The

(H) We have already described the person of this monarch, and observed that he was one of the handsomest men of his age. At the age of seventeen his strength was so great, that he was able to break a horseshoe: he wrestled, vaulted, ran at the ring, and performed every sort of manly exercise, with great dexterity. His misfortune was, that, becoming a king before he arrived at years of discretion, he could not be prevailed upon to bestow a proper degree of application upon any thing that was serious, though his uncle, the duke of Bourbon, who was charged with his education, laboured all that was in his power to make him sensible of the misfortunes that would attend this neglect; which at length obliged him to divert his care to his younger brother the duke of Orleans. Yet the natural good qualities of Charles gained him the affection, and, in some degree, the esteem, of his subjects. He caused the body of the constable du Guesclin to be buried with great splendor at St. Denis: neither was he grateful only to the dead, but to the living, insomuch that he never forgot any personal services that were rendered him, but rewarded them amply, some say profusely.
 He was prodigiously given to shews and spectacles, and was never better pleased than when he could find an opportunity to exhibit them. His uncles encouraged all this, which was at the same time very acceptable to the queen Isabella, who loved such amusements more than he. There has been discovered, of late years, an old manuscript of that time, containing the roll of a gallant society, entitled, La court (cour) amoureuse, that is, The amorous court, in which all the principal lords and gentlemen are ranged, under a great variety of titles, taken from the officers of the state and government; so that it appears this was a kind of association for promoting pleasure, and, at the same time, burlesquing business, and every thing solemn and serious.
 A sure and sad symptom of national ruin! for as families sink first into distress, and then to destruction, when those who are at the head of them neglect their duty to follow amusements, the same thing happens in kingdoms, and discontents, dissension, and dissipations, follow a series of gaudy pomp and idle pageantries, often in the same reign, but always in the next, as it fell out here. The king, after his senses were disturbed, enjoyed sometimes three or four months of health, and tolerable understanding; during which he assisted at council, and issued ordinances, which perhaps were contradicted by the ordinances of the next interval of good health; because, in the mean time, a new set of ministers had got into power, insomuch that it was hard to say whether the king's sickness or long life, his own weakness, or his wife's gallantries, the want of experience in his sons, or the boundless ambition of his uncles, were most prejudicial to his realm; but the conjunction of them all, and the loss of the battle of Agincourt, brought it so low, that it is not impossible

Henry V. if he had lived, might have established a new line. His death, which was followed by that of Charles, who lingered but a small time of a quartan ague, increased the public confusion for the present, but made way for a favourable revolution. By his queen Isabel of Bavaria, whom the French represent as equally vicious and cunning, the king had many children; two princes of the name of Charles, who died young; Lewis, duke of Guienne, and, by their death, dauphin, who married Margaret, daughter to the duke of Burgundy, and died at the age of nineteen without issue; John,
 duke of Touraine and Dauphine, who espoused Jaque- line, daughter to the count of Hainault, who also died without issue, about the same age with his brother;
Charles, who succeeded his father; and Philip, who died the same day he was born, and was the child of whom the queen lay-in when the duke of Orleans was murdered; the princess Joan died at two years old;
Isabel espoused first Richard II. king of England, and then Charles, duke of Orleans; another Joan, the consort of John, duke of Bretagne; Mary, who became a nun; Michella, married to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy; and Katherine, their youngest daughter, who married Henry V. and, after his decease, Owen Tudor;
 a gentlemen of Wales, by whom, amongst other children, she had Edmund, earl of Richmond, who was the father of Henry VII. king of England. As for queen
Isabel, we shall have occasion to mention her death, and the circumstances that attended it, hereafter. In those seasons that the king was delirious, the queen, who pretended that she was afraid of being with him, suffered a young woman, whose name was d'Odette de Champdi- vers, to supply her place, by whom he had a natural daughter, Margaret de Valois; stiled the lady of Belle- ville, who was married to John de Harpedene, lord of a room, in which he was giving audience at Rochele, fell all at once, by which very many were wounded, and some, amongst whom was lord James Bourbon, killed on the spot<sup>c</sup>. The dauphin, sinking in his chair, fell upon a thick wall, and there rested, from whence he was taken down without the least hurt. At the time of his accession he was at a little castle, where the first day he put himself in mourning, and dedicated it to grief; the next he appeared in scarlet, and took the title of king, without any other ceremony than displaying the banner of France, and the acclamations of his little court<sup>d</sup>. The English, and the French who adhered to them, stiled him, in contempt, the king of Bourges, though, except the duchy of Guienne, he had all the provinces on the other side of the Loire, the princes of the blood, the best captains, the ablest lawyers; and, which was of much more consequence, the laws themselves on his side<sup>e</sup>. A. D. 1422.

ALL the events at the beginning of this reign were unfortunate: the important town of Melun was taken by the English, through a misunderstanding between the French generals and the earl of Buchan; and this was followed by a revolt of many French lords, who thought the cause of Charles was now become desperate. The duke of Bedford was not inferior to his brother, the deceased king, in point of courage; and, in respect to prudence, he was his superior<sup>f</sup>. He saw the difficulties with which his post, as regent of France, was incumbered; and he foresaw those with which they were like to be augmented. To remove the former, and to prevent the latter, he resolved to unite, if possible, the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne inseparably to his interests<sup>g</sup>. The former had two sisters, Mary, the widow of the late dauphin Lewis, and Anne, who had never been married. He demanded the latter for himself, and procured the former to be given to Arthur, earl of Richmond, brother to the duke of Bretagne, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and whom, by this step, he thought sufficiently attached to the English interest<sup>h</sup>. The battle of Crevant, in Burgundy, was another fortunate event to him, and a terrible blow to Charles. The earls of Salisbury and Suffolk defeated there the earl of Buchan, with the best corps of troops that Charles had in his service, made that earl prisoner, and killed a great many brave officers who commanded under him<sup>i</sup>. He was, however, soon after exchanged, and was received with great marks of favour and affection by Charles, who was the better served by his expressing his content with men's services, whether attended with success or not<sup>k</sup>. 1423.

HE had known great difficulties and distress before; to say the truth, he had known nothing else since he knew any thing; but he was never so closely pressed, or with so little hopes of succour. The countries that owned his authority were already exhausted of men and money; the English were not only possessed of the best part of the kingdom, but, by attacking him on the Loire, and debarking an army in Guienne, which was absolutely in their power, might destroy him in one campaign. He was himself very young, and, which was worse, void of all education; and yet he was so far from despairing, that he invited other men to share in his hopes<sup>l</sup>. The earl of Buchan had been stiled constable of the Scots, most of whom were slain in successive actions; the king, to console him, and to draw greater succours from the same country, gave him the sword, and created him constable of France; he bestowed likewise the lordship of Aubigny upon Sir John Stuart of Darnley, on whom he afterwards conferred the county of Evreux. This had a good effect; the duke of Albany concluded an alliance with him on the terms which he proposed, and sent over the lord Douglas with six thousand men, to whom Charles gave the duchy of Touraine, and declared him lieutenant general<sup>m</sup>. The duke of Milan sent him six hundred horse, and a thousand cross bows; many of his own subjects raised considerable corps at their own expence; by this means he brought a considerable army into the field, leaving the operations to the discretion of his generals, which he might do with greater propriety, since, strictly speaking, he had not either experience or troops of his own. One of his captains had surprized Yuri, which, being a place of great consequence, the English had invested; the constable marched to his relief with fourteen thousand men, of whom one half were of his own country; but the place surrendered before their arrival. The constable turned short upon Verneuil, which was a place of great consequence; and, pretending he had raised the siege of Yuri, engaged the garrison to surrender<sup>n</sup>. Charles endeavours to draw assistance from foreign princes to support his title.

THIS so much provoked the regent duke of Bedford, that he marched in person, attended by the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, with a superior army, to recover it. Several of the French generals were for leaving a strong garrison in the place, and declining a battle, which they had formerly found the best method of proceeding; and which, perhaps, had been most expedient. But the constable and the other generals of his country were of a contrary opinion; His troops beat at the fatal battle of Verneuil, in which the constable and the

and, notwithstanding the French lords urged that their king had no army but this, which if beaten he had no resource, yet they persisted in their resolution of fighting, asserting, that a battle gained would change the face of affairs, give a reputation to the king's arms, and very probably excite insurrections in his favour in most of the provinces in the kingdom: the duke of Alençon, and one or two other great lords, being of the same mind, it was determined to fight<sup>o</sup>. On the sixteenth of August, the duke of Bedford appeared with his army drawn up in one line, the constable made the like disposition with great skill, intending to have remained firm, and to have received the charge; but the viscount of Narbonne, full of impatience, marched directly to attack the English with his own cavalry, and was followed by other French lords, which obliged the constable to follow them, and to lose the advantage of his post and of his disposition<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Bedford, on the contrary, halted, as soon as they began to move; so that they were fatigued and out of breath when they began to attack; and, being vigorously repulsed, and their general killed, were quickly broke. But, notwithstanding this, the Italian horse broke through the archers, and fell upon the English camp, which they were tempted to plunder; this left the main body open on all sides; and, after a dispute of an hour, it was broke, and the French totally defeated. There fell in this fatal field, the constable, the earl of Douglas, his son, the counts of Aumale, Ventadour, and Tonnere, with upwards of one hundred other lords, besides the viscount of Narbonne, whose body the duke of Bedford caused to be broke on a wheel, and then exposed on a gibbet, because he was one of the ten present at the death of the duke of Burgundy<sup>q</sup>. Five thousand private men were killed in the battle and in the flight; the duke of Alençon, his bastard brother, and the marshal de l'Efflat, were made prisoners. The loss on the other side was so considerable, that the duke of Bedford forbid any rejoicings for a victory that had cost him so dear; and granted an honourable capitulation to the garrison of Verneuil, as being very well pleased to recover the place without the fatigue of a siege<sup>r</sup>.

This reduces the affairs of Charles VII. into a dismal condition, in which he sustains himself by his temper.

THE affairs of Charles were now in so low and sad a situation, that they could not well be in a worse; he had but very few strong places, no army, most of his generals killed, and, which was the greatest misfortune of all, was totally without resource. His subjects were exhausted to such a degree, that no violence could have extorted much; instead of attempting this, he seemed to take a satisfaction in sharing their misery, lived as they did, and demanded nothing. He lost none of the few friends he had left; on the contrary, many abandoned their estates, and came to join their shattered fortunes to his<sup>s</sup>. He received them with open arms; he caressed and commended them; and declared, upon all occasions, his inclination to reward, as soon as it was in his power: to say all, in a few words, his condition was now so sunk, that his affability was his sole prerogative; and the reputation he had established of gratitude, the only remnant of revenue. The duke of Bedford might have marched to the Loire the next spring, and have buried the ruins of the French monarchy, with its monarch, in the succeeding summer; but, as if he had been ashamed of oppressing so feeble an enemy, he indulged them as long a time to breathe in as they could desire<sup>t</sup>. Yet the duke of Bedford was as vigilant as he was brave; and this inactivity, which saved the French, proceeded from his misfortune, not his fault. The prodigious success of the English, and the glory attending it, had corrupted even the greatest minds. Humphrey duke of Gloucester, regent of England, and the duke of Bedford's brother, not satisfied with the possession of Jaqueline, countess of Hainault, whom he had taken from her husband the duke of Brabant, would likewise tear from him the countries which he held in her right; and, with this view, had debarked a numerous English army, more than sufficient to have completed the conquest of France; where they had easily crushed the duke of Brabant, if his cousin, the duke of Burgundy, had not stepped in to his relief<sup>u</sup>. This was that unexpected diversion which saved Charles from destruction, by obliging the regent duke of Bedford to turn all his views on this side; and to employ those great parts and that persuasive eloquence with which he was blessed, to reconcile his brother and his brother-in-law, and to prevent the empire, which the victorious Henry had raised, from mouldering into ruins before it was well established. In this necessary design he met with so many obstacles, that, notwithstanding the apparent danger of his leaving France, he was constrained to make a tour to England, where the management of several important affairs detained him for some months, to the great prejudice of his nephew's concerns in this his new kingdom<sup>v</sup>.

The duke of Bretagne and

CHARLES having this leisure to look round him, might have fortified some principal towns, entered into alliances, or at least have raised a new army; but none of these could be one without treasures ; and he was distressed for a subsistence. But there was something to be done within the compass of his power, and this was done. He understood that Arthur, earl of Richmond, notwithstanding his close alliance with the duke of Bedford, had received some offence from being refused the command of the English army, which he thought due to his high rank, and very suitable to his being an English peer. The ministers of Charles, knowing he had been bred up at the French court, and had behaved very gallantly at Agincourt, thought it not impossible to recover him ; and, by his means, the duke of Bretagne, his brother. With this view a negotiation was set on foot, which, though put into the hands of a very able man, miscarried<sup>c</sup>. This was the president Louvet, the companion of the king's misfortunes, and the director of his finances ; but he had the misfortune to be odious to the house of Bretagne ; and, therefore, nothing that came from him was regarded. The king thereupon had recourse to his mother-in-law, the queen dowager of Naples, who, taking with her his prime minister Tannegui du Chastel, went to the court of Bretagne, and by dextrously playing the constable's sword in the eyes of the earl of Richmond, who was eager to be at the head of an army, carried her point, though on pretty hard conditions, since the king was forced to give hostages, and even cautionary places, for the security of the earl's person, who farther declared he could not enter into his service, but with the consent of the duke of Burgundy<sup>d</sup>. This was also admitted, in hopes that it might prove a means of entering into a negotiation with the duke of Burgundy ; and it had this effect ; for the duke consented to the earl of Richmond's promotion ; and, having lately married the lady Bona of Artois, sister to the count of Eu, shewed some inclination to reconcile himself to the king ; but, how acceptable soever these transactions might be in one light, they caused no small chagrin, when viewed in another ; for the duke of Bretagne insisted on the removal of the president Louvet, and two or three other persons, who had been always about the king ; and the duke of Burgundy would hear of nothing while the king had for his first minister the man who had the chief hand in murdering his father<sup>e</sup>. This was Tannegui du Chastel, a person, in all other points irreproachable, and who acted in that affair from his zeal for the memory of the duke of Orleans, in whose service he had been brought up from his youth. His behaviour at this critical juncture gained him credit, even with his enemies ; for he went to the king, and, after a modest recapitulation of his services, declared, the only reward he sought was his leave to retire<sup>f</sup>. The president Louvet and the rest were also forced to give way ; but they did it with a bad grace, and the president insisted upon naming the Sieur Giac his successor. These precautions taken, Arthur, earl of Richmond, received the sword of constable. He soon after took the field, and recovered several places from the English upon the frontiers of Normandy<sup>g</sup>.

THE earl of Warwick, who commanded for king Henry in Normandy, being informed that the duke of Bretagne had done homage for his duchy and county of Montford to king Charles, made himself master of Ponterson, and of St. James de Beuvron, which being conveniently situated, he made continual inroads from thence to the very gates of Rennes. The new constable of France marched speedily to the relief of his brother, recovered Ponterson, and blocked up Beuvron ; but was obliged to raise the siege for want of supplies<sup>h</sup>. In the first transport of his passion he seized the chancellor of Bretagne, and carried him to Chinon, where the king then was, who pacified him with some difficulty ; and, having got the chancellor out of his hands, sent him with a commission to the court of Burgundy. The constable then fell upon Giac, and finding him involved in a quarrel with another of the king's favourites, whose name was Trimouille, he took him into his councils. With his assistance, he forced the castle in which Giac lay, and taking him out of bed, carried him to a place entirely in his own power ; and there, with an odd and irregular form of justice, caused him to be condemned for embezzling the king's money ; and without farther ceremony threw him into the river<sup>i</sup>. The violence of the constable was less condemned than the wickedness of Trimouille, who had an intrigue with Giac's wife (the same person who was the duke of Burgundy's mistress), and married her. Soon after the king replaced his unfortunate minister by a gentleman of Louvergne, whose name was Camus de Beaulieu ; and he had likewise the misfortune not to please the constable, who ordered him to be stabbed near Poitiers ; then going to court, instead of excusing it, he told the king that he was but an ill judge of ministers, and for the future he would chuse for him. Charles, who without being either a coward or a fool, could submit to necessity with a better grace than ever prince did, desired to know who was to be his minister ; the constable answered, Trimouille ; it shall be so, replied the king; but I knew him better than you, and that he will give you cause to repent it<sup>m</sup>. Montargès was at this time besieged by the English; and, being a place of consequence, the king was very desirous to relieve it: an army was assembled to escorte a great convoy of provisions, and the constable would have charged himself with the enterprize; but, being told it was beneath his dignity, the command was given to the bastard of Orleans; who not only performed what was expected from him, but was so fortunate as to oblige the earl of Warwick to raise the siege<sup>n</sup>. But, while his arms were successful on this side, the regent duke of Bedford, who had reconciled himself to the duke of Burgundy, invaded Bretagne with a great army, compelled the duke to subscribe the treaty of Troye, and to give him all possible assurance of remaining an obedient subject to his nephew king Henry. Trimouille, to make his court to his master, advised him to lay hold of this opportunity to humble the constable; but, as this minister had rendered himself odious to several of the princes of the blood, they took part with the earl of Richmond, which produced a kind of civil war; in which, however, the king had the better<sup>o</sup>. In this situation the people deplored alike their domestic troubles and apprehensions from the English.

The earl of Salisbury besieges Orleans, and is killed before the place.

THE war was carried on with great spirit, and with different success in all corners of the kingdom; and brave men on both sides signalized themselves by their exploits; which, however, decided nothing, but served to breed many experienced officers, and to introduce a more regular discipline, as well as to improve the art of managing artillery and small arms, beyond any thing that had been seen in former wars<sup>p</sup>. But the regent duke of Bedford, having once more fixed the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, recurred to his former plan, and resolved to make the entire conquest of France. He was already in possession of a place upon the Loire, which enabled him to pass that river at his pleasure; but it was at too great a distance; and he was apprehensive, that if he had attacked Charles with his whole forces in this manner, he might pass the river in another place, and march to Paris<sup>q</sup>. After mature deliberation, therefore, he appointed Thomas Montagu, earl of Salisbury, to command a body of ten thousand veteran troops, and gave him instructions to besiege Orleans (though some say he undertook it of himself), a place of great extent, and, for those times at least, well fortified. Salisbury executed this command with equal vigour and capacity, he spent the summer in reducing all the fortified posts in the neighbourhood of that city, and formed the siege at the entrance of autumn<sup>r</sup>. On the other hand, Charles, considering the loss of Orleans as the prelude to the loss of his dominions, took all the precautions possible for its defence. Very considerable magazines were raised, and a great quantity of military stores lodged in the place. The lord de Gaucour, a person of great experience and reputation, was the governor, and he was assisted by the Sieur la Hire Saintrailles: in a word, most of the brave men who had raised themselves to rank and fame, threw themselves into this city, in order to defend it as long as it was possible; the siege lasted all the winter, and the earl of Salisbury had the misfortune to be killed by a cannon shot; but the earl of Suffolk, on whom the command devolved, continued it with equal vigour and vigilance; and, by receiving continual supplies, the army was increased to twenty-three thousand men<sup>s</sup>. The method of investing was at this time very rude; for we find that they had six great and fifty-four small forts round the place; but, as there were open spaces between them, the bastard of Orleans and other gallant officers found means to introduce succours; and the garrison from twelve hundred, was, by the end of the year, swelled to three thousand men<sup>t</sup>; amongst whom were the flower of the French nobility.

The famous battle of Herrings in which the French are beat by Sir John Fastolfe.

AT the approach of Lent, the regent duke of Bedford sent a convoy of salt-fish to the camp, with an escort of seventeen hundred men, commanded by Sir John Fastolfe, or Falstaffe, of which Charles having intelligence, he sent the count de Clermont, with a corps of troops, to attack that convoy, upon which depended the continuance of the siege. Sir John perceiving the approach of the enemy, drew his men behind his carriages; and not only sustained the shock with great intrepidity, but repulsed the assailants, and put them into disorder; upon which, ordering some of the carriages to be withdrawn, he sallied with his forces, and defeated the French entirely<sup>u</sup>. This was stiled the battle of Herrings, and makes a great figure in the history of those times<sup>v</sup>. The bastard of Orleans, who with four hundred men had marched from Orleans to support this attack, had the good fortune to return, and to get safe into the city, which, notwithstanding, was soon reduced so very low, and there was so little appearance of any relief, that the garrison at length offered to surrender to the duke of Burgundy, which the English generals rejected;

a this, in all probability, preserved both the city and the crown to Charles, who, upon its surrender, must have retired into the mountains of Dauphine, as having no force sufficient to keep the field *. But while things were in this state, a miracle, as the French would have us believe, a singular and lucky stratagem, as the penetration of later times have taught us to call it, saved Orleans, and delivered Charles from the necessity of seeking shelter in inaccessible places from the pursuit of his victorious enemies †. An event which has afforded matter for volumes, but of which we shall speak very succinctly ‡.

A LITTLE before the battle of Herrings, a young woman, whose name was Joan d'Arc, The maid of a native of the village of Domremi, near Vauculeurs, came to the governor of the last Orleans first mentioned place, and demanded that he should send her to the king, as having been promised, relieves, and by a divine revelation, that, under her command, the king's forces should raise the siege of Orleans. But the governor considering she was but between eighteen and twenty, and a city. person no way distinguished amongst the country people for understanding, refused, for fear of making himself ridiculous †. She came after the battle, and reproached him with want of zeal for his master's service, and told him, that if he did not now send her, Orleans would be lost. Upon this the governor ordered two gentlemen to attend her to Chinon, where the king was; and though there could not be a more dangerous journey, yet, as she had confidently promised, they performed it safely ‡. Upon her arrival, the council made some difficulty of admitting her to the royal presence; but at length this was effected. The king was in his apartment, surrounded by many persons of distinction, without any marks of his high rank, to whom she immediately addressed herself, and told him that she had a commission from Heaven to deliver his city of Orleans, and to conduct him afterwards to Rheims, in order to celebrate his coronation †. The king either was or affected to be in great doubt, demanded some evident incontestible marks of her mission, caused her to be examined by a committee of divines, and sent her afterwards to Poitiers to confer with the parliament. Having had the advice of both, he ordered a body of ten or twelve thousand men to assemble, in order to serve as an escorte to a great convoy, which she undertook to conduct safely into the city. This she performed, shut herself up afterwards in the place †, with the assistance of the bastard of Orleans, harassed the besiegers so much, that at length they were constrained to retire, after having lain before, and in the neighbourhood of, the city, upwards of a year. From this exploit she was stiled La Pucelle d'Orleans, or, the Maid of Orleans: she wore the dress of a man, appeared on horseback like a young cavalier, charged at the head of the troops with great courage, affected an extraordinary piety, and was irreproachable in point of morals.

LA PUCELLE remained but two days in Orleans after the raising of the siege, and then She performs repaired to the king, whom she pressed † exceedingly to take the resolution of going to Rheims, many great there to receive his crown, after the accustomed forms; which, however, was vehemently things, and is opposed by some of the great lords, and most of the experienced officers, as a thing utterly highly esteemed impracticable; but the Pucelle had her party likewise, who prevailed; and it was at last and gratefully resolved that it should be attempted †. The difficulties were great, but the Pucelle had the the king. honour of overcoming most of them, by which her reputation was highly raised, the courage of the French troops elevated, from a notion that they were conducted by a person inspired; and this likewise made no small impression on the English and Burgundian troops, who were no longer invincible in their garrisons, or even in the field, where victory had accompanied them before †. In fine, Rheims opened her gates, the king was solemnly crowned on the 17th of July, pushed his conquests as far as the Seine, and even made an attempt upon Paris, where the Pucelle exposed herself extremely, but at length was obliged to desist †. In the mean time a new negotiation was set on foot with the duke of Burgundy, which, however, was baffled by the industry and address of the duke of Bedford, who, notwithstanding, declined fighting the French army; and, it is remarkable, that the forces of the kingdom were now so much reduced, that the troops on both sides, at the close of this campaign, did not exceed twenty-five thousand men †. The Pucelle demanded the king's A. D. 1429. leave to retire, as having completed her mission; but her presence was thought so necessary, that the king constrained her to remain; and, as a mark of his favour and gratitude for past services, ennobled her family, bestowed on them the name of Du Lis, and all their descendents a males and females; the latter part, however, of this grant has been since abolished *.

Is however taken in a silly at the siege of Compeigne, and is delivered to the English.

THE duke of Bedford, in order to secure the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, concluded new treaties with each of them, giving to the former Champagne and Brie, and to the latter the county of Poitou, when they should be able to conquer them; he likewise amused the people of Paris with the hopes of seeing the young king Henry, who was to come and keep a magnificent court amongst them; but, finding that they were privately taking measures to put their city into the hands of king Charles, he seized about one hundred and fifty of the wealthiest citizens who were in that interest, beheaded some, broke others upon the wheel, and obliged the rest to deliver themselves by paying a heavy ransom, which furnished him with money, of which he stood in great need<sup>1</sup>. Amadeus the eighth, duke of Savoy, and Lewis de Chalon, prince of Orange, who had hitherto professed themselves friends to king Charles, believed it very practicable to share Dauphine between them, by which the duke was to have Grenoble and the mountainous country about it; and the prince Vienne, and as much of the rest of the province as he could keep<sup>m</sup>. However, Ralph, lord of Gaucour, governor for the king, having very early intelligence of this confederacy, attacked and beat the prince of Orange, who narrowly escaped with his life, and afterwards reconciled himself to the king, and entered into his service<sup>n</sup>. But the most important event of this year was the siege of Compeigne, which the duke of Burgundy invested with a numerous army. The place was gallantly defended by the Sieur de Blacy, and the Pucelle throwing herself into it with an additional force, made a sally on the 26th of May, in which she had the misfortune to be taken prisoner by a gentleman of Burgundy, who sold her to the English<sup>o</sup>. Notwithstanding this misfortune, Compeigne was so well defended, that the count de Vendosme, having assembled a competent number of troops, forced the besiegers in their camp, and obliged them to retire in such haste, that they left their artillery and baggage, which so raised the spirits of his forces, that he offered the duke of Burgundy battle, which that prince thought it prudent to decline<sup>p</sup>.

A. D. 1450.

Carried to Rouen and burnt there as a sorceress and a witch, while Henry VI. was in that city.

THE war was carried on with as much vigour on both sides as the shattered state of their finances and the exhausted condition of the provinces would allow; so that every day produced either the surprisal of towns, excursions for plunder, or disputes in the field; which, however, determined nothing<sup>q</sup>. The disputed succession of the duchy of Lorraine augmented the differences between king Charles and the duke of Burgundy, the former took part with Rene d'Anjou, brother to Lewis, king of Sicily, who had married Isabella, the daughter of the last duke Charles; and the duke espoused that of the count de Vaudemont, brother to the deceased duke of Lorraine. This affair was for the present decided by a battle, in which Rene was made prisoner<sup>r</sup>. The regent duke of Bedford, who had caused the young king his nephew to pass the sea to Calais, from whence he came to Rouen, made use of his presence there to countenance the prosecution of the Pucelle, who was charged with heresy, sorcery, and seducing the people from their duty. She defended herself with great firmness and spirit, during a trial that lasted for several months; but, being condemned, she submitted herself to the censure of the church, abjured her heresy, resumed the habit of her sex, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, without receiving any other sustenance than bread and water. A few days after, her dressing again in man's apparel was adjudged contumacy, and she condemned, by the bishop of Beauvois and the inquisitors, who were her judges, to the flames; and, being delivered to the secular power, was accordingly burnt in the market place of Rouen<sup>s</sup>. She suffered with courage, and asserted she was no impostor. Her memory was justified twenty-four years after, when the crown of France was the strongest, by the papal authority; but the dispute is not yet settled amongst the learned, whether she was a saint, a witch, or, what the moderns call, a girl of spirit. On the second of December, Henry made his entry into Paris, by the gate of St. Denis, was received with apparent marks of duty and submission, and of joy likewise; he paid his respects to his grandmother, the queen dowager, and on the 17th was crowned in the cathedral of Notre Dame, by his uncle, the cardinal bishop of Winchester, which disobligeed the bishop of Paris extremely<sup>t</sup>; there were only two spiritual and none of the temporal peers present. On the 21st he held his bed a of justice in open parliament, and received the homage of all the members. Before the close of the year he returned again to Rouen, with an intention of revisiting Paris the following<sup>u</sup>.

THE reason for which the duke of Bedford sent him thither, was, that his person might be secure, the troops of king Charles making frequently incursions as far as the Seine, and there being still some suspicions as to the fidelity of the people of Paris. Yet this step, that was equally prudent and well executed, was very near producing a bad effect, a French gentleman surprizing the castle, with one hundred and twenty men; and the city had been likewise taken, if the troops employed for that purpose had not quarrelled about the division of the booty before the place was taken, which gave the English and the townsmen an opportunity of recovering the castle, and of executing the best part of the garrison, who had b surrendered at discretion<sup>w</sup>. The bastard of Orleans, now stiled count of Dunois, had been more fortunate in surprizing Chartres; and the English, in their turn, made themselves masters of Montargis<sup>x</sup>, which the French attempted to recover, but failed, through the negligence of la Trimouille, the king's first minister, who becoming thereby very odious, the constable resolved to treat him as he had done his predecessors. Having concerted measures with some of the principal persons about the court, who abhorred him for his pride, they seized him in the castle of Chinon, in the very next room to the king; and, after a struggle, in which the minister was wounded, carried him away prisoner, and shut him up in the castle of Montresor, where he remained long confined<sup>y</sup>. The king at first shewed himself highly exasperated at this outrage on his authority; but finding there was no remedy, c and having himself also just cause to be offended with the minister, who was very near as arbitrary as ever the constable had been, he suffered himself to be pacified by the queen, and bestowed his confidence on her brother the count de Maine, who had been one of the most active in seizing Trimouille<sup>z</sup>, and who was excited to this behaviour by the promise of the constable that he should be his successor. A. D. 1432.

CHARLES went yet farther, which, perhaps, was going too far: he called a kind of assembly of the states at Tours, where his chancellor declared in his name to the assembly, that the king was not offended with those who had seized la Trimouille, but held them still in his good graces. This was the third time that the constable had changed the ministry by violence; and yet, at the persuasion of the count de Maine, the king was reconciled to him, and d received him again at court as if nothing had happened<sup>a</sup>. The modern historians say, that Charles, who was young and much addicted to his pleasures, hated business, and was very glad to let any body govern, provided they left him to divert himself in peace. He was certainly young, amorous, and well enough pleased with spectacles; but he was very far from wanting either parts or courage, and he very often shewed both when they were least expected; but hitherto he had been always governed, and those who governed him did his business well. Many of the princes and great lords were both able and inclined to serve him, but they would do it in their own way; and, whatever might be in his will, it was certainly not in his power, to render them more submissive<sup>b</sup>. He saw, therefore, that, by pursuing his pleasures, to which he was no enemy, his own affairs and those of the state would not e suffer; since the nobility, who affected to be independent, were willing and able enough to carry on the war<sup>c</sup>. He knew that the constable, though very impetuous and overbearing, was an excellent officer, and had a great influence over his brother, and had the honour of the crown and the welfare of the public sincerely at heart, which were motives sufficient not to make him very difficult about a reconciliation; but, besides all this, he very well knew, that how much soever he might be obliged to stoop, while his crown was in dispute, he might resume the monarch at any time, when in full possession of his dominions<sup>d</sup>. He contented himself, therefore, with being a spectator, and with carrying on some intrigues with the duke of Orleans in England, which turned highly to his advantage. In the mean time some insurrections in the Low Countries embarrassed the duke of Burgundy; and his f sister, the duchess of Bedford, dying, some disputes arose between him and the regent, who, without consulting him, had married a second wife. The cardinal of Winchester, in order to reconcile them, proposed an interview at St. Omers, to which place they both came, but, notwithstanding, never met; for the duke of Burgundy insisting upon the first visit, they withdrew more exasperated than ever, each determined to pursue his own measures<sup>e</sup>. 1433.

THE war had occasioned a famine through the greatest part of the kingdom: in Normandy more especially the people suffered so much, and thought themselves so ill used by some of the English commanders, that they revolted both in the Upper and Lower Normandy, took several places, and, if they had been joined in time by any of Charles's forces, might have recovered their province. As it was, they were in a short time reduced, partly by promises and partly by force; and all that their rising produced, was an increase of those mischiefs which they assigned as the causes of their taking up arms<sup>f</sup>. The duke of Bourbon being dead, after a long captivity in England, his son the count de Clermont, who now bore that title, made a potent diversion on the side of Burgundy, notwithstanding he had married the duke's sister. At first, in all probability, the war was in earnest, but by degrees they fell to treat, and at length they made a particular treaty, which produced some insinuations of the king's inclination to compromise the disputes that had so long subsisted between them. The constable then renewed his intercourse with the duke of Burgundy, who perceiving that he should find equal inconveniencies in case the English prevailed, which was not now at all probable, or, if Charles carried his point, without coming to a previous agreement, resolved to treat at once, and secure to himself those advantages which could not well be refused him, as things then stood<sup>g</sup>. In the mean time the duke of Orleans, in concert, as it may be reasonably supposed, with king Charles, had amused the government in England with the hopes of an advantageous treaty of peace, which was to be negotiated at Calais. The design of this seems to have been to procure the consent of the English court to treat at any rate; to which, when they had once yielded, they could not avoid sending their plenipotentiaries to Arras, where two legates were arrived, one from the pope, and the other from the council at Basil, and where the duke of Burgundy not only assisted by his ministers, but also in person<sup>h</sup>.

THE offers made by the French plenipotentiaries were the duchies of Normandy and Guienne entire, the usual homage only reserved, which the English ministers absolutely and scornfully rejected; insisting, that both parties should keep what they had got, excepting only the exchange of such towns and districts on both sides as were situate within each other's general bounds, and might thereby prove the source of new disputes. As they would not depart in the least from these terms, the mediators declared in favour of the propositions made by Charles; and upon this the English plenipotentiaries withdrew<sup>i</sup>. This was precisely what king Charles and the duke of Burgundy wanted, who had already settled, at least in a good measure, all their disputes; and the treaty being quickly reduced into form, was signed and ratified by both parties. It was mortifying enough, in many respects, to the monarch who made it, and as advantageous, in all respects, to the duke of Burgundy, as he could desire. Therefore the necessity on one hand, and the advantages expected on the other, secured the king against any reproaches for making a treaty, which, in many respects, derogated from his dignity, and which would have been highly prejudicial to his interest, if he could, with any propriety, be said to have any interest, capable of standing in competition with the peace<sup>k</sup>. In the space of a week after the peace was concluded died Isabella, queen-dowager of France, of a broken heart, occasioned in a great measure, as the French historians say, by the reproaches thrown upon her by the English foldiers, who told her, to her face, that she knew her son Charles to have no relation to the king her husband. She had lived long in a private condition; her death made little impression, and her coffin, being put into a boat, with four of her domestics, was sent by water to St. Denis, and there interred, without so much as a bishop to perform the funeral ceremonies<sup>l</sup>. In her will she expressed great tenderness for the regent duke of Bedford, whom she stiled her son. There has been a tomb erected for her since, though it cannot be said, with any propriety, to do honour to her memory, since a wolf is placed at the feet of her effigies, as a symbol of her cruel, rapacious, and unnatural disposition<sup>m</sup>. In the month of December following died the regent duke of Bedford, at Rouen, concerning whom the French and English historians seem to contend which shall speak best. He was, in all respects, one of the ablest and bravest men of his time, equally respected and regretted by both nations. The French recovered this year Dieppe, and several other places in Normandy; and the ill reception the duke of Burgundy's notification of his treaty met with in England gave them good reason to hope, that this prince, who by this peace was become neuter, would be, in consequence of it, obliged to declare himself their ally; though this was far enough from being his original intention<sup>n</sup>.

THE duke of York succeeded the late king's brother, the duke of Bedford, in the regency of France; but, though a prince adorned with many good qualities, yet having a high spirit,

- a and expecting as deep a submission when things went ill as when they were ever so prosperous, he was much less fit for that employment<sup>o</sup>. However, having clear courage and great activity, he might perhaps have done tolerably well, if he had been sent over immediately; but the factions in England prevented that, and thereby made way for such misfortunes as were afterwards without remedy. The constable of France, though he had not an army sufficient to attempt the siege, laboured to distress the city of Paris by a distant blockade, and preventing regular supplies of provisions, in which he succeeded so far as to make the inhabitants very uneasy<sup>p</sup>. Sir Robert Willoughby commanded in that capital with a garrison of about fifteen hundred men; and, as long as the duke of Burgundy was in the English interest, held the people in great order; but, after the treaty of Arras, he found himself under great difficulties, which put him under the necessity of treating them more severely; upon which they entered into a secret negotiation with the constable, and offered, provided they might have a general indemnity, and a confirmation of their privileges, to seize one of their gates, and to admit his forces. This the constable readily promised, and undertook that the king should confirm it: and, having surprized a part of the garrison, the citizens fulfilled their promise, and delivered him one of their gates: the English governor, Willoughby, assisted by such prelates as yet adhered to king Henry's interest, did all that was possible to repel the French, and preserve the place; and at length, when this was found impossible, retired into the Bastile, where they were presently blocked up<sup>q</sup>. Some disputes arose whether any terms should be offered, or whether they should insist upon their surrendering at discretion; but the constable, perceiving that the people of Paris inclined to treat the English garrison mildly, he offered that they should be sent to Rouen, either by land or water: they chose the latter, and the capitulation was punctually executed<sup>r</sup>.
- THIS glorious action restored the constable entirely to his master's favour, who did not immediately repair to Paris, but first solemnized the marriage of his son the dauphin with a princess of Scotland, Margaret daughter to James II. and next took care to regulate every thing in the best manner possible in the provinces on the other side of the Loire. The duke of Burgundy, finding that the English were negotiating an alliance with the emperor Sigismund, and suspecting that they encouraged insurrections in the Low Countries, resolved to declare openly in favour of France, which he did; and, with a numerous army, besieged Calais. But the duke of Gloucester coming over with a competent strength, compelled him to raise the siege, and afterwards ravaged Artois and other provinces adjacent. The duke of York likewise landing in Normandy, with a body of English troops, quickly recovered most part of the French conquests, and made the necessary dispositions for taking the field early the next spring with a competent army, while a formidable rebellion in the Low Countries put it out of the power of the duke of Burgundy to give his new allies any kind of assistance<sup>s</sup>.
- THE winter proving very hard, general Talbot, one of the ablest and one of the most fortunate of the English officers, took advantage of a great fall of snow, and, having dressed his soldiers in white, surprized Pontois; and the French, who made a like attempt upon Rouen, not only failed, but suffered extremely in their retreat<sup>t</sup>. The parliament and other sovereign courts being returned to Paris, the inhabitants were very desirous the king should also return thither: but Charles, who knew the rumours that had been spread to his prejudice, persisted in the resolution he had formed, of not going thither till he had performed some action of importance: he sent orders, therefore, to the constable, to assemble as many troops as he could, in order to besiege Montreuil, which, by commanding the Seine, gave the people at Paris much disturbance: as the place was strong, and had a good garrison, it made an obstinate defence; however, when an assault was practicable, the king assisted in person, passed the ditch up to the middle, mounted the ladder that was raised against the breach, and was among the first who entered the place, which was quickly taken, the garrison retiring into the castle, which also capitulated in a few days<sup>u</sup>. This had the effect the king proposed, raised his reputation highly, and contributed not a little to the universal joy that was expressed at his making a solemn entry into Paris, on the 17th of November, after an absence of about nineteen years<sup>v</sup>. This joy, however, was of very short duration, since, in six weeks time, he was obliged to abandon it on account of the plague, which was accompanied with famine and another severe winter, in which wolves passing the river in the night, destroyed numbers of people in the streets<sup>x</sup>. This scarcity extended itself through the greatest part of the kingdom; and the long continuance of the war having, in a manner, a extinguished industry, multitudes had no other way of subsisting than by rapine; at the same time the general poverty was so great, that it was not easy to find any who had much to lose <sup>y</sup>.

Charles, in an assembly of the clergy, lays the foundation of the liberties of the Gallican church.

THE king passed the next year on the other side of the Loire, where he had an affair of great importance to manage <sup>a</sup>. The council of Basil had quarrelled with pope Eugenius the fifth. Having taken several resolutions to bridle the papal power, they sent them by five ambassadors to the king, desiring that, by his authority, they might be observed throughout his dominions. Charles, upon this, called an assembly of the clergy at Bourges, where, in the presence of the princes of the blood, and of the chief nobility of the kingdom, he caused these canons to be examined; and finding them, for the most part, to be very wise and just, b and perfectly calculated to extinguish the capital grievances <sup>a</sup> that had been so long complained of, he caused them to be compiled into a law, for the benefit of the Gallican church, to which he gave the title of the Pragmatic sanction: by this the power of nominating to ecclesiastical dignities, granting expectatives, pensions, exemptions, and other acts of power, were taken from the see of Rome; and those branches of the papal prerogatives, which were not abolished, were so curtailed, as to be less injurious to the people and detrimental to the monarchy <sup>b</sup>. But when the council afterwards deposed the pope, he would not withdraw his obedience <sup>c</sup>; neither would he yield to the intercessions of this or of the succeeding pontiffs, with relation to the Pragmatic sanction, which has been justly considered as the great bulwark of the rights of the Gallican church, against the tyrannical pretensions of the c Roman pontiffs <sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1433.

A treaty with England, which comes, in the end, to nothing, tho' both parties stand in need of it.

The duchess of Burgundy, who, as a daughter of Portugal, was nearly related to Henry the sixth, being both descended from John duke of Lancaster, prevailed upon that monarch to send over his uncle the cardinal of Winchester to confer with the plenipotentiary of France, about the means of procuring a peace, which was alike necessary to both parties; but these conferences, though often renewed, came at last to nothing <sup>e</sup>. In the mean time the constable, with some difficulty, took Meaux; but, having besieged Auranges, general Talbot surprized his forces, and constrained him to raise the siege <sup>f</sup>. The king was so much chagrined at this, that he sent orders to the constable to keep the army assembled, in order to undertake some other enterprize; but, from the licence of those times, that was found d impracticable: upon which the king, by the advice of the constable and chief officers, contrived the best plan of discipline that the then state of his affairs would admit; and, having provided for the constant and regular pay of the forces, declared his intention to see that plan carried into execution for the public benefit, and without respect of persons; which, though perfectly well intended, was, however, very ill taken, by many who found their private account in the public disorders, and pretended that past services were ill requited; because, after having defended the king's subjects, they were not allowed to plunder them <sup>g</sup>. But Charles, who saw the reasonableness of the new regulation, and who also foresaw their consequences, though he gave good words to the malecontents, remained firm to his resolution, which was, in effect, the first attempt made to introduce a true scheme of duty, e and to subject military men to military laws <sup>h</sup>.

The dauphin concurs with the malecontents in the sedition called the Praguerie.

THE dukes of Bourbon and Alençon were among the number of the malecontents; and the count Dunois, who could not bear the superiority of the constable, was amongst them likewise: but the principal author and mover of this sedition was la Tremouille, who, having recovered his liberty, thought he must of course be restored to the post of prime minister <sup>i</sup>. By his advice they practised upon the dauphin, and, notwithstanding the honesty and integrity of the count de la Marche, his governor, drew that young prince, who was but in his eighteenth year, to join them. They made choice of Blois for their rendezvous, to which city the constable came by choice, so that they had every thing in their power; and yet were so imprudent, as, after affronting, to let him go. It was with some difficulty he joined the f king, who could not help saying, at the sight of him, "Now I have my constable, I am "afraid of nobody:" which, however, was not exactly the truth; since he proposed to shut himself up in a fortress: to which the constable answered, "Remember the fate of a "Richard of England, don't shut up yourself<sup>k</sup>." The king then began to arm, sent a herald to demand his son from the duke of Alençon, and, with the few troops he had about him, marched directly against the malecontents; who, when they came to raise a rebellion in earnest, found themselves strangely mistaken; for most of the cities shut their gates against them, and sent troops and money to the king. The dauphin then applied himself to the duke of Burgundy, who assured him of his friendship, and, as a mark of it, promised to send an envoy to recommend him to the clemency of the king<sup>l</sup>.

Thus abandoned, he retired with the duke of Bourbon into his domains, where they were quickly saluted with a message, requiring them to come to court, which they resolved to obey; because the count of Dunois, who deserted them early to throw himself at the king's feet, had been received into full favour. They set out with La Tremouille, Chaumont, and de Prie; but when they came within half a league of Cussel, where the king was, they received a message that those lords had no favour to expect<sup>m</sup>. The dauphin would have retired with them, but the duke of Bourbon advised and prevailed upon him to go on. Upon their arrival the king bid the dauphin retire to his apartment; the duke kneeling to kiss his hand, he said, "This is not the first time you have offended me, but take my advice, and let it be the last." The dauphin came the next day to his father, told him he had engaged his word to the three lords, and that, if he would not pardon them, he would leave the place. "With all my heart," replied Charles, "the gate is open; and, if you don't think it wide enough, I'll order twenty yards of the wall to be broke down<sup>n</sup>." However,

c the dauphin staid, and his father changed all his domestics, except his confessor and his cook. Thus ended this piece of confusion, which was stiled the Praguerie, the etymology of which word is not known; but we learn from Comines that it is the same with Briguerie. While the dauphin was employed in disturbing his father's government, the earls of Somerset and Dorset, with the famous general Talbot, besieged Harfleur, notwithstanding all the efforts the French captains made to preserve it<sup>o</sup>. In the mean time the duke of Orleans settled his ransom in England, at three hundred thousand crowns; two thirds of which sum were paid by the duke of Burgundy out of pure generosity, as the French authors affirm; our records, however, much reduce the duke of Burgundy's favour; by which an end was put to the feuds between the two families. The two princes exchanged their orders of the golden fleece and d the porcupine; and the duke of Orleans, as soon as he was released, married the daughter of the duke of Cleves, who was the duke of Burgundy's niece, with which close conjunction between the two dukes king Charles, however, was so much displeased, that he would not permit the duke of Orleans to come to court, with the nobles of Burgundy who attended him; at which he was so much offended, that he retired to his own estates<sup>p</sup>.

The king, perceiving how much his reputation was raised, by the vigour he had shewn in suppressing the malecontents, resolved to command his army in person, and to carry on the war with spirit, which was the more necessary, as the duke of York was returned into France, with the title of regent, after the death of the earl of Warwick<sup>q</sup>. His first enterprize was against Creil, upon the Oise, which he took after a siege of no long continuance; and this encouraged him to invest Pontoise, a place of great consequence to the Parisians, who there-fore applauded the king highly on this expedition: but the place was not taken with the same facility<sup>r</sup>. The duke of York and general Talbot relieved and shifted the place five several times, and many of the nobility began to quit the army, their time of service being expired<sup>s</sup>. The king, upon this, withdrew to Poffi; where hearing that the people of Paris made very free with his character, he returned suddenly before the place, and ordered a general assault to be given on the 19th of September, in which he mounted the breach in person, entered the town at the head of his troops, and carried it by storm<sup>t</sup>. This once more established his reputation, and shewed, what his grandfather was too wise a man ever to shew, that it was not for want of courage he sometimes declined action, but because

f he thought he had about him better officers than himself. The dauphin was there also, and behaved as became him, for he was now all submission; and as his great talent was dissimulation, he performed his part perfectly well, and the king, who was honest and brave, never suspected the deceit<sup>u</sup>.

The king marched the next spring into Poitou, being absolutely bent upon reducing the governors of cities and fortresses in those parts to an exact discipline, in which the duke of dukes of Orleans, Burgundy, and Bretagne.

Orleans, who had great estates thereabouts, concurred, and the king received this mark of a submission with great civility, though he knew very well the correspondence he held, and the steps he was taking<sup>w</sup>. On his arrival at Limoges, the whole scheme broke out, and he received their deputies from the princes and great lords who were disposed to think that he managed public affairs very ill, and that it was impossible he should manage them otherwise, till he did it by their advice: the dukes of Orleans, Burgundy, and Bretagne, were at the head of these complaints, and were seconded by the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, with the whole body of antient malecontents. Charles, by the mouth of the bishop of Clermont, condescended to enter into the whole detail of the grievances which they produced, and proved plainly, that many of them did not subsist, that others flowed either from themselves or their creatures, and that he was very willing to redress the rest, as soon as it was in his power<sup>x</sup>. He conducted himself, upon this occasion, with great temper and moderation, but, at the same time, with great dignity and firmness. After he had given his answer, he added, that he was much obliged to the duke of Orleans for the great concern he had for the public, and was very sensible of the hardships he must have suffered in twenty-five years captivity; and, therefore, setting all disputes aside, if he would come and share the amusements of the Witsun holidays with him at Limoges, he would have no cause to repent of his journey.

A. D. 1442.

THIS message brought the duke, whom the king received very graciously, gave him one hundred and forty thousand franks towards his ransom, and settled a handsome pension on him, out of respect to his patriotism<sup>y</sup>. Orleans immediately acquainted the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne that they were quite misinformed as to the king, who was the wisest and best prince in the world: and thus the malecontents were once more left to his mercy. The king, after dissipating this storm, prosecuted his march into Languedoc, in order to save the town of Fortas, which belonged to the lord of Albret, and which had capitulated with the general of the English army in Guienne, in case the French king did not come to its relief by a day assigned. The Sieur de Albret had served Charles with the utmost fidelity, in his lowest fortunes; the king, who was the most grateful prince of his age, was bent upon this expedition, which the malecontents had made it a point to hinder. He carried it however with a high hand, kept the day, and offered the English battle, who, being much inferior in number, declined it; but very honourably released the son of the Sieur de Albret, whom his father had given in hostage for the performance of this agreement<sup>z</sup>. The king's steadiness did him a great deal of service, and attached to him the lords in that neighbourhood extremely, the fear of which was one great motive that influenced the malecontents.

The dauphin relieves Harfleur, and then reduces the count de Armagnac, who had revolted.

THE English having turned the siege of Harfleur into a blockade, pressed it so closely, that it was in great danger of being lost. The king had sent the count of Dunois to relieve it, which he had done more than once; but the English having built a redoubt before it, the inhabitants found themselves distressed to the last degree. At length the king sent the dauphin with a strong detachment from his own army, who invested the redoubt, attacked, and carried it sword in hand, by which he gained great credit<sup>a</sup>. Charles was so far from being displeased with the rising character of his son, that he sent him into Gascony, where himself had raised a kind of civil war by an act of justice, in setting the old countess of Cominge at liberty, whom her husband had confined twenty years; and the old lady dying soon after, left her county to the king. The count of Armagnac, the count of Foix, and the husband of the deceased countess, who had determined to share it amongst them, took up arms; and the count of Armagnac carried his resentment so far as to promise his daughter to Henry the sixth of England, in order to obtain his assistance. The dauphin, charged with the management of this war, prosecuted it with so much courage and conduct, that he not only recovered the county of Cominges, and broke the confederacy, but compelled the count of Armagnac to renounce his treaty with England, and to demand the king's mercy<sup>b</sup>. This restored him intirely to his father's favour, and gained him the esteem of the nation in general.

A truce with England, and the armies in France disbanded according to the king's plan.

THE desire of peace continued still equally strong, because the necessity of it was equally felt by both parties; and, therefore, to satisfy their subjects, the two kings, Charles and Henry, consented to a kind of congress at Tours, where, after many altercations, a truce was concluded, to commence the middle of May this year, and to end on the first of April in the next<sup>c</sup>. At the same time a marriage treaty was adjusted between king Henry and the princess Margaret, daughter to Rene the titular king of Naples, duke of Lorrain and Bar. This truce, as the French historians say, was a great stroke in politics on the side of the

- a English ministers ; but in England it was considered in a very different light : and the authors of it were looked upon, and some of them at least suffered in the end, as traitors. Be this as it may, both parties then boasted of their moderation, and both were equally at a loss what to do with the troops they had on foot, that they might not be tempted to make war for themselves when no longer employed by the two crowns. Charles thought this a point of such consequence, that he consented his son should lead a numerous army for the service of the house of Austria, against the Switzers ; and the English, who apprehended the same inconvenience, took this opportunity to send a body of six or eight thousand under his command<sup>d</sup>. The king, at the head of another army, marched to besiege the city of Metz, in the quarrel of Rene of Anjou, duke of Lorraine. The dauphin made himself master of Montbeliard by composition, and beat a body of Swiss troops near Basil ; but, at the request of the council that was still sitting, he entered into a negotiation with the cantons, and concluded the first treaty that was ever made between them and the crown of France<sup>e</sup>. On the other side, the king, finding a much more obstinate resistance than he expected from the citizens of Metz, came at length to a composition, and agreed to accept of a very large sum of money for the expences of the war ; and procured, at the same time, the release of a large debt that was due from his brother-in-law the duke of Lorraine to that city. On the return of these armies into France, the king, with the assistance of the dauphin, the princes of the blood, and the great lords, carried into execution his great scheme of discipline. Having gratified the principal officers with employments and pensions, he obliged the greatest part of the private men to disband, and betake themselves either to agriculture, to the several trades to which they had been bred, or to some other honest employment. At the same time he made use of the best of troops, now divided into regular corps, and a proper fund settled to their assistance, to scour the roads, and to keep the country clear of thieves and vagabonds ; by which the public tranquillity was sooner and more effectually restored, than, after so long and bloody a war, could have been easily imagined<sup>f</sup> : for which, with good reason, a medal was struck, to perpetuate the memory of this transaction.

- It is admitted by the French historians, that, as the whole of this scheme was contrived, so the most difficult part in the execution was personally performed, by the king. After a general review, he signified to the troops that were to be disbanded, his resolution to treat as rebels such as should continue in arms, should assemble together in bands, or should, in any manner, trouble the peace of the kingdom ; which, considering the mischiefs that had followed the peace of Bretigny, and the terrors spread by the companies, seems to be a full proof, that Charles was as little wanting in conduct and firmness as in spirit and courage : but because he did things coolly, and was willing to enjoy peace when he had obtained it, men of warm spirits have taken the liberty of representing him as an indolent prince, continually immersed in pleasures. One may suspect that this condescension and moderation in respect to his neighbours, might likewise contribute to this ; for it is certain that the king, in treating with the duchess of Burgundy, in behalf of her consort, and with the new duke of Bretagne, was very far from assuming or insisting upon more than his right, but rather the contrary. This, though very possibly it might be the effects of his temper, it was very suitable to his circumstances, and to the dictates of sound policy, whatever the lovers of superiority and advocates for his regal rights might suggest<sup>g</sup>. He acted with the same temper, and just regard to the state of his own affairs, and those of his neighbours, when he declined entering into a formal war with the state of Genoa, which, after having, in express terms, demanded his protection, and received his assistance, excluded his troops, and refused to comply with their engagements ; but he kept Final, which they had put into his hands, and referred their chastisement to a more convenient time<sup>h</sup>. In the like manner he let slip the claim of the duke of Orleans to the duchy of Milan, which, by the assistance of the power of France, he might possibly have made good. But Charles, who had his own quiet and the good of his subjects in view, did not care to plunge himself into a new war on the other side of the Alps, before his people had recovered themselves from the miseries and misfortunes to which they were exposed during the weak reign of his unfortunate father. As a conclusive proof that, in all this, he acted prudently, and on right principles, let us observe, that Henry the sixth having stipulated to restore the city of Mons and its dependencies to his consort's uncle, and the French king's brother-in-law, Charles count of Maine, which, out of fear of his own subjects, he had hitherto delayed ; this monarch made no scruple of causing it to be invested by a competent body of troops, while, with a more potent

A. D. 1448. army, commanded by himself in person, he carried on the siege; and, by this stroke of vigour, recovered a place that was of more importance to him than to the prince whose title he seemed to espouse<sup>i</sup>. The place being taken by capitulation, he ordered his troops to return into their quarters, insisting that, by this, he had not at all infringed the truce. As the situation of Henry's affairs made the renewing of the war very inconvenient to him, he chose to receive in good part an apology that would have been looked upon as an insult, while the dukes, either of Bedford or of York, had been intrusted with the management of his concerns in that kingdom.

THE care that Charles had taken to improve these few years of peace, by all the methods possible, had been attended with all the success he could expect, so that the face of the country was quite changed, and all the great cities were suddenly, and, in a manner, imperceptibly, repopled. On the other hand, he had omitted nothing that might raise his reputation abroad, having, with great prudence and policy, composed that schism which had so long disturbed the church; he had likewise renewed his treaty with James the second king of Scots, on very honourable terms for that prince, notwithstanding the demise of the dauphiness his sister; and, from the same degree of foresight, had renewed his engagements with the crown of Castile; so that his concerns were in as good a condition as he could desire for renewing the war, which, however, it is probable he would have deferred for some time longer, if the unaccountable infatuation of the English had not put it out of his power. The duke of Somerset had been, by the queen's faction, sent over to replace the duke of York, whom she both hated and feared; and he, without any due consideration of the miserable situation that things were in at home by the murder of Humphrey duke of Gloucester, one of the king's uncles, and the death of the cardinal of Winchester another of them, which happened immediately after, suffered Sir Francis Surienne, knight of the garter, but an Arragonese by birth, to surprize Fougeres, a rich town on the frontiers of Bretagne, two months before the truce expired<sup>k</sup>. The duke of Bretagne complained of this to both kings, insisting on restitution from the one, and demanding assistance from the other. Charles, according to his accustomed manner, declined proceeding with vigour, and consented to conference after conference, but, in the mean time, provided silently and speedily for the war he meditated. After providing for a diversion on the side of Scotland, the assistance of a Spanish fleet, and an offensive and defensive alliance with the duke of Bretagne, he first began as his auxiliary, and, as soon as every thing was disposed for the execution of his scheme, declared in his own name, and followed that declaration by entering Normandy with four armies at once, the strongest of which he commanded in person<sup>l</sup>. The duke of Somerset and general Talbot did all that could be done in putting garrisons into the strongest places, which, however, disabled them from taking the field, and scarce left them troops sufficient for the defence of Rouen.

Charles seizes this opportunity and reduces Rouen and great part of Normandy.

THE French armies were so numerous and so well supplied, that, in a few weeks, they made many conquests; and, in the month of October, the count of Dunois appeared with his troops in order of battle before Rouen, in hopes of exciting a revolt, but without effect. Upon his retreat, however, some of the townsmen sent to let him know, that, if he would advance again into their neighbourhood, they would give his troops an opportunity to scale the town, which they performed; but, being surprized by general Talbot, when a few only had entered, he cut them, and the citizens who had joined them, to pieces, and threw their ladders over the wall<sup>m</sup>. This unsuccessful attempt, as it appeared, had an event very different from what both parties expected; for tho' hitherto the inhabitants had been divided into parties, yet the next day, from different motives, they unanimously agreed to compel their governor to surrender the town. Accordingly, having extorted his consent, they sent their deputies to treat with king Charles, who consented to all their demands, which were, an act of oblivion, the confirmation of their privileges, and leave for such as desired it to retire to England<sup>n</sup>. The duke of Somerset, however, and general Talbot, having seized the bridge, the old palace, and the castle, resolved to defend them to the last extremity. But Charles gave them no opportunity of shewing their valour, but kept them blocked up till the appearance of famine obliged them to treat. The duke demanded leave to retire, to which the king consented, provided they rendered Honfleur, Harfleur, and the rest of the places they possessed at the mouth of the Seine, to which, at length, Harfleur excepted, Somerset agreed; and, with infinite regret, was forced to give general Talbot as a hostage for the performance of articles<sup>o</sup>. The king made his entry into Rouen, with great splendor, on the 10th of November; and, though it was so late in the season, and his troops were so much fatigued,

- a he caused Honfleur to be invested, which was reduced before the end of the year, which put him in possession of all Normandy on that side the Seine <sup>p</sup>.

THE fair opportunity the French now had of completing the conquest of Normandy, <sup>Complete the conquest of that duchy in the beginning of the year ensuing;</sup> banished all distinctions of seasons, and the care of the king in providing his forces plentifully with all things necessary for their convenience and support, made this so practicable, that Honfleur was invested on the 10th of January, and the siege prosecuted with so great vigour, that, on the 18th of February, it was surrendered <sup>q</sup>. Some domestic troubles hindered the king from prosecuting the war, as he intended, without interruption, and gave time to the English general Kyreil, who landed with a body of three thousand men, to reduce Valogne; but the young count of Clermont, eldest son to the duke of Bourbon, marching against him, the two armies engaged near the village of Fourmigni, and the French, being fortunately joined by the constable with some fresh troops, and some of the officers on the other side misbehaving, Sir Thomas Kyreil, after performing all that from a brave man or a great captain could be expected, was defeated and taken prisoner, with the loss in the whole of about five thousand men <sup>r</sup>. <sup>after defeating the English forces in the battle of Fourmigni.</sup>

- THIS action, which happened on the 15th of April, was decisive as to the fate of Normandy; for at least one half of these, being drawn out of the garrisons, left them so much weaker; a circumstance of which the king did not fail to profit: for he immediately caused Caen to be invested, into which the duke of Somerset had retired with about four thousand men. The place was strong and well fortified, so that when the constable came before it on the 5th of June, it was believed it would make a long defence. Upon the king's arrival in the camp, he caused the outworks to be attacked; and, though repulsed with loss, made another attempt the next day, in which he succeeded; he then sprung a mine with such success as obliged the duke to capitulate, and the garrison marched out with all the honours of war on the first of July; but the king caused him and his garrison to be transported to England <sup>s</sup> at his own expence; and presently after ordered Falaise and Domfront to be invested. This being within land, the king left it to be taken at leisure, but directed Cherbourg to be pushed with all the vigour imaginable, so that it surrendered on the 12th of August, by which all Normandy was recovered in something more than a year <sup>t</sup>, which gave credit in those days to the prophecies of the Pucelle d'Orleans. Before the end of the year, some progress was made in the reduction of Guienne: but it is now time to speak of those intrigues that embittered all these prosperities, and filled Charles with chagrin, while his kingdom resounded with acclamations for his victories. A domestic evil, so much the more intolerable, as it appeared from the beginning irremediable.

- THE dauphin, after his famous expedition into Guienne, and reduction of the count of Armagnac, demanded the king's leave to retire into Dauphine, which, after some deliberation, was granted. Charles was somewhat doubtful of his son's disposition, though from the time of his submission he had behaved with the most exact obedience <sup>u</sup>. The king, that his retreat from court might wear the better appearance, left some disputes that he had with the duke of Savoy to the dauphin's determination, who performed therein all that the king could possibly expect; and sent the treaty he had negotiated to him, for his approbation <sup>v</sup>: but this was all artifice; for the dauphin still continued to hate his father, and every body about him, in proportion as they stood in his favour. At the head of these was Pierre de Brese, seneschal of Poitou, a man of high quality and great merit. Him he charged with crimes of all sorts, against the crown, the public welfare, and the king's person, demanding that he should be divested of power, and left to a fair trial. The king immediately complied, removed him from his seat in council, from all his employments, and from his presence; and then ordered his process to be formed. From having the fairest, he had the foulest character in France; all the world abandoned him, and many became his accusers; they had every advantage given them; but, upon a full trial, there could be nothing proved: the king gave him immediately the government of Rouen, and restored him, if possible, to more credit than he had before, which of consequence recalled his friends <sup>x</sup>. The dauphin's resentment, however, was more fatal to the king's mistress, Agnes de Sorel, by some called The lovely Agnes, and the Demoiselle de Beauté, from the castle of Beauté, which the king had given her. She had followed the king into the neighbourhood of Rouen, to acquaint him with a discovery she had made of a design against his person, which the king at first judged to be ridiculous, but found afterwards was not entirely groundless; but she did not survive this journey, being A. D. 1450. seized with a distemper which hurried her to her grave in a few days<sup>y</sup> (A). Such as are for attributing all the successes of this reign to fortune, tell us, that Charles was in nothing more happy than in the choice of his mistress, who frequently admonished him, that his duty as a king was inconsistent with his assiduity as a lover; and affirmed that it was to her persuasion France owed some of the greatest actions of his reign, which the historians, in succeeding times, were not inclined should be attributed to the king, though he performed them.

The count de Dunois, now count de Longueville, reduced all that country, which had been so long in the hands of the English, and which in the space of one campaign. THE count de Dunois, whom the king for his past services had created count de Longueville, rendered him such as were still more important in Guienne, where he prosecuted the war with such vigour and success, that, in the short interval between May and August, he reduced all that country, which had been so long in the hands of the English, and which was remarkably well affected to them<sup>z</sup>. It is true that Bordeaux submitted on a capitulation, under which all the adjacent district was comprehended, by which the king precluded himself from ever imposing on the inhabitants any greater taxes than those to which they were subject at this time, and promised to establish a parliament or sovereign court of judicature at Bordeaux, where all things relative to that province were to be finally determined<sup>a</sup>. Bayonne was the only place that defended itself after the submission of Bordeaux; but the place being invested, and something appearing in the heavens which the inhabitants thought a white cross, which was then the cognizance of France, in opposition to the red cross of St. George, they took occasion from thence to capitulate on the best terms they could obtain. The count of Longueville, having reduced all Guienne, with the title of the king's lieutenant general, left, by the king's orders, the command to the count de Clermont, whom he established his governor in those parts<sup>b</sup>.

Charles makes a sudden peace with the duke of Savoy, in THE dauphin, who governed his own country as a sovereign, and who governed it wisely and well, held an intercourse with, and made himself respected by, all the princes in Europe, maintaining a proper behaviour towards every one, except his father. He did not,

(A) It is very certain that one of the great causes of the misunderstanding between the king and his son the dauphin, was the aversion of the latter to Agnes Sorel, to whom it is said he once gave a blow on the cheek, which might probably draw upon him great suspicions when that lady came to die, as it was commonly conceived by poison (1). By her will James Cœur, the king's goldsmith; that is, in the language of those times, the person intrusted with the management of his finances, was named one of her executors; and yet he was accused of being the instrument of her death, and this proved three years afterwards one of the principal causes of his disgrace, though, upon a strict examination, he was acquitted of that charge, and Jane de Vendome, stiled commonly the Demoiselle de Montagne, who appeared to be the author of it, was declared guilty of calumny, forbid the court, and sent into exile (2). But notwithstanding this piece of justice, he likewise suffered, notwithstanding all the great services he had performed, which obliges us to say something more particularly of the man. James Cœur was the son of a merchant of Bourges, came early to court, and being intrusted in money affairs, acquitted himself with great honour and reputation. It is very difficult to know which he did best, the king's business, or his own; for he was the richest subject of that age in Europe. The chymists have from thence taken occasion to put him into the list of their adepts (3); but his philosopher's stone was commerce, which he carried on to all parts of the then known world; and is allowed to have had in this respect a more extensive correspondence than all the rest of the merchants in the kingdom taken together. It is true, that, for the support of it, he made use both of the king's money and credit; but, on the other hand, whenever it was necessary, the king had likewise the use of his; and it was owing to his prudence and integrity that the king really had both money and credit (4). It was this James Cœur who put his affairs in order, enabled him to carry into action his project for disciplining the army; he devised the method of maintaining the new militia, and managed the public treasure so carefully, that in the midst of his misfortunes his master neither oppressed either clergy or laity by new or extraordinary imposition. On the contrary, when the service required it, he was always ready to furnish money out of his private fortune, which if he had not done, the conquest of Normandy could not have been effected. He was also intrusted with some important negotiations in Italy, which were likewise expensive; and yet all these great things could not preserve him; for being accused of a variety of crimes, rather through envy of his power and wealth than from any real cause (5), he was sentenced to pay a fine of four hundred thousand crowns, to forfeit his estate, and suffer perpetual banishment; but, upon a revision not long after, the parliament declared him innocent, and restored him to his honours and estate. At the time his misfortunes fell upon him, his factors in foreign countries lent him sixty thousand crowns, with which he retired into Cyprus, married a second wife, by whom he had children, for whom he procured various solid establishments, and became through his industry and integrity, more opulent than ever (6). He was indeed, in all respects, one of the most ablest and most extraordinary men of his time; and his ill usage is, by all historians, represented as the greatest blemish of this reign. The Sieur Dammartin was the great author of this violence, and felt the weight of a like persecution in the next reign.

- a however, treat him with any exterior marks of disrespect; those were only bestowed upon his ministers; but he negotiated on every side, and took his measures as if he had not been either the son or the subject of Charles, which, though the king dissimbled, he could not easily digest. At length Lewis carried this so far as to conclude a treaty of marriage between himself and the princess Charlotte, daughter to the duke of Savoy, not only without the king's consent, but in direct breach of his command; upon which Charles came to Bourges, and, without mentioning any particular cause, declared war against the duke; but, before any hostilities were committed, the cardinal d'Estouteville came to the king from the duke, and so pacified him, that a peace was concluded at Feurs in Forez, one article of which was, that the duke's son should marry the princess Joland, or Violante, the king's daughter<sup>c</sup>. This sudden turn was not the effect of weakness or mutability in the king, but of an event which he could not either foresee or avoid. His desire to ease his new subjects in Guienne induced him to leave as few troops there as possible; this tempted the people, who were still English in their hearts, to invite their former masters to return. Charles, that he might obtain Cherbourg the sooner, had been content to make that place the price of general Talbot's liberty, who, from a hostage, became a prisoner of war, on the governor of Honfleur's refusing to surrender that place in obedience to the duke of Somerset's orders. This general, thus at liberty, landed with five thousand English troops, was admitted by the inhabitants into Bourdeaux, surprized the French garrison, and, being supported by a fleet and army from England, quickly over-run a great part of the province. It was this reverse of affairs that engaged the king to act as he did, that he might be at liberty to stifle effectually that flame which had been once put out already; and which, if at all neglected, might quickly grow too strong for the forces he had on foot<sup>d</sup>.

- THE king began the campaign in Guienne early the next year; and, in the first place that was taken, caused about fourscore persons to be beheaded as traitors. On the 17th of July, general Talbot, contrary to his own sentiments, and purely to gratify the people of Bourdeaux, attacked the French army before Castillon, in their intrenchments: though at first he was successful, yet his horse being killed by a canon shot, and himself immediately after by a wound in the throat, his forces were beaten; and, though the loss was not very great in the action, yet, in its consequences, it proved the loss of Guienne. Castillon immediately surrendered at discretion, and many other places followed this example. The king proceeded very cautiously with respect to Bourdeaux, in which there was a garrison of four thousand English, and as many Gascons. He formed the blockade by land and sea, as fast as possible; but he proceeded very slowly to the siege, and kept the same measure during the time it continued. Had he persisted in this method, the place must soon have surrendered at discretion; but diseases beginning to spread in his army, he consented to a capitulation, which was signed on the 17th of October, by which the inhabitants obtained an amnesty for themselves, twenty only excepted, who were to be banished, but at the expence of all their privileges; and the English were permitted to retire<sup>e</sup>. This year the king renewed, with great solemnity, his treaty with the Swiss cantons. The next he did the same, with respect to his alliance with the king of Castile. The baron Lesparre, a nobleman of Gascony, who had been pardoned for the last revolt, engaging in new intrigues, lost his head. The count de Charolois, eldest son to the duke of Burgundy, espoused, with the king's consent, Isabell, daughter to the duke of Bourbon. The count d'Eu made an attempt upon the small remains of the English territory in France, and proceeding with that temerity which success commonly inspires, received so severe a check, that he lost all inclination to attempt any thing farther. It was the disorder at home which was the bane of the English abroad, and not any misbehaviour in their troops<sup>f</sup>.

- ALL this time the dauphin was, in appearance, a quiet spectator of his father's good fortune, who, with all his wisdom, knew not how to act with his son. At certain times, when his orders quadrated with his own views, the dauphin was exactly obedient; but when he received commands of another kind, he understood these to proceed from the ministers, and paid no regard to them at all. He interfered in the wars of Italy, to the prejudice of his father-in-law, the duke of Savoy; and, upon his presuming to dislike this, he declared war against him, and resolved to make himself master of the marquissate of Saluces; but the duke of Burgundy and the Swiss cantons interposing, he found it expedient to make peace<sup>g</sup>. The king, who had an eye upon all his actions, who had now borne with him ten years, and often summoned him to court, at length determined to make him sensible of his duty; and, under colour of a tour into Auvergne, disposed every thing for seizing him in Dauphine: Anthony de Chabannes, lord of Dammartin, being charged with the command of the troops that were to be employed in this enterprise, no sooner began to move, than the dauphin applied himself to the duke of Savoy, to demand assistance both in money and forces. To prevent this, Chabannes received the king's orders to go himself to the duke's court, which he did; and received the strongest assurances from that prince, that the dauphin should receive no support from him<sup>a</sup>. This answer was no sooner given, than it was communicated to the dauphin by his spies. Lewis upon this, taking with him the Sieur de Montauban, and John de Lescun, commonly called the bastard of Armagnac, traversed the county of Burgundy, and retired into Brabant<sup>1</sup>. As soon as the duke of Burgundy received advice of this, he ordered the count de Charolois to wait upon the dauphin, and to pay him all possible respect; but he refused to see him himself till he knew how this measure would be relished by the king, to whom he transmitted an account of it directly, desiring to know how he was to act<sup>k</sup>. Charles returned him for answer, that he should treat the dauphin in the manner he would expect to be treated himself, in case any unforeseen accident obliged him to retire into France<sup>l</sup>. Upon this, the duke shewed all possible respect to this illustrious exile; and the dauphin thereupon demanded troops only to compel his father, as he phrased it, to change his ministers. Sir, answered the duke, against any other person, my forces and my finances are at your devotion; but it is not either you or I who have a right to prescribe to the king; and indeed I do not see a wiser measure for us both to take in the management of our affairs, than to refer them to the good pleasure of a prince, alike remarkable for his prudence and his moderation<sup>m</sup>. The dauphin, finding he could do no better, made choice of Genep, on the frontiers of Hainault, for the place of his residence, and accepted of a pension of three thousand florins a month for his subsistence, which, as some writers inform us, was afterwards advanced to double that sum<sup>n</sup>.

A conspiracy by the duke of Alençon to bring the English over a gain into Normandy.

THE duke of Burgundy, who was a very wise prince, easily foresaw, that, sooner or later, this affair must occasion a misunderstanding between him and the crown of France, either in the person of Charles or of Lewis; he sent, therefore, two of his chamberlains, John de Croi, and Simon de Lalain, to endeavour to reconcile the dauphin to his father; and to propose, that, till this could be effected, the dauphin might be permitted to put himself at the head of an army, and to act against the Turks, who were growing every day more and more formidable to the Christian powers. The king testified his satisfaction as to the duke's conduct in the whole affair; but did not at all approve the expedient of putting his son at the head of an army, alleging, it would be more agreeable to his interest, as well as his duty, to return into France, and occupy that place in his father's councils, to which nature, both by his birth and his capacity, had given him so fair a title<sup>o</sup>. Upon the receipt of this answer, the dauphin sent for his consort, whom he had never yet seen; and the duke of Burgundy caused her to be conducted into the Low Countries, with all the respect and magnificence due to her own rank, and that of the prince she had espoused; in the mean time the king met with a new mortification, through the discovery of the treason of the duke of Alençon. This prince, at a time when he was distressed for money, had sold the town of Fougeres to the duke of Bretagne, at a low price. His affairs being now in better order, he was desirous of having it again, upon repayment of the same money, which the duke of Bretagne having refused to accept, he applied himself for redress to the king, who, on one side, having no reason to be satisfied with the duke's conduct, who had been embarked in every disturbance during his reign, and, on the other, having great reason to manage the duke of Bretagne, took little notice of this application<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Alençon, provoked at this, applied himself to the king of England, laid open to him the state of affairs in France, made a treaty for the marriage of his daughter with the son of the duke of York, and concerted measures for putting the English once more in possession of Normandy. When this scheme was ripe for execution, he chose a mean person to go over with letters to king Henry, which he put up in a hollow staff, who carried them directly to king Charles. When this monarch was thus unexpectedly apprized of the duke's treachery, he could not help exclaiming, in whom can I now put any trust, when the very princes of my own blood conspire against me. He immediately dispatched his old faithful servant, the count de Longueville, in order to arrest the duke of Alençon, whom he resolved to bring, by an open and public trial, to justice<sup>q</sup>.

The duke of Alençon convicted but not executed.

AFTER he had been detained a long time in prison, and the king had caused a strict enquiry to be made into the privileges and prerogative of the peers of France, and the duke of Burgundy, as the first peer, to be summoned, he held a parliament at Vendosme, where the duke of Alençon had all the advantages allowed him that the formalities of law could give; but the messenger intrusted with his letters, the letters themselves, and the duke's own

a confession, leaving no room to doubt of his guilt, he was convicted, and condemned to suffer death'. The duke of Burgundy, though he refused to assist at his trial, sent ambassadors to intercede for him, which was the more extraordinary, as it was strongly suspected himself and the dauphin were far from being ignorant of his intrigues; but the king thought proper to declare these suspicions groundless, though he did not give any direct answer to the duke's application for mercy'. He shewed more respect to that of the constable Arthur, duke of Bretagne, who had just acquired that dignity by the death of his nephew; and, at his request, converted the sentence into perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Loches'; from whence, as we shall see, he was delivered in the succeeding reign, and put once more in a condition of plotting, which he could not forbear. In order to find some employment for the English at home, and to prevent their disturbing his dominions, the king sent Peter de Breze, seneschal of Normandy, to insult their coasts, and to make a descent, which he did, and burnt and plundered the town of Sandwich, in which, as the French historians own, the king acted in concert with queen Margaret of England<sup>u</sup>, who had but too much power over her husband, and became thereby the source of his misfortunes and those of his subjects. At the same time, the king renewed his treaties with Denmark and Spain, that, in case of a revolution in England, which might be accompanied with a revival of the war, he might not be without allies; and he took the same precaution with respect to the emperor and several princes of Germany, that the duke of Burgundy might see he would not be found unprepared; if, at the persuasion of his son, he should undertake any thing to his prejudice, of which, though he thought fit to dissemble them, there wanted not some very strong appearances<sup>w</sup>. Towards the close of this year died Arthur duke of Bretagne, who, notwithstanding his accession to that sovereignty, still retained the post of constable of France, because he would honour in his old age (this was the reason he thought fit to give) that dignity, from which he had received honour in his youth. Some say he had a mind to take advantage of the troubles of England, to have made an invasion on his own behalf, and at his own expence, in the prosecution of which he thought this dignity might be of use. However this might be, he retained to the last the king's favour, who gave great testimonies of regret for his loss<sup>x</sup>.

THE prosperous situation of the king's affairs induced the Genoese, or at least one of the factions in Genoa, to propose putting the republic again under the protection of that crown, which the king received with a good grace; and sent John duke of Calabria, the eldest son of René, king of Naples, to govern that city in his name. This opened a path to very extraordinary events, which belong to the history of that republic; but the king, though attentive to affairs abroad, was still more so of what respected his own territories; and, therefore, he resolved to bring Dauphine into the same situation it was in before he had put it into the hands of his son, who still affected to govern it by some of his officers in the same manner as when he resided there, and was actually present. We find his and his father's conduct so differently treated by different historians, that it is difficult to understand, and consequently to reconcile them. Some say, that the dauphin had governed there so wisely, as to make himself esteemed as much as most sovereigns; so that he was highly admired by his subjects: others, that he ruined and oppressed them; so that they complained of him in the strongest terms to his father. The former allege, that the king met with great opposition from the states, who remonstrated the oath they had taken to his son, and seemed unwilling to put themselves again under the rule of the father; in all which, there is a mixture of truth and of falshood. The dauphin certainly did not want abilities for government, nor did he fail to give proofs of them in Dauphine, where, during the whole time of his residence, he affected in all things a perfect independence, coined money, made laws, created a parliament, and acted in every other respect as a sovereign prince, which, for a time, flattered the natives exceedingly. But then, to support all this, he levied great sums, was perpetually soliciting free gifts, and took many other methods of filling his coffers, with which they were, and had reason to be, exceedingly displeased, more especially during the latter part of his government, when his pension being stopt, he had no way to support the dignity of a prince, but with the revenues of that county. The king, in resuming the government, suppressed these imposts, which was very pleasing; but he suppressed likewise many of those marks of independency, which his son had established, and this was disliked'. Charles, however, did not regard either their clamours, or the complaints of Lewis; he reduced things into their old form; and, if he mortified the people's vanity, he made their circumstances easy.

From hence we may easily discern how historians might represent the same facts differently, according to their respective systems.

The king exceedingly grieved by the dauphin's conduct, and very desirous to reclaim him.

THE duke of Burgundy growing daily more and more apprehensive of Charles's resentment, and perceiving how much he was courted by all the neighbouring princes, who were proud of entering into his alliance, sent fresh envoys to the court of France, with a long memorial of his griefs; the king answered this memorial, article by article, with great strength of reason, and at the same time with great dignity; and whereas the duke had suggested a secret article in the marriage treaty between Henry the sixth and Margaret of Anjou, to his prejudice, the king affirmed it was a mere fiction, adding, that when such things came into the duke's mind, he had better acquaint him with them, who would always avow the truth, than plead them as excuses. In speaking of the dauphin, the king observed that he could not do too much honour to the son of his sovereign, and that he would always consider the respect paid to his person as paid to himself, while he took no part in the quarrel<sup>a</sup>. The dauphiness being delivered of a son, Lewis sent one of his household to acquaint the king with it, who immediately caused public rejoicings to be made, and wrote him a letter of felicitation with his own hand<sup>a</sup>. Upon another occasion, the dauphin having complained that some who were about his father did not pay a proper regard to his requests, the king acquainted him that he had no need to apply to any, since he was himself always ready to receive, and willing to grant them, with which, notwithstanding the stubbornness of his temper, the dauphin was so much affected, that he wrote him a very humble letter of thanks<sup>b</sup>. Some writers suggest, that the king had thoughts of disinheriting him, but without foundation; for the quarrel was entirely on the dauphin's side, who, being upwards of thirty, was impatient to govern, and could not bear living in his father's court as a subject; whereas Charles was very desirous to have him at court, pressed him continually to return, and hinted that he had many things to communicate, which could not be committed to paper. These circumstances are directly opposite to the supposed intention of defeating his succession; but the whole of their dispute lay in this, that the father would be a king while he lived, and the son, with all possible professions of duty in words, could not bring himself to confirm those professions by his actions<sup>c</sup>.

A.D. 1460.

But finds that impracticable, and dies thro' want of sustenance, for fear of being poisoned.

IN the mean time the disagreement between the king and the duke of Burgundy was growing still wider, and had probably ended in a rupture, but that both of them were princes of great prudence, and who had sincerely at heart the good of their subjects; besides, the duke was not more fortunate in a son than the king; the count de Charolois was of a most violent and turbulent temper, and the duke did not manage him at all, but made him sensible upon every occasion of the weight of his authority. He was also angry with his father's ministers, and particularly with the house of Croy. As therefore the king was unwilling to proceed to extremities, for fear the dauphin should retire into England; so the duke's forbearance proceeded from an apprehension that the count de Charolois might demand the king's protection<sup>d</sup>. Some overtures of this kind were indeed made; for Charles having an inclination to support his old competitor, Henry the sixth, in the day of his distress, the count de Charolois made an offer to command his forces, which at first the king was willing to accept; but, having an intimation that the count de Charolois meditated some other design, and was inclined to commit some act of violence on his father's ministers, he wrote to him in his last sickness, a letter, in which was this remarkable sentence: "For two such kingdoms as my own, I would not have the least participation in an unworthy action<sup>e</sup>." His last sickness was of a very strange kind; one of his old servants intimated to him, that he would do well to be cautious, since he suspected that there was a design to poison him, which affected the king to such a degree, that he absolutely refused all sustenance for several days; and being at length persuaded to eat, it proved too late, for his bowels being collapsed, nothing would pass: in this condition he died, at Melun in Berry, on the 22d of July, in the sixtieth year of his age, and in the thirty-ninth of his reign<sup>f</sup>. He was surnamed the Victorious, or, as others say, the Well-served, from which last appellation, in all probability, modern historians have derived their opinion, that the great successes of his reign were wholly owing to his ministers and his generals; whereas contemporary writers, and even those who flourished in his son's days, ascribe these great actions to the king himself, and particularly remark, that the high prosperity of his arms commenced at a time when he took the resolution of commanding in person. It has been even matter of doubt, whether his indolence and little regard to business in the beginning of his reign, was not the effects of a refined policy, which induced him to affect a character, that, though seemingly unworthy of a king, was, notwithstanding, very suitable to his circumstances; since, in the middle and latter part of his life, those who

a lived in his court, and had a share in the management of affairs, assure us, that he was a prince of assiduous or perpetual application, perfectly acquainted with every branch of the administration, and remarkably tender of the persons and properties of his subjects (B).

THE news of his father's death was immediately sent to the new king by his uncle Charles of Anjou; and, though dissimulation was his principal character, it is said he concealed his joy but very indifferently<sup>3</sup>. His first concern was as to his possession; his next as to his

(B) There are so many particularities of weight, which respect the person of this prince, that we cannot avoid extending this note somewhat farther than usual, or we intended. Charles became dauphin and heir apparent of the crown in the fourteenth year of his age; and, from the misfortunes of those times, had but an indifferent education; he incurred the displeasure of his mother early, and was entirely in the hands of her enemies, and the partizans of the house of Orleans, who were most of them men of capacity, and some, particularly the president Louvet and Tanneui du Chastel, persons of great merit and probity (1). The death of John, duke of Burgundy, was considered by them as an act of justice, and not as a murder, at which, though Charles was present, it may be reasonably doubted whether he was in the secret. It must be allowed that he was conducted absolutely by the great persons about him: and, if his situation be considered, we need not wonder that he was very docile, or that they were very indulgent, because this was the interest of both. He had from nature, and, if we recollect the characters of his parents, it will not seem strange, a bias to pleasure; and it had been impossible to manage his affairs, if he had been either of a restless or obstinate temper (2). His concerns were in so low a situation at his first accession to the throne, that he had not money to pay for a new pair of boots, and he was so little feared, that the tradesman who brought them, being told so, carried them away (3). He had good officers; he had many of the nobility who adhered to him; but most of them had their particular views, in which, if he had crossed them, they had been lost. It is no wonder, therefore, that he bore many things which no other king would have done. At his coronation there was not one lay peer; but, for the sake of preserving state, he nominated six lords, who represented them. Through the whole course of his reign, every incident, every conjuncture, was turned to his advantage; at first by his ministers; in process of time, and by the lessons they taught him, by himself (4). For this reason he drew as much profit from his adversity as from his prosperity. Under the former he laid aside his great courts because they were too expensive; he prohibited the currency of any money in his dominions but his own; in a word, he availed himself of necessity, while his territory was very small, to bring in those alterations which he thought for the advantage of the crown, and he made use of his power, in proportion as it became more extended, to establish these new usages through the whole kingdom (5). The coin was never so much debased as in his time; and yet under him it was no great evil; for, by raising the nominal value beyond any thing that had been attempted, he drew money into the countries that owned his authority, which, but for that expedient, had never been seen; and, when this was no longer necessary, he very wisely laid it aside (6). The length of the war gave him a fair opportunity to interdict private quarrels; that is, deciding them by the sword. When they afterwards attempted to turn this upon him, by alleging, that the war had so reduced them, that they were in no condition to raise troops for his service; he took them at their words, and not only dispensed with their raising troops, as the constitution required, for the present, but for the future; so that, without his permission, they could never raise troops at all. Instead of these troops he brought in regular forces, for the payment of which he introduced the taille; and, by promising to put his coin on a right foot, and keep it so, he levied this with the good will of his subjects, but without the consent of his states (7). It was the gentle use of his prerogative that established it; he made likewise some necessary alterations in the manner of administering justice; but he did every thing with such an apparent view to the public good, and was so very tender of the lives and properties of his people, that though he altered or acted against all law, he was never considered as a tyrant. The clergy were more attached to him than to the pope; for he took nothing of them himself, and defended them from being stripped by the pontif (8). He was, in general, very grateful; and, though the case of James Cœur is said to be an exception to this, yet, upon reading the record of his conviction, as we may call it, the reader may probably hold the king excused; since, whether he was guilty or not, the appearances against him were strong, and the clamour of the people great; one of the charges against him being this, that, to extend his own commerce, he had scarce left another merchant in the kingdom, and had acquired most of his wealth by applying the public cash and credit to his own profit (9). Excellently served by the men, Charles was yet more fortunate in the other sex. His consort, Mary of Anjou, loved him tenderly; and, as a proof of it, gave him little trouble in his amours, and great assistance in his business; in which the king always consulted her. Yet her mildness and modesty were so conspicuous, that it appeared she rather courted his favour than acted from any motives of ambition (10). By her he had Lewis his successor; Charles duke of Berry; Violante, the wife of Amadeus, duke of Savoy; Katherine who espoused Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy; Joan, who married John duke of Bourbon; and Magdalen, who espoused Gascon count of Foix (11). By Agnes de Sorel he had three daughters, Charlotte, who married James de Breze, count of Maulevrier, poisoned by her husband, who caught her in the act of adultery; Margaret, espoused to Oliver de Coëtivi; and Jane, married to Anthony de Bueil, count of Sancerre (12). The remains of this monarch were deposited in the royal abbey of St. Denis; but in a manner which seemed to demonstrate that the same good fortune that attended him through his life, was attached even to his breathless corpse; for the butterflies of the court, crowding all together for Flanders, in order to enjoy the sunshine of the royal presence, Tanneui du Chastel, the first favourite Charles had, took care of the funeral solemnity, which he performed very nobly at his own expence; and then retired to the court of Bretagne, being born a subject to that duke (13). On the monument of this king, there is a short inscription to this effect: Here lies the thrice famous monarch Charles the Seventh, the Victorious and the Well-served (14).

coronation. He had surmised, in his own mind, that there might be an opposition to both ;
to prevent which, he desired the company of the duke of Burgundy, and the count of Charo- lois, who at his request attended him to Rheims, where he was crowned on the 15th of August ; and, in the midst of the ceremony, he drew his sword, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by the duke of Burgundy, at his request <sup>a</sup>. The duke then did homage, not only in the amplest, but even in an unusual form, which had in it more of friendship than policy. Some days after, they made their public entry into Paris, escorted by a great body of horse, though there did not appear the slightest foundation for the suspicions the king had that an opposition would be formed to his succession <sup>i</sup>. He received very graciously the good advice given him by the duke of Burgundy, and his interposition in favour of his father's ministers, but without suffering it to make the least impression ; for he immediately turned out the chancellor William Juvenal des Ursins, the admiral, one of the marshals of France, and a great part of the parliament <sup>b</sup>. He discharged the duke of Alençon from the castle of Loches, and pardoned him, not from clemency, but because he conspired against his father <sup>1</sup>. As a mark of his gratitude and affection for the count of Charolois, he declared him his lieutenant general in Normandy, with a pension of twelve thousand crowns a year ; but at the same time, he ratified the treaty which his father had made with the people of Liege, though he knew it was made in resentment of the protection afforded to himself by the duke of Burgundy, and had promised in the most solemn manner, that he would declare that alliance void, and even join with the duke against them <sup>m</sup>. At Tours he received the homage of Francis the second, duke of Bretagne ; but not satisfied with that, he made a journey into the duchy, under colour of a pilgrimage, that he might better judge of its strength and condition ; and, as some say, with an intent to steal the princess of Bretagne for the duke of Savoy, in which he was disappointed by a sudden frost, and thought proper thereupon to release her <sup>n</sup>. But while he was thus employed, an insurrection happened at Rheims, where the people would not submit to the taxes, which was quickly reduced, and near fourscore citizens punished with death, in hopes of strengthening his authority. He had already framed in his mind the project of restoring his kinsman John, duke of Calabria, to the kingdom of Naples, and, to gain the assistance of pope Pius the second, which was absolutely necessary, he cancelled the famous pragmatic sanction made by his father, the rather, because it was made by him. This was vehemently opposed in parliament by his attorney general, and that assembly absolutely refused their consent ; upon which he turned out his attorney with disgrace, and sent the original instrument to Rome, where it was dragged through the streets to gratify the populace. But underhand he gave his attorney a sum of money, which was of greater value than his office, and allowed the parliament to maintain in execution, as a fundamental law, the very pragmatic sanction he had abolished <sup>o</sup>.
His other project was to humble the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, though the former had defended him in his distress, and the predecessor of the latter had fixed his father on the throne. Such were the first exploits of this famous politician ! Such the dictates of that genius, which has been considered as worthy of dictating to kings !

A. D. 1461.

His ascendancy over other powers, not owing to his policy but his good fortune.

THE affairs of England were at this time in the most distressed condition for themselves, and consequently in the most advantageous condition for France. Margaret, the consort of Henry the sixth, had obtained from him a small body of troops, under the command of the famous Peter de Breze, not so much with a view to serve her, as to be rid of him for the present, and to have a fair chance of being rid of him for ever. He was defeated, lost his forces, and with some difficulty saved himself ; the queen retired again to her father
Rene, duke of Lorraine, and the king once more lent her twenty thousand livres, by way of mortgage upon Calais, for which he was to pay forty thousand crowns more when she should be able to put it into his hands <sup>p</sup>. About the same time he undertook to assist John, king of Arragon, against his subjects, who had taken arms to revenge the death of his son, the prince of Viana, poisoned by his mother-in-law, in favour of her son Ferdinand, surnamed afterwards the Catholic, as we have shewn at large in its proper place. The French succours, commanded by James de Armagnac, duke of Nemours, saved both the mother and the son ;
and Lewis likewise lent the monarch of Arragon three hundred thousand crowns, but took care to have the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne yielded to him, subject however to a clause of redemption <sup>q</sup>. The general situation of things was very favourable for him, and it was this that enabled him to give law to his neighbours, whose countries were in a distracted and distressed condition,

a condition, into which, through the arts of his refined policy, Lewis in a short time reduced his own; whereas government like his father's had filled it with wealth and people.

THE king of Castile having also some disputes with the monarch of Arragon, Lewis under-<sup>Rebels the</sup> took to mediate between them, in consequence of which he was first present at the confer-<sup>ences upon the</sup> ences held at Baronne, and afterwards had an interview with the Castilian monarch, on the<sup>after Somme,</sup> banks of the river Bidassea, which some have thought gave birth to the implacable hatred<sup>from the duke</sup> between the two nations; for the Spanish king and his courtiers being most magnificently dressed, and, on the contrary, Lewis in so mean a garb, that he could not well be worse, in which he was imitated by those who attended him, the former treated the latter with scorn, while the latter looked upon them with contempt. The decree made by Lewis offended the b Castilians highly, and yet gave the court of Arragon no content; but Lewis gave himself little trouble about either, having corrupted the ministers of both<sup>1</sup>. This was his general expedient, from whence we may see the true reason why he acted, generally speaking, according to his own notions; for knowing by experience that many had betrayed their trusts to him, he judged the only way to secure his own secrets was, to trust them to none. He was very desirous of recovering the towns upon the Somme out of the hands of the duke of Burgundy, to which he had a right, even by the treaty of Arras, on the payment of four hundred thousand crowns; and in this he succeeded, by the assistance of John de Croy, and other gentlemen of that family; who having the ear of the duke, and being extremely hated by the count de Charolois, fore-saw they might one day stand in need of the king's

c protection<sup>2</sup>. Lewis had an interview with the duke upon this occasion at Hedin, in which, according to custom, he deceived him; for finding that he could not have the towns, unless he engaged to continue the governors the duke had appointed, he acquiesced; but turned them out as soon as he came into possession. But, to qualify this, he put in others that were as agreeable to the duke, by which he kept things quiet<sup>3</sup>. All this time he was treating with Francis duke of Bretagne, whom he hated for his power, and for whose parts he had a great contempt; but that prince, though no profound politician himself, had very able ministers, and the king, when he least suspected it, found, that a weak man, well advised, might be too many for a prince of parts<sup>4</sup>. The duke of Savoy, being expelled his domi-<sup>A. D. 1463.</sup> nions by the intrigues of his younger son Philip, had recourse to Lewis for protection, who

d received him very graciously, and then sent for his son, that he might reconcile them. Prince Philip demanded a safe conduct, which was sent him; notwithstanding which Lewis shut him up in the castle of Loches, and sent his father home to govern his dominions in quiet<sup>5</sup>. A stroke of justice, upon which he valued himself exceedingly.

THE facility with which he had hitherto executed his designs, and the persuasion he had<sup>Attempts to</sup> of the superiority of his own talents, induced the king to form new projects of still a bolder<sup>seize the per-</sup> nature. He had caused the restitution of the three towns granted to Philip the Hardy, in<sup>sons of the</sup> favour of his marriage with Margaret of Flanders, to be mentioned to the duke of Burgundy,<sup>duke and the</sup> who rejected it with great heat; at which the king pretended much concern, and seemed<sup>count de Cha-</sup> desirous of discussing this and some others points in a new conference at Hedin. But the real<sup>rolois, but</sup> design of this interview was of a very different nature<sup>6</sup>. He understood that the count de Charolois was at the Hague, from whence he was to make a tour to the sea-coast: upon which he ordered the bastard de Rubempré, a debauched determined bravo, to embark on board one of his frigates, and sail with forty or fifty desperate men like himself; to land with as many of these as he thought proper, and to secure his person, of which, as soon as he had received advice, his next design was to post to Hedin, with a body of troops, in order to make sure of the duke of Burgundy's person<sup>7</sup>. This plan miscarried through the imprudence of Rubempré; who, being seen and known in a public house, was arrested on his general character: upon which, the vessel he commanded sailing abruptly, gave a strong suspicion of his errand; with which the count de Charolois having acquainted his father, he

f retired precipitately from Hedin, which threw great odium upon the king<sup>8</sup>. Lewis, exceedingly vexed at this, and still more at his disappointment, sent a solemn embassy to the duke, to demand that Rubempré should be set at liberty: that satisfaction should be given him, for the insolent reflections made upon his conduct in the Low Countries; and that Olivier de la Marche, and a preacher, who had been the chief reporters of these things, should be delivered up<sup>9</sup>. The duke justified his son's conduct, and would comply with none of them<sup>10</sup>.

The count de Charolois answered with great warmth the reflections made upon his conduct, and bid the archbishop of Narbonne, one of the ambassadors, tell the king, that indeed his chancellor had rattled him soundly, but that he would give him good cause to repent it before the year came about; which was certainly a much stronger mark of his vivacity than of his prudence<sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1464.
The manner in which the confederacy for the public good was conducted.

THE king, having heard the archbishop's report, very easily apprehended that some mischief was brewing, but, with all his spies and all his suspicions, he was not able to find out where<sup>d</sup>. The duke of Bretagne had entered early into close connections with the count of Charolois, and had also negotiated with Edward the fourth of England, which the king knew; and it was this that so much raised his resentments against them both. But they, knowing well enough that they could not assemble forces sufficient to look the king in the face, began to cabal with the nobility, to aggravate the losses they had sustained, to alarm their fears, and to make them conceive Bretagne and Burgundy were the bulwarks of the French noblesse, which, once subverted, all the lords in the kingdom must lie at the king's mercy, which, by the way, they had good reason to believe they should not experience in any great degree<sup>e</sup>. The great men who had been turned out upon his accession, felt the smart of that wound, the faithful servants of his father saw themselves distinguished only by marks of displeasure, and his chief ministers were not only new men, but men of low birth and bad characters. Cardinal Balue, his prime minister, resembled his master; he relied upon his own arts, which he practised so much and so often that nobody relied upon him<sup>f</sup>. There were malecontents enough of all ranks; the duke of Bretagne, or rather the duke's ministers, knew how to unite them; and his emissaries, in the habits of monks of different orders, met, conferred with, and engaged them in a confederacy for the public good<sup>g</sup>, which every one of them understood to be the fixing himself where he desired. There were two things in the conduct of this business very remarkable; the first, that upwards of five hundred engaged in it without betraying each other; the other, that they conferred commonly in public places, mostly in the church of Notre Dame: so that the king's spies, who were hunting for cabals and private meetings, were absolutely defeated. The king, in the mean time, was pushing the duke of Bretagne with violence, not perceiving that he had any support; the duke sent a minister to gain time for him; the king laboured to corrupt that minister; he seemed to give way, advised the king to advance towards the frontiers of Bretagne, while he was seducing his brother the duke of Berry, who, by accompanying the king in this journey, found means to make his escape<sup>h</sup>. So that, with all his intelligence, the first sense of his danger arose from hearing that the duke's minister and his brother were withdrawn together; and thus he discerned the storm, just as it began to break over his head<sup>i</sup>.

Battle of Montl'heri, in which both parties have the skill to get themselves beaten.

As soon as the duke of Berry found himself in safety, he published, or rather he suffered to be published in his name, a manifesto, containing a severe censure on the king's administration, and declaring the confederates had nothing in view but reviving the spirit of the laws, relieving the people, and restoring good government, whence they denominated their cause the Bien Public, and stiled their enterprize, the war of the public good<sup>k</sup>. The duke of Calabria his nephew, the duke of Bourbon his cousin, the duke of Bretagne, and the count of Charolois, princes of his blood, the old count de Longueville, his father's faithful servant, nay, the count de Armagnac, whom he had pardoned, and, in short, all the great nobility, declared for this league against the king, and placed his brother, the presumptive heir of the crown, at their head<sup>l</sup>. They armed on both sides: the king had at first the better, and might have had some of them at his mercy, if they had not made use of his own arts, treated with him, and as soon as their friends made a diversion in their favour, declared again for the league<sup>m</sup>. While the king was engaged in the provinces, the count de Charolois advanced directly to Paris, in hopes of surprising it; but the inhabitants stood on their defence. He expected to have been joined by the Bretons, but they did not come up in time, and this gave the king an opportunity of marching to the castle of Montl'heri, about eight leagues from Paris; neither party intended to fight, and yet, on the 16th of July, a battle ensued, which was owing to one of the king's pieces of art; for having demanded of Peter de Breze, who commanded his vanguard, whether he had not some small intelligence with the confederates, he, to convince him of the contrary, engaged without orders<sup>n</sup>. The battle lasted five hours, and may be truly said to have ended in the defeat of both armies; that is, each looked upon themselves as defeated, and, in their first consternation, a great a part of both armies fled above one hundred miles<sup>o</sup>. After this terror was over, both sides claimed a victory, to which neither had any title. Yet the chiefs on both sides behaved well. The count de Charolois, like a gallant soldier, the king like a great captain, who, though his troops were beaten, rallied them in good time, and marched away to Paris.

THE count de Charolois marched to Estampes, where he was joined by all the confederates; and the duke of Calabria, amongst his troops, had five hundred Swiss, which were the first public good that ever were seen in France<sup>p</sup>. The confederates had now an army of upwards of 100,000 men, so that they were clearly strong enough to have carried all things at their pleasure; but their weakness arose from their strength; for their generals were so numerous, that their army was under no command.

b land or the duchy of Milan, had recourse to negotiation; and, finding that go on slowly, demanded a conference with the count of Charolois. When they met, he cried out, Brother, am I safe? and, upon his bare assurance that he was so, risked his person by putting it in his power<sup>q</sup>. He began his discourse with an old compliment; "I find, Sir," said he, "that you are a prince of my blood, and a man of honour; I received your message by the archbishop; you have kept your word, and that some months within your time; so that I shall treat with you without fear of being deceived." By the advice of the duke of Milan, who sent his son with a corps to his assistance, the king dispatched the treaty as soon as he could; and, by a stroke of his own policy, instead of one made two; the first at Conflans, with the count of Charolois, dated the 5th of October, and the second at St. Maur, with the rest of the confederates, dated the 29th of the same month<sup>r</sup>. In these, as is usual, the public good was the form, while the substance of the treaties tended only to private advantage. The king's business was to make an end of the war, and to contrive afterwards how to avoid executing a peace, in which he granted to the confederates all they thought fit to desire, and left himself as much below the rank of a king, as his passion for arbitrary power had set him, while unopposed, above it. This scene was singular enough; and yet France is not the only country where this scene has happened.

At the very time of his concluding these treaties, the king protested, before some of the officers of the parliament, whom he could trust, against their validity, as being equally contrary to the interest of the crown and to his intentions<sup>s</sup>. He took care to detach the duke of Bourbon from the league, by owning frankly, that he had shewn too little regard for him, and promising to repair it. He was the ablest and most moderate of the confederates, and therefore the king studied to gain him<sup>t</sup>. He next made a treaty at Caen with the duke of Bretagne, who had got possession of some places in Normandy, which, he foresaw, would embarrass him with his brother<sup>u</sup>. As soon as this fell out, the king marched into that province with a considerable army, and, sometimes under one pretence, and sometimes under another, reduced almost all the great towns, some by fair means and some by force, the count de Charolois being, in the mean time, engaged in a war against the people of Dinant. These, during the late war, had made a diversion in favour of Lewis, and being now abandoned by him, and the people of Liege, were given up to the resentment of the house of Burgundy, who pushed it to so extravagant a length, that they massacred the inhabitants, and destroyed the city<sup>v</sup>. But, being thus employed, they abandoned the unfortunate Charles, who was forced to fly to the court of the duke of Bretagne, where he was obliged to sell his plate for his subsistence; and, being neither duke of Berry nor Normandy, was stiled simply Monsieur, as the king's brother. Lewis, knowing the distress of the duke of Calabria, which his family were in no condition to relieve, as if he forgot what was passed, sent him a large sum of money; but, at the same time, he punished the count du Maine, who had hitherto maintained a high place in his favour, for having held private intelligence with the confederates<sup>w</sup>. He was very assiduous in executing that part of the late treaty which was least thought of, the naming a special commission for the enquiring into and redressing grievances; but he had taken care to make so strict an enquiry into the conduct of some of the great lords of the league, and their dependents; and to procure such clear evidence of whatever he charged them with, that he converted his tribunal into an inquisition against his enemies: thus, long before the end of the next year, the king had freed himself from the most inconvenient clauses of the treaties of Conflans and St. Maur, and was in a fair way of freeing himself from the rest, relying not a little on the count of St. Pol, of the imperial house of Luxembourg, on whom, after giving him the constable's staff of France, he had also bestowed the sister of his queen in marriage, that he might effectually detach him from the interests of the house of Burgundy<sup>x</sup>; in which he succeeded but indifferently.

Death of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, is succeeded by Charles the Hardy, or the Terrible.

THE king, pursuing his own measure, took into his favour many of those he had formerly disgraced; amongst the rest the lord Dammartin, whom he had even kept some time in prison: what was very wonderful, he affected to treat him and the rest with unusual confidence; employed them in affairs of the greatest importance; and, by rewarding them bountifully, really attached some of them to his service<sup>2</sup>. In like manner he gained the famous earl of Warwick, who had acquired the singular surname of the Make king: he was at this time upon bad terms with Edward the fourth, and, coming over to Normandy, Lewis went to meet him, entertained him at Rouen as if he had been a sovereign prince, and sent him back in such a disposition, that his country never enjoyed peace till he lost the power of disturbing it, together with his life<sup>3</sup>. The death of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, gave the king no small chagrin<sup>4</sup>. He knew that his successor, Charles the Hardy, hated him; and, which affected him more, understood him better than any other man in Europe. He stirred up the people of Liege to renew the war, and, at the same time, sent the cardinal Balue and the constable St. Pol to soothe that prince; and, if that would not do, to try whether, if the king abandoned the Liegeois, the duke might not be prevailed upon to give up his ally the duke of Bretagne. But they miscarried in both; the duke beat the people of Liege, and forced them to submit, while the duke of Bretagne, in virtue of a treaty with the duke of Alençon, invaded and made a progress in Normandy. This did not hinder Lewis from pursuing his scheme, which was to enter Picardy with a large army, at the same time that the admiral, by his orders, invaded Bretagne with one as powerful<sup>5</sup>. He caused likewise a review to be made of the citizens of Paris, on whom he affected to rely very much, though in reality he had a meaner opinion of them in their military capacity than they deserved; the whole force of their militia amounted at this time to eighty thousand men, and of these about thirty thousand were in a condition to bear arms. His minister made a fresh attempt to engage the parliament of Paris to approve the king's edict for abolishing the Pragmatic sanction<sup>6</sup>, but with no effect; and the king, to conciliate the minds of his subjects, published a declaration, importing, that, for the future, he would dispose of no place till it became actually vacant by death, resignation, or forfeiture.

IN order to pacify the troubles of the state, and to secure the assistance of his subjects, Lewis called an assembly of the states at Tours, in which he gave very convincing proofs of his great talents for government: he laid before them the consequences that must inevitably attend the alienation of Normandy, in favour of his brother, expressed at the same time an earnest desire of executing the late treaties, as far as they tended to the public good; by which he turned that pretence upon his enemies. He pointed out the dangers to which the kingdom was exposed from the ambition of the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, pressed the states to appoint commissioners for redressing grievances, and assured them, that the best way of making their court to him was by relieving his people<sup>7</sup>. This behaviour had all the good effects he could desire; the states declared the province of Normandy inseparable from the crown; assured the king of their inviolable duty, and their willingness to support him against all his enemies; and appointed such a committee for the redress of grievances as he desired<sup>8</sup>. It is amazing that a prince, who understood his own interests so well, who was so capable of pursuing them in a right way, and whose endeavours, when he took this way, were attended with so much success, should, notwithstanding, act so strange a part as he sometimes did, and thereby bring himself into greater distress and danger, with greater detriment also to his reputation, than even the weakest of his predecessors underwent. The source of this was his want of probity; for right measures can never be taken for wrong ends; and the prince who deceives others sets a precedent for deceiving himself. At this very time he proceeded with great severity against some who had stood highest in his favour, and who were not more in fault than those who retained it: as for instance, Charles de Melun, great master of his household, and governor of Paris during the late war, to whom he had given the confiscation of Dammartin's estates, being now in the king's good graces, set on foot a prosecution against Charles de Melun, and being joined in it by cardinal de Balue, the unfortunate Melun was condemned and executed, and Dammartin retrieved his estates; neither was this the only severity of the kind<sup>9</sup>; but we cannot multiply instances here, because they would rise of themselves to a volume.

He reduces the duke of Bretagne to a necessity of making a new treaty on his terms.

THE king having taken these precautions, confiding in the excellent intelligence he had, and the superiority of his forces, caused the duke of Bretagne to be attacked with so much vigour, while he in person covered his frontiers against the duke of Burgundy, that the first-mentioned duke, perceiving most of the places he had taken in Normandy lost, and that the duke of Calabria, who commanded the king's forces, was equally capable and inclined to push his conquests, found it necessary to treat: having, with some difficulty, obtained a

- a truce for twelve days, in that space a treaty was concluded at Anenis <sup>h</sup>, by which it was stipulated that the king should grant his brother an annuity of thirty-six thousand livres, till a proper appenage should be settled by the constable and the duke of Calabria; and the king, to make the full use of his superiority, insisted that his brother and the duke should notify the conclusion of this treaty to the duke of Burgundy, with whom he was then treating, in hopes that it would influence him; but it produced quite a contrary effect; he gave so little credit to the news, that he was on the point of hanging the herald <sup>i</sup> that brought it: and, when he was satisfied that it was true, he began to assemble forces with such diligence, that the king, to prevent things from coming to extremities, was content to pay him thirty-six thousand crowns <sup>k</sup>. Dammartin remonstrated to the king, that he had a force sufficient to
- b humble him as he had done the other duke; and that the shortest way was to attack him before he had assembled his whole strength. But cardinal Balue, who held an intelligence with the duke of Burgundy and with the other princes, did not care to see things decided by the sword: he therefore persuaded Lewis, that, having so superior a talent in negotiation, he should engage the duke to give him an interview, in which it was impossible he could avoid coming to the king's terms <sup>l</sup>. This proposition so flattered the king's vanity, that, though not without some difficulty, he engaged the duke to name Peronne in Picardy, then in his power, for the place of their meeting, and thither accordingly he went, unattended by guards, with a few only of his domestic officers, that the duke, being struck by this act of confidence, might be the less able to defend himself in their conferences <sup>m</sup>. As another means of influencing his resolution, he commanded some of his ablest emissaries to enter Liege, and to persuade the inhabitants to give the duke an alarm on that side, on which he had ever found him most apprehensive. Thus, full of confidence in his own arts, he rushed almost headlong into destruction <sup>n</sup>, in a manner scarce excusable in the weakest prince that ever lived.
- c

- THE duke received him with all possible marks of regard and respect, caused him to be lodged very conveniently in the town, and shewed himself, as Lewis expected, highly pleased with this signal mark of confidence. While the negotiations were going on, prince Philip of Savoy, and some of the French exiles who had followed the fortune of prince Charles, came to Peronne, to pay their court to the duke; and, being most of them soldiers of fortune, brought abundance of gens d'arms along with them. The king, being alarmed at this,
- d instead of quitting the town as he might have done, demanded of the duke to go and reside in the castle, which was very readily granted <sup>o</sup>. He was scarce well fixed there, before he received intelligence that the people of Liege, by the persuasion of the French emissaries, had again broke out into an insurrection, surprized the town of Tongres, made his brother-in-law their bishop prisoner, cut the garrison to pieces, and murdered six of his canons <sup>p</sup>. The duke, in the first transport of his resentment, ordered the castle gates to be shut, double guards to be posted, and, in short, made the king thoroughly sensible that he was a prisoner, and at his mercy <sup>q</sup>. It is impossible to express the disconsolate condition of Lewis, whose apartments were at the very foot of the tower, in which the count of Vermandois had confined Charles the Simple. In this wretched state he continued three days, but had so much
- e presence of mind as to cause a large sum in ready money, which he had brought with him, to be immediately distributed amongst the duke's domestics, with a promise of twice as much more. This answered his purpose very well; all the duke's counsellors strove to pacify him; and at length he went to the king and concluded a treaty, or rather prescribed such terms as he thought proper to a prince whose life and liberty was intirely in his power <sup>r</sup>. Lewis bore all with signal patience. The duke stipulated that the king's brother should have Champagne and Brie, fixed every thing to his own satisfaction, and then obliged the king to march with him against Liege, which had revolted at his own request <sup>s</sup>. This was undoubtedly the most mortifying incident of his whole life, and was very near being the last of it. The duke of Burgundy was so much afraid of his making his escape, that he posted
- f a guard of three hundred choice men between his own quarters and those of Lewis to prevent it, in case he should make any attempt. The inhabitants, guided only by despair, in the middle of a dark night, made a furious sally, in which, if it had not been for that guard, they had made themselves masters both of the king and duke, and were at last repulsed with great difficulty. But the place was afterwards carried, partly by surprize and partly by storm, the king being present in the attack; and having thus fulfilled, in every particular, the purpose of his vassal, had his leave to return; and the duke had so much respect for him, as to suffer him to depart before he set fire to the town and massacred the inhabitants <sup>t</sup>.

On his return Lewis confirmed the treaty in every particular, notified its contents to the proper tribunals, and published an edict, forbidding any persons, under the severest penalties, from speaking evil of the duke of Burgundy. At the same time he ordered all the magpies and jays to be destroyed, and a note to be brought him of their masters names; which odd circumstance was owing to their being taught to cry, Peronne, Peronne, which the king thought he was in no danger of forgetting, without the help of these ridiculous remembrancers<sup>u</sup>.

The perfidious practices of cardinal Baluc and the bishop of Verdun discovered.

AT the time the king took leave of the duke of Burgundy, he asked him what was to be done, if his brother should not be satisfied with the appenage he had fixed for him in the counties of Champagne and Brie? The duke, who did not penetrate the king's meaning, told him, that he should not interfere any more between them; and that all he desired was that Monsieur should be satisfied. The king, building upon this, proposed to his brother the duchy of Guienne<sup>w</sup>, with some of the adjacent lordships, being extremely unwilling to fix his brother in a kind of independent principality, between Flanders and Burgundy, by which he would have an opportunity, in case any new disputes arose, of introducing troops into the very heart of his dominions. But, while he had this and other negotiations in his mind, an accident discovered a most dangerous and wicked correspondence, that had been long carried on by his prime-minister the cardinal Balue, who had lately merited that title from the court of Rome, by betraying the interests of the nation, and holding a secret correspondence with the duke of Burgundy. He and the bishop of Verdun, a man of as much subtlety and intrigue, and whose morals were as bad as his own, intrusted their letters to the same man, who being seized for a spy, and these letters found about him, the king had at once a convincing proof that this man, whom, from an obscure condition, suitable to the meanness of his birth, he had raised, not without violence and injustice, to the highest dignities in church and state, was laying open his most secret counsels, to the prince in the world he had the most reason to dread, and, at the same time, pointing out how they might be defeated, and all this merely to render himself necessary, to hold the king, as it were, in toils, and to secure himself a retreat if he should lose his favour.

Both of them punished with unprecedented severity.

BOTH these prelates were arrested, and convicted, partly on proofs, and partly by their own confessions; but the court of Rome interposing, the king contented himself with confining both of them in iron cages of eight feet square, the bishop in the Bastile, and the cardinal in several places, for upwards of eleven years; who was not only the less pitied, as he was guilty, but as he was the inventor of that cruel kind of custody in which he was kept<sup>x</sup>. After this he found his brother more tractable; insomuch, that he consented to the proposed exchange, and, in consequence of a kind of reconciliation, they had an interview, where the duke of Guienne made profound submissions to the king, who was so much persuaded of his sincerity, that he not only honoured him with the order of St. Michael, which he instituted about this time, but proposed also a marriage between him and the princess of Castile, which had been a fair step to the regal dignity<sup>y</sup> (C). He gave assistance also to his nephew the

(C) The order of the Star instituted by king John, being sunk into contempt, and other orders flourishing with great splendor in different countries, but more especially in England, Castile, Portugal, and Burgundy, Lewis instituted, on the 1st of August, 1469, at Amboise, that of St. Michael (1), who, it seems, was reputed, in antient times, the protector of the realm of France, and, for that reason, his feast kept with great splendor and magnificence (2). The collar of this order was composed of scallop shells of gold, joined one with another, fastened on small chains or males of the same metal. In the midst was annexed an oval of gold, on which was depicted a rising hill, whereon stood St. Michael, trampling upon the dragon, all curiously enamelled. To which, saith Menenius, was adjoined this epigraph, Immensi Tremor Oceani (3). The habit appointed by the founder, was a mantle of white damask, hanging down to the ground, furred with ermine, having its cape embroidered with gold (4), and the border of the robe interwoven with scallops of gold. The chaperon or hood, with its long tippet, was made of crimson velvet (5). The grand assembly was, by the sovereign and knights, to be held, as a solemn festival, on Michaelmas-day, and the place appointed for the celebration of these pompous ceremonies was the church of Mount St. Michael, in Normandy, built by St. Authbert, upon St. Michael's appearing to him in a vision, and liberally endowed by Rollo, duke of Normandy, and his successors (6), but afterwards removed to Bois de Vincennes, not far from Paris (7). The king proposed that the number of knights should be thirty-six; of whom he named fifteen, his brother the duke of Guienne, the duke of Bourbon, and the constable, being the three first (8). By their oath of admission, they swore to support the dignity, and to defend the rights of the crown, the authority of the king and of his successors, in spite of and against all persons whatever. In all probability, it was to ob-

a the duke of Calabria, who, at the head of the revolted Catalans, gave him king John of Arragon and Navarre so much trouble, that he was in no condition to recover the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagna, of which, under colour of a mortgage, king Lewis had been long in possession, and was by no means desirous they should be redeemed. But this gleam of A. D. 1469. tranquility, with which the king was highly delighted, did not last long; for that spirit of intrigue which he had introduced and encouraged, proved the perpetual source of foreign and domestic troubles, during the whole course of his reign. Such are the blessed effects of that refined system of self-interest, which is falsely called policy<sup>a</sup>.

THE duke of Burgundy had only one daughter, the greatest heiress in Europe, in case the duke died without issue male; and the malecontents in France were desirous that she should have espoused Monsieur; it is believed the duke himself was not averse to this, which induced him to fix the counties of Champagne and Brie for the appenage of that prince, and made him so much displeased at seeing that disposition altered by the last treaty; which, however, the king had, in some measure, justified, by the advice he took from the duke at his departure from Liege<sup>a</sup>. Monsieur himself also had an inclination to this match, in preference to that of Spain, which had been negotiated for him by his brother. The duke of Bretagne was likewise in this way of thinking, knowing that the king bore always in mind the desire he had of reducing his power, and he discovered this disposition by refusing the order of St. Michael, which Lewis had sent him<sup>b</sup>. The affairs of England took a very extraordinary turn; Margaret, queen to Henry the sixth, again solicited the king's favour and assistance, having with her the prince of Wales her son, the famous earl of Warwick, and the duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the fourth, who had married the earl's eldest daughter. Lewis, considering that the duke of Burgundy had married the sister of Edward, had lately accepted the order of the garter, and was intirely in the interest of that prince, listened more readily to the queen's solicitations than he had formerly done, and furnished the lords of her party with such succours, as enabled them to return to England, where they defeated Edward, replaced Henry upon the throne, and forced the former to retire for shelter to his brother the duke of Burgundy<sup>c</sup>. The king thought there could not be a more favourable opportunity than this to recover the cities and towns in Picardy; but, in all probability, he would not have ventured into an open war with the duke of Burgundy, if he had not been solicited to it by some of those who had been formerly in close correspondence with that prince, particularly the constable of St. Pol, and the readiness expressed by the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne to take arms in his quarrel<sup>d</sup>. He judged it, however, expedient, to give the better colour to this proceeding, that he should seem solicited to it by his subjects, and therefore he called an assembly of the princes and great lords at Tours, where they proceeded with great warmth against the duke of Burgundy; and, upon the complaint of the count d'Eu, ordered him to be summoned as a peer of France, to answer in parliament<sup>e</sup>. It was foreseen he would act as he really did upon this occasion; that is, treat the summons with contempt, and send the usher who brought it to prison: therefore care was taken that the army should be ready to act immediately, with which the constable presently made himself master of St. Quintin's, before the duke could well bring an army into the field<sup>f</sup>: what astonished him more than the loss of the town, was the retreat of his natural brother Baldwin, whom Lewis had found means to corrupt; and the Flemish writers assert, that a plot was likewise laid for poisoning the duke<sup>g</sup>, which, from what the reader will hereafter see, cannot appear at all improbable.

AT the time of the loss of St. Quintin, the duke of Burgundy was at Dourlens, with five hundred horse, but, as soon as he heard that the people of Amiens had opened their gates to the king, and that Roie and Mondidier had likewise admitted French troops, he retired to Arras, and began there to assemble forces with great diligence<sup>h</sup>. He was less surprized at the events of the war than at the conduct of those who made it, more especially of the duke of Guienne and the constable, to whom, therefore, he sent, to put them in mind of their old connections. They soon explained the secret of their new behaviour, by letting him know,

tain this security of the duke of Bretagne, that he made him an offer of his order; and it is not at all improbable, that it was on the score of this oath, though he pretended other matters, that the duke refused it (9). But it is out of question, that, from his refusal, Lewis conceived an implacable hatred against him, of which he felt the effects.

(9) La Chronique Scandaleuse. Gaguini Hist. Memoires de Philip de Commines. Argent. Histoire de Bretagne. Le Gend.

that he had nothing to do but to give his daughter to the duke of Guienne, and that he should soon see the best part of the king's troops on his side. The duke of Bretagne not only held the same language, but added likewise, that the longer he hesitated about taking this step, the worse his affairs were like to go, since the king had great intelligence even in the heart of his dominions<sup>1</sup>. As great politicians as these princes were, they did not at all foresee the consequences of this manner of acting; the duke had no conception of submitting to the king, much less to them. He formed therefore, as numerous an army as he could, passed the Somme, and encamped before Amiens, from whence he wrote a very humble letter to the king, desiring a peace, which ended with these words; "If you had known the inside of things, you would not have declared war against me<sup>2</sup>." Lewis, who had his reasons also to be weary of this state of things, and who began to suspect the loyalty of those who were fondest of the war, concluded a truce for a year, in spite of all they could say to prevent it<sup>3</sup>. In the mean time things had again changed their face in England; the duke of Burgundy, rather through interest than affection, had supplied his brother Edward of England with money and a few ships, and, as slender as these succours were, yet, having had always the affection of the people, they enabled him to succeed; so that, after beating the forces of Henry in two successive battles, he was quietly reseatd in the throne<sup>4</sup>. The duke of Burgundy, in consequence of the truce, altered his language to the French malecontents, though not his sentiments, and seemed to resume the marriage of his daughter, as if he had been more in earnest than ever; nay, he carried the refinement of his policy so far, that he sent the bishop of Montauban to Rome, to solicit, or pretend to solicit, a dispensation. These proceedings were attended with very singular events<sup>5</sup>. Lewis was so much alarmed, that he sent the Sieur de Bouchage to his brother, to let him know that he was not ignorant of his intrigues, and that he ought to remember what he had sworn to him on the cross of St. Lo; in which case, whoever broke their oaths were sure to die miserably, within a year: he likewise proposed to him the inconveniencies of that match, and the advantages that would attend his adhering strictly to his duty. The duke gave the king's minister fair words, and took his own measures; notwithstanding the king heard what his brother had promised, and is said to have taken his measures likewise. Edward the fourth was no less alarmed at this match than Lewis the eleventh, and ordered his ministers to declare as much to the duke of Burgundy, who, perceiving that Lewis was disposed to negotiate upon reasonable terms, turned the truce, at the end of the year, into a peace, which was stiled the peace of Crotoi<sup>6</sup>. By this, on the restitution of St. Quintin and Amiens, which was stipulated by the king, the duke abandoned Monsieur and the duke of Bretagne to the king's vengeance, and the king left the count de Nevers and the count de St. Pol to the duke's mercy: such was the usage of these times<sup>7</sup>.

Death of the duke of Guienne, and the rejection of the peace with the duke of Burgundy;

ALL possible appearances were in favour of the peace of Crotoi, which the wisest men of those times thought would have been final. But, on the contrary, this presumed-to-be lasting peace proved, in the end, no peace at all; the king, who had shewn himself very sincere through the negotiation, refusing absolutely to ratify it. The duke of Guienne, who had given the king his brother such cruel and such constant anxieties, was dead of a lingering disease<sup>8</sup>. It was reported, and believed in those days, that the chaplain of this prince, who was abbot of St. John d'Angeli, dividing a large and beautiful peach between madame de Monsereau, who was the duke's mistress, and the duke, poisoned them both, of which the unfortunate woman died immediately; but the duke, though he languished for half a year, never recovered his colour or strength<sup>9</sup>. The Sieur de Lescun, who was the duke's favourite, seized this wicked monk, and sent him prisoner to the duke of Bretagne, where it was intended to proceed against him; but he was found, not long afterwards, in the tower where he was confined, dead of a stroke of thunder, or at least of some stroke or other; which did not at all displease the king<sup>10</sup>.

who thereupon publishes a manifesto against the king, and vigorously renews the war.

THE duke of Burgundy, who, some say, by the advice of the French plenipotentiaries, continued armed, finding the king resolute in rejecting the peace, declared war, under pretence of revenging his friend the duke of Guienne's death, and committed great cruelties. Yet some say the king was not in the wrong. He had insisted, prior to the ratification, that Charles should send a gentleman with a letter to the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne, to signify to them that they were no longer to expect his protection; which he actually did, but at the same time acquainted the duke of Bretagne, by a private letter, that he had no intention to abandon them; that he made this treaty purely to get the towns of St. Quintin and Amiens restored; as the king had taken them without any regard to the treaties of Conflans and Peronne, he should, when he had those places once in his hands, pay as little a regard to the treaty of Crotol<sup>1</sup>. The moment his brother was dead, the king seized the dutchy of Guienne, reconquered the county of Armagnac; and, having gained the Sieur de Lescun, who had the confidence of the duke of Bretagne, engaged the prince to accommodate matters with him<sup>2</sup>: at the same time, he drew over the famous Philip de Commines, one of the completest courtiers of his time, and the principal minister of the duke of Burgundy: but what his true motive was for quitting the service of that prince, he, who has acquainted us with so many secrets, has thought fit to conceal; and time, which reveals so many things, has left us in the dark as to this; the traditionary conjectures on that head being so ridiculous as to deserve no credit<sup>3</sup>.

At the time the king was engaged in Guienne, the duke of Burgundy having failed in retaking the towns upon the Somme, made an irruption into Normandy, but with no great success. Lewis, upon his return from Guienne, according to his usual custom, was inclined to conclude a truce. Upon this several conferences were held, which ended in what the king desired; and, upon this occasion, the duke, who had hitherto concealed it, and probably would have concealed it longer, if he had not been provoked by the constable's burning his country, contrary to the rules of war, laid open all his treachery to the king, and thereby explained the meaning of that dark passage in his letter, which has been before mentioned<sup>4</sup>. Lewis was so much moved at this, that, if the constable had been in his power, he had certainly felt the full weight of his resentment; but his county and other estates lying between the dominions of the king and the duke of Burgundy, his keeping St. Quintin's in his hands, and having, during the war, four hundred gens d'arms, though in the king's pay, yet at his devotion, with a considerable body of troops in his own pay besides, Lewis always apprehended he would make his peace with the duke of Burgundy, by changing sides; and therefore finding him universally odious, began to treat with the duke to concur with him in his vengeance, and to divide his spoils<sup>5</sup>. Charles, who never forgave him the insolence of prescribing to him how he should dispose of his only daughter, received the overture favourably enough, but deferred it for the present, as being engaged in the expedition of Gueldres, of which country he was heir by the testament of the last prince. He had also another and a greater design in his head, which was to assume the title of king, and to get his territories released from the homage due to France and to the empire, in order to unite them in one independent sovereignty, under the title of the realm of Burgundy<sup>6</sup>. He had even a project of extending them by marrying his heiress to the young duke of Calabria, whose father lived at Barcelona, and who, on the demise of his grandfather, would inherit Lorrain.

Being disappointed in his views, concludes a truce, and discovers the constable's treason to the king.

The business of the constable was brought almost to a conclusion in the conferences at Bovines, where it was agreed he should be delivered up to justice, and that, upon his conviction for high treason, his forfeitures should be shared between the two princes. But the constable having, some way or other, gained intelligence of what was doing, applied himself to the king, and made him believe he received his accounts from the duke of Burgundy, who was desirous to attach him intirely to his own service. This Lewis believed; and, to disappoint the duke, consented to a conference with the constable, in which all things, for the present, were adjusted; yet, notwithstanding this, a truce was concluded between the king and the duke for a year<sup>7</sup>. A man was detected and executed for attempting to procure one of the king's cooks to poison him: the fact seems to be true, but even tortures did not force the criminal to discover any person of note, and for this reason it was placed to the account of the duke of Burgundy, as the prince who, at this juncture, was most likely to be served by it<sup>8</sup>. The duke of Alençon also, whom the king had freely pardoned at the beginning of his reign, was again found plotting to retire to the duke of Burgundy, and to sell him whatever he possessed in France. He had likewise been tampering with England, of which being convicted, he had judgment of death, with a saving to the king's mercy, who again changed the sentence into imprisonment for life<sup>9</sup>. The duke of Burgundy was, all this time, embarked in some disputes in Germany, where he sometimes courted the emperor's favour, and offered his daughter for his son, as he had done to many other princes, and at other times took such steps as engaged them in a war against each other, as happened in this year by his besieging Nuys<sup>10</sup>. Some of the shrewdest persons in the king's council represented this as the most favourable opportunity he could desire for crushing the duke, by entering into an alliance with the emperor, as to which some overtures were made, but with very little sincerity; for the king, who commonly followed his own notions, had no opinion of this alliance, but judged it more for his interest to let the duke proceed in his own way, and gradually waste his force; to facilitate which, he raised him up two new enemies, the one Rene duke of Lorraine, grandson to a Rene of Anjou, king of Sicily, and the other the Swiss cantons, with whom he entered into a strict and very useful alliance<sup>c</sup>. He laid asleep, by the same arts, his disputes with the king of Aragon, which we have mentioned in another place, and which, this year, had given him a great deal of trouble, and had involved him in various negotiations.

Edward IV.
in consequence of several alliances with
the duke of Burgundy, invades France;

THE next year the king changed his plan of proceeding; for finding that the duke of Burgundy made difficulties of renewing the truce, he ordered the duke of Bourbon to invade Burgundy, and, at the same time, caused him to be attacked on the Somme. He proposed also to the emperor the division of the duke of Burgundy's territories between them; to which that prince answered by the famous apologue of dividing the bear's skin before they had stripped him<sup>f</sup>. The obstinacy of the duke of Burgundy got the better of the Germans, b who, though they held him besieged in his camp while he besieged Nuys, were, notwithstanding, content to terminate things by a treaty, which, if not advantageous, was at least honourable; and now, if his impetuosity would have permitted him, the duke had it clearly in his power either to have brought the king to his own terms, or to have distressed him more severely than when he had him in his hands at Liege<sup>g</sup>. Edward the fourth of England, under pretence of revenging the assistance which Lewis had given to the house of Lancaster, but, in reality, that he might obtain a large supply from the house of commons, and a benevolence from his subjects, determined to invade France; and, with this view, had made six distinct treaties with the duke of Burgundy, who was to assist him in person with all his forces, to acknowledge and do him homage as king of France, and to receive from him the c duchy of Bar, the counties of Champagne, Nevers, Retel, Eu, and Guise, with other places<sup>h</sup>. As soon as he was ready to embark his forces, Edward dispatched a herald to Lewis to summon him to deliver up the kingdom. The king, who knew how much his actions would be observed on such an occasion, received the herald with an air of gaiety; but taking him into a place that was out of every body's hearing, told him his master was come upon an idle errand; that his confederates the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and the constable, would certainly deceive him; and that it would be much better for him to make a peace upon good terms with him, and restore a thorough harmony between the two crowns, which might be equally beneficial to both nations<sup>i</sup>. The herald seeming to treat this proposition in a manner as if he did not believe it at all impracticable, the king gave him three hundred pieces d of gold with great secrecy, and then ordered Commines to conduct him out of the court; to take care that he conversed with no-body; and, when he dismissed him, to give him publicly a piece of crimson velvet, as a testimony that the king was not displeased with his message<sup>k</sup>.

EDWARD debarked, in the neighbourhood of Calais, as fine an army as any of his predecessors had brought into France, and was, without question, as capable of directing its operations as they were; but he found his affairs in a strange situation<sup>l</sup>. The duke of Burgundy was making war in Lorraine to revenge the insolence, as he styled it, of the duke, who, at the instance of Lewis, had declared war against him; the duke of Bretagne declined stirring till the armies were in action; and as for the king, he seemed to expect, with great tranquility, what turn the war would take<sup>m</sup>. The duke of Burgundy came to the English e camp, to compliment the king: he assured him that he held a correspondence with the constable, and that, upon directing their march towards Amiens and St. Quintin's, he would deliver those places into their hands, and declare himself, as others of the French nobility would likewise; which, in all probability, the duke believed<sup>n</sup>. But when Edward advanced with his army to make the experiment, the constable fired upon them; and yet continued to assure the duke of Burgundy, that, at a proper time, he would fulfil his engagements: the king, who could not by any means relish this conduct, and who apprehended a rebellion at home, if he did not carry on the war with success, or at least procure a good peace, caused some overtures to be made to Lewis, who very readily entered into a negotiation. This ended in several treaties, which were concluded at Amiens, on the 29th of August; but from f their being ratified by the two kings at an interview they had at the bridge of that village, were styled the treaties of Pequigni<sup>o</sup>. Instead of separate articles there were five distinct instruments. By the first, the two kings consented to leave all their disputes to arbitration, naming the arbitrators. King Edward consented to quit the French territories upon the receipt of twenty-five thousand crowns, without committing any hostilities, and delivered the lord Howard and Sir John Cheney for hostages. By the second they concluded a seven years truce for themselves and allies. The third was a fraternal alliance between the two kings, to be cemented by the marriage of the dauphin with the princess Elizabeth. The fourth were a letters patent, by which Lewis undertook to pay Edward an annuity of fifty thousand crowns, during their lives, which the English writers unanimously stile tribute, and the French historians, though they do not like that phrase, know not what else to call it. And, lastly, Edward agreed to release queen Margaret for a ransom of fifty thousand crowns, to be paid within the space of five years, which was punctually executed on both sides <sup>p</sup>.

THE duke of Burgundy came to the English camp before things were concluded, and endeavoured to make Edward break off, but to no purpose: the king telling him that he meant to include him as his ally; the duke answered haughtily, That he desired no such favour; and that he would not conclude either peace or truce till the king had been three months in England <sup>q</sup>. After their interview, Lewis received the English lords, knights, gentlemen, and even the soldiers that came to visit the court at Amiens, with a frankness that surprized them, ordering tables to be set in the streets with victuals and wine. According to his usual custom, he corrupted the whole English council; and, besides immediate presents, granted pensions amongst them to the amount of sixteen thousand crowns a year <sup>r</sup>. Edward executed his engagements punctually, and delivered the constable's letters, in which himself and king Lewis were very insolently treated. After his return the duke of Burgundy signed, on the 13th of September, a truce for nine years; and upon this occasion the king abandoned Rene duke of Lorraine, while the duke gave up the constable: he also concluded a treaty with the duke of Bretagne; and hearing that the constable had quitted St. Quintin's, and had retired to Mons, he demanded him; and the duke, though with some reluctance, gave him up <sup>s</sup>. He was brought to Paris, tried, and condemned to death by the parliament, which he suffered on the 19th of December, with great intrepidity and composure of mind <sup>t</sup>. The duke of Burgundy had his whole confiscation, which did not balance the reproach of having delivered him to the king <sup>u</sup>.

THE king now had leisure and opportunity to have concerted measures for the duke of Burgundy's destruction, which it is probable he might have done without regard to the truce; but perceiving that the duke himself was sufficiently bent to that purpose, he prudently gave him no disturbance, but left him to push his rash enterprizes in what manner he thought fit; and, without question, he could not have taken a surer method. The duke, having taken Nancy, and ruined Lorraine, made war, almost without any cause, upon the Switzers, though they offered him any satisfaction, and even to renounce their treaty with France: he was totally defeated, through his own fault; and, persisting in the same wild measures, set on foot another army, with which he besieged Morat <sup>v</sup>. The Swiss sent for Rene duke of Lorraine, whom he had driven out of his dominions, and gave him the command of their army, and it was chiefly through his courage and conduct that the duke of Burgundy was beat a second time, after which Rene recovered his capital: but Charles, having set a new army on foot, obliged him to retire, leaving a garrison in the place, which he presently besieged <sup>x</sup>. Lewis, in the mean time, prosecuted his uncle the old unfortunate king of Naples, for holding a correspondence with the duke of Burgundy and his enemies, and forced him to an abject submission. He declined giving any assistance to Don Alonso of Portugal, who came in person to demand it; he constrained the duke of Bretagne to renounce all his engagements with the duke of Burgundy; and, taking advantage of the declining state of that prince's affairs, punished the infidelity of several of his own subjects, and obliged most of his neighbours to compensate past neglects, by entering into such engagements as he thought fit to dictate; for he was now in the zenith of his power, and gave law at his pleasure both at home and abroad <sup>y</sup>. The duke of Burgundy, in an unaccountable fit of violence, had seized the duchess of Savoy, the king's sister, with whom, though Lewis had never lived with her on good terms, he now entered into an amicable correspondence, and, by his interposition, procured her liberty; for, though the duke still hated him as much as ever, insomuch that he broke an interview concerted between them, yet his circumstances did not allow him to give the king so fair an opportunity of breaking the truce, and anticipating that destruction to which his affairs were hastening, by his own precipitate conduct, and contempt even of the king's admonition <sup>z</sup>.

AMONGST the soldiers of fortune in the duke of Burgundy's army, with which he besieged Nancy, was the count de Campobasso: he commanded a corps of Italians, and in revenge of a blow on the ear given him by that prince, had been long in a design of compassing his destruction. He offered his service on every side, and amongst the rest to Lewis, who, from generosity or policy, gave the duke notice of it; but he was so far from making a right use of it, that he confided in him more than ever <sup>a</sup>. This man betrayed him in all dy-

shapes, protracted the siege of Nancy, corresponded with the enemy, and, upon the approach of the duke of Lorraine with an army of fourteen thousand men, raised chiefly with the king's money, deserted him, and retired to a post, where, if the army was beat, he might cut off their retreat. He left behind him some officers who were embarked in the conspiracy, who, as soon as the battle began, on Sunday January the fifth, gave way, and threw the army into disorder; others, posted about his person, dispatched the duke, in the heat of the engagement, and threw his body into a ditch; after which all was slaughter and confusion<sup>b</sup>. Lewis no sooner received the news, than he disposed every thing to turn this event as much as possible to his advantage (D). He gave out that he intended to marry the young duchess of Burgundy, who was in the twenty-first year of her age, to the dauphin, who was just entered the seventh. He seized Burgundy and the county of Artois, and raised such disturbances in Flanders, that the people put to death their young mistress's most faithful counsellors, on account of letters which the king put into their hands. He made use of the prince of Orange for some time, and then threw him off; he found means to hinder the king of England from interfering in favour of the house of Burgundy<sup>c</sup>. At length he suffered the marriage of Maximilian of Austria with that rich heiress to take place, rather than that of the count d'Angouleme, as being more afraid of a prince of his own blood than of a stranger<sup>d</sup>. This year was also fatal to James d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, whom the king had caused to be arrested, and convicted of high treason. He was a man so covered with crimes, that he died unpitied; and yet his conviction was brought about in so indecent a manner, and his death was accompanied with such circumstances of severity, as drew great imputations of cruelty upon Lewis. He was brought on horseback to a scaffold, where he was beheaded, and his blood, running through, fell upon his children, which was such a strain of barbarity, as never had been heard of before<sup>e</sup>. He distributed his confiscations amongst his creatures, many of whom were low people, particular Oliver le Dain, who had been his barber; and published an edict, requiring all persons who had the most distant knowledge of treasons to reveal them, on pain of being treated as accomplices: a law that, after remaining long dormant, was awakened, to gratify the resentment of cardinal Richelieu, in the reign of Lewis the thirteenth.

HOSTILITIES having again commenced between the king and the archduke Maximilian, who could not bear to see a great part of his wife's dominions torn from her by a prince, whom he thought of all princes the most unjust, laboured all he could to recover them out of the king's hands; and the prince of Orange having quitted his service, became a powerful instrument in the hands of the archduke, till such time as the king sent the Sieur de Chaumont to command in Burgundy, who very speedily reduced the far greatest part of it, and even the city of Besançon, which was then esteemed an imperial town<sup>f</sup>. Upon this the arch-

(D) The king was excessively uneasy about the issue of this campaign. He had a custom of giving magnificent presents to such as brought him good news; Commines and Bouchage had received each of them two hundred marks for bringing him an account of the duke's former defeats (6). Du Lude sat up all night, in order to watch for the courier, who came about break of day with the news of this fatal defeat of Nancy, but he could say nothing particular as to the duke's death. The king, however, was so overjoyed, that he told the news to all the great men at court, and invited them to dine with him. Upon which, Commines observes, that the company were so affected, either with concern or joy, that not one of them made a full meal, which could not happen, says he, through any awe of the king's presence, since there were none who had not had the honour to dine with him many times before (7). The truth of the matter was, they were apprehensive the king would become more absolute than ever by the death of his rival, and they should be more exposed to his caprices and cruelties, as having now neither shelter nor support. In the life of Angelo Cotta, archbishop of Vicenna, at whose request Philip de Commines wrote his memoirs, and who was a famous astrologer, we have a very singular story (8). It is said that Lewis was hearing mass in the cathedral of St. Martin at Tours, at the very instant the battle of Nancy was fought; and that, when this prelate, according to custom, presented the pix for the king to kiss, he said, "Sire, God gives you peace and repose, you may enjoy them if you please, quia consummatus est: your enemy, the duke of Burgundy, is at this instant slain, and his army intirely overthrown." But, if we consider that this is told us by an anonymous writer, and that there is not the least mention of it in Commines, or any other historian of credit, we can scarce yield our assent. However the same author adds another surprising circumstance in support of it: he says the king made a vow, that, if the prediction was accomplished, instead of the iron grating about the shrine of St. Martin, he would place one of silver, which he afterwards did, at the expence of one hundred thousand franks. This last fact is undoubtedly true, for, in 1479, the king erected that silver grating, which weighs fifty-four thousand two hundred and ten ounces (9). But, though the king did this expensive work, and might do this in consequence of a vow, it might not be this.

- a duke altered his measures, and was disposed to conclude a truce, that he might have some degree of leisure to settle himself in his new dominions, and to acquire a thorough knowledge of their force. Lewis had precisely the very same reasons, with regard to his conquests, both in Artois and Burgundy, so that a truce was concluded for a year at Arras<sup>g</sup>. The king then made a journey into Touraine, under colour of a religious pilgrimage, which was frequent enough with him, when he had a mind to visit this or that part of his dominions, for political purposes. He had then a multitude of negotiations upon his hands, and he managed them all with great dexterity, which was, in reality, what suited best with his capacity. His sister, the duchess of Savoy, was dead; he provided for the safety of her family, and the security of their dominions. He took the family of Medicis under his protection, and sent Commines into Italy, to treat with pope Sixtus the fourth, who was the capital enemy of that house<sup>h</sup>. He dismissed Don Alonso of Portugal, who had been long soliciting succours, and told him plainly that his interest made it requisite for him to acknowledge Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, with whom it was in vain any longer to dispute<sup>i</sup>. He made an alliance with them accordingly, which was very convenient for his affairs, as it hindered them from entering into alliance with the emperor and his son the archduke: and he continued to feed the king of England and his ministers with sums of money, which, while they consumed in the pleasures of a luxurious court, he was left to pursue his projects at leisure, notwithstanding the indefatigable endeavours of the duchess-dowager of Burgundy, and of the duke of Britagne, to excite the ambition or the jealousy of Edward, and thereby engage him to revive the old pretensions of his family to the crown of France, or at least to the duchies of Normandy and Guienne<sup>k</sup>.

THE new treaty, which had been so long negotiating in England, was at length concluded A. D. 1478. and signed in the month of February, and seems to have consisted of two parts. By the first Lewis stipulates for himself and successors, that they shall continue to pay the pension of 50,000 livres to the king during his life, and to his heirs and successors for one hundred years to come. The second, of the same date, was for prolonging the truce, friendship, and good understanding, between the two kings during their lives, and between their successors for the space of one hundred years, with promise of mutual assistance against their rebellious subjects. The other articles were, That, if one of the two princes were driven out of his kingdom, the other should be obliged to receive him, and assist him with all his forces; that they should make no alliance without a mutual consent; that the king of France should ratify this treaty, and cause it to be confirmed and ratified by the states; and that Edward should likewise procure the parliament's approbation. Lastly, That the dauphin's marriage with the princess Elizabeth should be accomplished according to the agreement at Amiens; and this new treaty not be derogatory to the former<sup>l</sup>.

THE archduke, before the end of the truce, had begun hostilities again in Burgundy, and in the Low Countries. In the month of August he laid siege, with a numerous army, to Terouane; the Sieur d'Esquerdes, who commanded in Picardy, marched to the relief of the place, with an army stronger in horse, but weaker in infantry, than that of the Flemings: the archduke raised the siege, in order to give him battle<sup>m</sup>. The French cavalry charged with great impetuosity, and soon beat the archduke's horse, upon which the French infantry fell to pillaging; but the archduke dismounting, with some lords that were about him, and putting himself at the head of the Flemish foot, attacked the French, already in disorder, and defeated them. On the whole, however, neither party had any great reason to boast of their success in the battle of Guinegate<sup>n</sup>. The archduke seems to have lost most from his not returning to the siege: it is true he took a small castle afterwards, but he had been better without the conquest, since, in the heat of passion, he put the remains of the garrison to the sword, and, three days after, hanged the officer who commanded in it. Lewis was so much incensed at this, that he ordered fifty of the principal prisoners, taken in the beginning of the battle, to be hanged in different places; amongst these was a son of the king of Poland, who served as a volunteer in the Flemish army, and for whom a reprieve came, just as he was going to die<sup>o</sup>. The king gained a greater advantage at sea; for one Coulon, a privateer of Normandy, with some of his associates, took fourscore sail of Flemish ships in the northern seas; which blow affected the inhabitants of the Low Countries so much, that they carried on the war but very languidly the next summer, and towards the end of it, concluded a truce<sup>p</sup>. Pope Sixtus, being very desirous of putting an end to this war, sent the cardinal de la Rovene, to persuade both the king and the archduke to leave their differences to his mediation; in which, though he did not altogether succeed, yet he had no reason to repent his coming into France; for, besides renewing the truce for another year, he prevailed upon him to set cardinal Balue at liberty, and suffer him to retire to Rome<sup>a</sup>. The king was so little satisfied with the behaviour of the militia called Franc-archers at the last battle, that he resolved to employ them no more. These men were raised and paid by the villages; and, in their stead, the king brought in Swiss troops, whom he hired, and added to them ten thousand French foot, to whom he gave regular pay. Charles du Maine, count of Provence, the last of the house of Anjou, dying without issue, left his estates to the king<sup>r</sup>.

Death of the duchess of Burgundy, the dauphin contracted to her daughter, and the death of
Edward IV.

A. D. 1481.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, Lewis had an attack of an apoplexy, which is, with great probability, ascribed to his indefatigable application to business. As soon as he was a little recovered, he went into Normandy, and caused a strong camp to be formed there of the new troops, for his diversion, and that he might examine at leisure many things that regarded military affairs with his own eyes, and be, for the future, less liable to impositions<sup>b</sup>. He removed from thence to Tours, where he had another stroke of an apoplexy, but less violent. He shewed that his parts were still sound, by his prudent management of the affairs of Savoy, where he did many things for the interest of the young prince Philebert, his nephew, by playing the great men in the country one against another, by which he limited the power of all. In the spring of the succeeding year, the duke, who was about seventeen, came to meet him at Grenoble, and went with him from thence to Lyons, where, being seized with a fever, he died. His brethren Charles and John, being educated in France, the king declared himself tutor to the former, and sent him to take possession of his dominions<sup>c</sup>. It was there he received an account of the death of the duchess of Burgundy, by a fall from her horse, which is said to have given him new spirits<sup>d</sup>. He had been for some time carrying on an underhand negotiation which the people of Ghent, which he managed with so much address, that by their assistance he compelled the archduke to consent to the marriage of his daughter Margaret with the dauphin, which treaty was signed on the 23d of December<sup>e</sup>; the news of which had such an effect on Edward the fourth of England, that he determined to break with Lewis as a false and perfidious prince<sup>f</sup>; but, before he was able to express his resentment otherwise than by words, an apoplexy<sup>g</sup>, or some other sudden disease (for authors speak very suspiciously), removed him out of the world, and delivered Lewis from the last enemy that he had to fear<sup>h</sup>. A circumstance highly favourable to him, as it left the house of Burgundy totally without resource.

Lewis retires to his palace of Plessis near Tours, in a low and languishing condition.

It may be truly said, that Lewis only wanted health to taste the pleasure of seeing his affairs in a much better situation than they had ever been during his reign. At home he had gradually increased his power at the expence of the nobility, and he could not well make a worse use of it than some of them did<sup>i</sup>. Abroad he had nothing to fear. Ferdinand and Isabella were very desirous of cultivating that friendship which he professed for them; and though he still held Roussillon and Cerdagne, he had nothing to fear from them as possessors of Arragon, the crown of Navarre being under his protection. The king of Portugal was his ally, and had an interest in being so. If he was not esteemed, he was at least respected in Italy, where they were as little in a condition to deceive as to disturb him. In England fresh disturbances were broke out on the death of king Edward. The power of the archduke was much circumscribed, and his force not a little broken by the king's conquests. He had many allies in the empire; and the Swiss were as much bound to his interests, and served him much more cordially than if they had been his subjects<sup>j</sup>. As a monarch, he might be truly said to have gained his ends, and to have been successful in his politicks: let us see what resulted from it with regard to himself. He retired to his country palace at Plessis, near Tours, which was walled and guarded, not as a fortress but as a prison, to which his jealous humour had confined him, and where he tormented himself as much as he had tormented others<sup>k</sup>. Few of the princes of the blood and great lords had access to him; and, when they had, they came singly, and with scarce any attendance. His strength decayed daily, death stared him in the face, and he never appeared more dreadful to the meanest malefactor. As he had dissembled other fears, he took every method to conceal this; he dressed better, he had concerts of music, and diversions that were some of them wild and ridiculous, such as the hunting of rats, and other whims of the same kind<sup>l</sup>. He ordered relicks to be brought him from all parts, and sent for Francis de Pauli, a reputed saint, out of Calabria, to pray for him. He had embassadors in every court of Europe, who were continually entering upon new negotiations; spies to manage private intrigues; and merchants to buy horses, dogs, rich furniture, curiosities, purely to discredit the rumours of his weak and dying condition<sup>m</sup>.

His son, the dauphin, was bred up at Amboise, under the care of Peter de Bourbon, count of Beaujeau, with equal severity and privacy. He was at this time turned of thirteen, and the king had scarce seen him for several years. He sent for him, however, when very weak, and repeated to him the advices which he had formerly given, and caused them to be registered by the parliament of Burgundy, and the chamber of accounts at Paris. His counsels (whatever his life was) were those of a wise and worthy prince, and consisted chiefly in dissuading him from following his example, more especially in the beginning of his reign, when he frankly acknowledged his errors had brought him within a hair's breadth of destruction. He conjured him to make use of those whose capacity and fidelity he recommended from experience; to love peace, and to live upon good terms with his neighbours; and lastly, to treat his subjects with justice and lenity. He suffered a third stroke of an apoplexy which he survived just a week. As soon as he recovered his senses a little, he ordered the chancellor to carry the seal to his son, whom from this time he called the king; he grew more composed and resigned, and gave some marks of compunction for those actions which dishonoured his reign, and will render his memory odious. He expired on the 30th of August, in the sixty-first year of his age, and twenty-third of his reign; he united to the crown, Burgundy by force of arms, though he would have it thought by right; Anjou, Maine, Bar, and Provence, as heir to Charles count du Maine; the best part of the county of Artois, and some great towns in Picardy, were the spoils of the house of Burgundy; the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne under pretence of a mortgage; and the county of Boulogne by purchase (E). He first used the title of Most Christian King constantly, which has since passed to his successors; and he seems likewise to have been the first French monarch treated with the title of Majesty, in addresses to him from foreigners, as well as his own subjects.

THE new king Charles the eighth was in law of age, as having entered his fourteenth year, but in reality a minor, having been bred up amongst the low and interior people about the court, not only without the advantages of learning, but of instructions of any kind, even those of conversation. This may seem to reflect on Peter de Bourbon, and the dame de Beaujeau, so the French historians call her, and so shall we for the future, more especially

(E) This prince was born in the archiepiscopal palace at Bourges, Saturday July the 3d, 1423 (1). The bishop of Laon baptized, and the duke of Alençon answered for him at the font. He was contracted at five years old to the princess Margaret of Scotland, whom he espoused at Tours on the 25th of June, 1436 (2). About three years after, he first openly departed from his duty to his father; but he had been an ill husband almost from the time he was married. The French historians acknowledge, and I use their words, that wit, judgment, heroic sentiment, and great good-nature, joined to a very lovely person, rendered this princess amiable (3). She was a great lover of learning, and gave this very whimsical proof of it; seeing one day Alain Chartier asleep, she gave him a kiss, and observing the people about her to stand in amaze, she said it was not the man she kissed, but the mouth that had uttered such fine discourses. It must be observed that he had the most wit and the least beauty of any man in France (4). Her high quality and her virtue did not exempt her from calumny; and, which was more strange, her innocence did not enable her to bear it; so that grief brought her to her end August the 26th, 1445 (5). She was buried in the cathedral church of Chalons; and, thirty-four years after, her husband caused her body to be carried to Tours, and buried there, in a chapel of her own founding (6). He married next Charlotte, daughter to Lewis duke of Savoy, for the sake of money, and when she was a child: he had never seen her, when he retired into Burgundy (7). He sent for her thither, and had a son Joachim born at Genep near Brussels; some say he declared him duke of Normandy, as soon as he was born; and that this irritated his father more than any thing he had done before; but this story seems to be ill founded. This prince died young, at which his father was so much afflicted, that he made a vow to have no commerce with any other woman than his wife, which he is said to have kept (8). He had by his queen, Charles, who succeeded him; Francis duke of Berry, who died under a year old; Louisa, who died young; Anne, who married Peter, lord of Beaujeu, who became afterwards duke of Bourbon. She was a princess of a high spirit and fine parts, governed France with great success and prudence, during the minority of her brother; but is said to have had an inclination for Lewis duke of Orleans, which turned afterwards to a mortal hatred, that proved highly detrimental to the kingdom (9). The youngest of his children was Joan, who married the duke of Orleans, and was divorced from him after he became king. As for the queen Charlotte of Savoy, after enduring the contempt, the humours, outrages, and infidelities of her husband all his life, and being condemned by him to exile on his death-bed, she did not live long enough to discern how her daughter would distinguish between the unjust command of a dying king, and the duty she owed to a good and pious mother, dying at Amboise, the place of her banishment, December the 1st, 1483, when but thirty-eight years of age (10). Besides these Lewis had several natural children by different mothers. He directed, in the most explicit manner, that his corpse should be interred at Our Lady of Cleri, for whom, as we have heard from Brantome, he had a very high veneration (11). A stately tomb was erected there to his memory, which was destroyed by the Hugonots, in 1562, who caused the remains of his body to be burnt, and the ashes to be scattered in the air (12).

since she was his sister. But, in reality, his father only was in fault; for it was in obedience <sup>a</sup> to his orders that he was thus educated, or rather, had no education<sup>k</sup>. The young king was, besides, deformed in his body, very infirm in his health; and, except in the vivacity of his eyes, had nothing princely or majestic about him. It was absolutely necessary that somebody should assist him in holding the reins of government, though the law would not permit that person to bear the stile of regent<sup>l</sup>. The great difficulty was to settle who this person should be. The deceased monarch, who was certainly the best judge, had named his daughter Anne of France, dame de Beaujeau, and not her husband, though he intended he should have an equal share of the government, because he foresaw that the princes of the blood, nearer the throne, might endeavour to dispossess him; whereas the dame de Beaujeau, being the king's sister, exempted her from any disputes of that kind, at least in his opinion<sup>m</sup>. <sup>b</sup> But the last honours were hardly paid to Lewis, before two princes of the blood formed pretensions to the administration; these were Lewis, duke of Orleans, active, affable, and amiable in all respects, but not above twenty-three years of age; and the duke of Bourbon, elder brother to the lord of Beaujeau, a prudent, grave, and much esteemed prince, of threescore years of age<sup>n</sup>. The dame de Beaujeau foresaw the disorders this might occasion, and therefore proposed an expedient that could not be rejected, that of leaving this point to be settled by an assembly of the states<sup>o</sup>. In the mean time all parties agreed to deliver up, if not the most criminal, at least the most odious, of the late king's ministers to the public resentment. These were Oliver le Daim, count of Meulan, once the king's barber, and at the time of his death his great confidant; and John Doiac, who had been also an <sup>c</sup> instrument of vengeance and oppression; the former was hanged for adultery and murder; the latter was whipped through the streets of Paris, and then had his right ear cut off, afterwards transferred into Auvergne, of which province he had been governor, and, at the village of Monferrand, the place of his nativity, he was whipped again, and lost his left ear<sup>p</sup>: but he kept his wealth, because it could not be discovered. James Cottier, or Cottier, Lewis's insolent physician, paid a large fine, as a small atonement for his manifold offences, and was suffered to possess his immense fortune (to enjoy it was impossible) in obscurity<sup>q</sup>.

The states assembled at Tours settle the administration, and give the king a large subsidy.

THE duke of Bretagne, who was entirely governed by his minister Peter Landais, was now much declined through age, which inspired the prince of Orange and marshal Rieux <sup>d</sup> with the design of seizing, and perhaps of putting to death, Landais, that they might govern in his room. But they missed their blow; for, though the minister was hated, the duke was beloved, and they were constrained to retire out of Bretagne<sup>r</sup>. Peter Landais found it necessary to have recourse to France for support. He sought it first from the dame de Beaujeau without effect; he then turned his eyes upon the duke of Orleans, who, upon his invitation, made a tour into Bretagne, accompanied by John count of Dunois and Longueville, the son of that great captain who had so effectually served the king's grandfather, and who was himself a person of great merit and abilities. He it was who inspired the duke with the thoughts of marrying Anne, the sole daughter and heiress of the duke of Bretagne, who, when he came to see her, inclination supplanted interest, insomuch that he became her passionate admirer<sup>s</sup>. The court, as it was natural, took umbrage at the duke's retreat, and <sup>e</sup> summoned him to attend the assembly of the states at Tours; to which, not without difficulty, the count of Dunois engaged him to repair. When he came thither he found that the dame de Beaujeau had been much too hard for him. She saw, that if any two parties joined against the third, they must prevail. She had already made some overtures to the duke, to no purpose; she then turned her eyes to the duke of Bourbon, knowing that the constable's sword was the great object of his ambition; and, therefore, she insinuated to him, that if he prevailed in obtaining the direction of affairs, he could not, with any decency, give it himself; but, in joining his party to her's, he might obtain it with honour<sup>t</sup>. This compromise disappointed the duke of Orleans; her authority was <sup>f</sup> confirmed by the states, in conjunction with a council, which they named; and every thing having passed with the utmost regularity, the states broke up, after giving the king two millions and a half, with an additional present of three hundred thousand livres for the expences of his coronation. So that the face of public affairs was entirely changed for the better, through the sagacity of this wise princess<sup>u</sup>.

An insurrection raised by the duke of Orleans, quelled by the

THE coronation was solemnized with all proper magnificence, about nine months after the king's accession. The duke of Orleans, finding nothing was to be done by intrigues, betook himself to arms, and many of the nobility and princes of the blood, particularly Renè, duke of Alençon, who with his father's title inherited too much of his temper, and the duke of a Bourbon, adhered to him. His chief dependence, however, was upon the duke of Bretagne, and he, or rather his minister, was as well disposed in his behalf as he could desire<sup>w</sup>. The dame de Beaujeau suspected this, and, which was more, found that the king himself was inclined to him. She managed things, however, with so much dexterity, as secured her success. She sent a person of a bold enterprising disposition to the duke of Bretagne, in the name of the duke of Orleans, to desire he would not march his troops into France till he demanded them, which disconcerted the duke of Orleans, who could not act for want of them; and removing at once from the king's person all who were in the interest of the duke, she put an escape out of his power, to which he otherwise inclined<sup>x</sup>.

The duke of Orleans went to Paris, and endeavoured to gain the parliament, but failed; A. D. 1484. b neither had he any greater success in his endeavour to seize Orleans, upon which he was obliged to make the best terms he could with the court; the hardest of which was, the banishment of the count of Dunois, who generously advised him to consent to it, as a thing necessary to his interest<sup>y</sup>. Peter Landais having first supported, intended afterwards to have sold, the earl of Richmond to king Richard the third of England; but, having had timely notice, he escaped, took refuge in France, and was enabled by the court to make that expedition which seated him on the English throne, by the title of Henry the seventh<sup>z</sup>.

THE most able and diligent of the French historians have found it extremely difficult, and indeed scarce practicable, to settle, in exact order of time, the progress of the intrigues which disturbed the beginning of this reign, and which must have infallibly thrown the nation into the utmost confusion, if the dame de Beaujeau had not, by her superior address, retained those restless spirits within bounds, which, in order to gratify their private resentments, or abuse a particular advantage, would have sacrificed the safety and the welfare of the public<sup>a</sup>. The consequence of those maxims which had prevailed in the late reign, were the sources of that fraud, violence, and disloyalty, which distressed the present. Except her husband, the governors had nobody to depend upon, farther than as she gratified them. René, duke of Lorraine, was amongst the first and the loudest of the malecontents. His pretensions ran very high, for he claimed no less than the whole succession of the house of Anjou. He was restored to the duchy of Bar, had a good pension given him, and a promise that his claim to the duchy of Provence should be examined and decided in four years<sup>b</sup>. This brought d him so thoroughly into the interests of the court, that before the war broke out, when the duke of Orleans gave the dame de Beaujeau the lye at the council table, the duke of Lorraine struck him on the face<sup>c</sup>. By his advice chiefly the war had been managed, and to this, in a great measure, was owing its success. Yet it was hardly over, before he grew out of humour again, and the constable de Bourbon was exactly in the same disposition; that is to say, after he had what he asked he thought it too little, and began to look for something more. This conduct in the great, had an influence also upon persons of less consideration, who valued their services very high, and, if not paid to their wish, forgot former favours and even their duty<sup>d</sup>. The dame de Beaujeau knew all this, but seemed to know nothing. The duke of Orleans was about the court, and, in appearance, easy and quiet. The truce e with Henry the seventh of England was ratified, and the intrigues of the Low Countries, of which the late king had made so good use, were still kept on foot, and answered the purposes of his daughter in the like manner<sup>e</sup>. In a word, there was a general appearance of tranquility, but nothing like it at bottom; all parties were contriving to revive the disturbances so lately suppressed, and it was not long before the smothered fire broke out.

IN Bretagne the enemies of the minister brought their designs to bear, and put Peter Landais to an infamous death, in spite of the duke, who at length suffered himself to be governed by the Sieur de Lescun and the prince of Orange, who were in a close correspondence with the court of France, not only till they thought it their interest to enter into the measure of the malecontents, but even afterwards pretending to discover those contrivances, in which they had as deep a concern as any; but the true value of their discoveries was well understood at court, and they only amused themselves, while they thought they were amusing others<sup>f</sup>. The duke of Orleans, when he had formed a new league, and had recalled the count of Dunois into France, retired into Bretagne, not doubting that he should now accomplish with ease those schemes in which he had been baffled before. There wanted not indeed great probability of this; the archduke, Maximilian, was actually in arms; the duke of Lorraine had entered into the league; the duke of Bourbon, the count d'Angoulême, and several other great lords, were actually engaged; and they had, in appearance, the whole force of Bretagne at their command<sup>g</sup>. It quickly appeared, however, that these signals of

A. D. 1486. success were but fallacious. The king fell with an army into Guienne, and stripped many of the malecontents of their employments and their estates. The count of Angoulême went to pay his respects to the king at Bourges, and submitted. The court taking some steps as if they had intended the restitution of Provence, the duke of Lorraine from being violent became neuter. The duke of Bourbon being convinced by his brother that he was not only acting against his duty, but the interest of his house, in adhering to the malecontents, quitted them<sup>b</sup>. The king marching his forces into Anjou, the nobility of Bretagne were alarmed, and a great part of them entered into a secret treaty with the court of France, to prevent their country from becoming the seat of war. Maximilian, become king of the Romans, made an irruption into the French territories with no great advantage, the king marching against him with a powerful army, while the troubles in Bretagne hindered the malecontents from taking any advantage of his absence<sup>i</sup>. The court was now so secure of the duke of Bourbon, that with his consent they arrested two of his friends, the lord Culant, and the famous Philip de Commines, who being convicted by his own letters of having held a correspondence with the duke of Orleans, was obliged to pass eight months in one of those iron cages which were of the late king's erection<sup>k</sup>.

The king invades Bretagne and brings the duke into great danger and distress.

THE lord of Albret was of the number of those who had signed the league, and he had a considerable force at his command; but he was in his own domains, which lay at so great a distance, and had so many provinces to traverse, that it seemed unreasonable, even to the malecontents, to press him<sup>l</sup>. Their own necessities, however, silenced all scruples; and, that he might raise none, they made him believe that he should marry the duke's eldest daughter upon his arrival; for the duke of Bretagne was now in the same circumstances that the duke of Burgundy had been in; that is, he placed all his dependence in an army of sons-in-law. But the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange, who made these overtures to Albret, were most culpable; for the former, though married to the late king Lewis's daughter, aimed at this match for himself; and the prince was secretly negotiating for the king of the Romans<sup>m</sup>. The lord of Albret was so much struck with this proposal, that he not only undertook to march in spite of all the obstacles that lay in his way, but also to bring over the corps which he had in the king's army, and actually in his pay. While he was labouring this point, Charles the eighth advanced in the month of May into Bretagne, and supposing that the necessity of his affairs released him from the letter of the treaty he had made with the lords of Bretagne, instead of an army of four hundred lances and four thousand infantry, as had been stipulated, he entered with three, or, some say, four bodies of troops, each of them of greater strength<sup>n</sup>. The first took Ploermell, the second Vannes, out of which the old duke, Francis II. luckily made his escape; for, though he had at first an army of eighteen thousand good troops, yet the best part of them were taken from him by an artifice. For Maurice du Menez, a Breton by birth, but who had been formerly in the service of France, gave out that the quarrel between the princes and the king was a farce concerted between them; and that the French in the duke's army meant to deliver him up to their master. Upon hearing this tale, three fourths of the army deserted. The third army reduced Dinant; and the fourth, which was indeed composed by the conjunction of the other three, besieged Nantes<sup>o</sup>. The duke, in this distress, sent the count of Dunois to solicit relief from king Henry of England; but, being three or four times put back by contrary winds, he was so alarmed at the danger of the duke and of the princes with him, that he raised the militia of Lower Bretagne, to the number of sixty thousand men, and conducted his affairs so ably, that he first relieved the city, and afterwards obliged the French to raise the siege<sup>p</sup>. The king, notwithstanding, put his troops into winter quarters in Bretagne. He had the like success in Guienne, where the lord of Albret was forced to disarm and submit; and in Picardy, where the troops of the king of the Romans were beaten, and the town of St. Omers taken<sup>q</sup>. The lords of Bretagne, who had closed with France, seeing the danger that himself and his dominions were in, reconciled themselves to their duke, and at the same time began a pretended negotiation with the dame de Beaujeau, who saw through it, and cheated them who intended to cheat her; for, being aware of their real intentions, she gave them such answers as misled them extremely<sup>r</sup>.

The French gain the victory of St. Aubin, in which the duke of Orleans and prince of Orange are made prisoners.

THE necessary preparations were made for opening the campaign very early, when the plenipotentiaries imagined the court, upon their fallacious propositions, would have opened conferences: finding their mistake, the count de Commines, who was at the head of the embassy, took his leave, and marshal Rieux, who had attended the king on behalf of the lords of his party in Bretagne, withdrew privately, put himself at the head of the troops of his old master, and recovered several places that had been taken by the French<sup>s</sup>. - a of Albret also, whom the king had pardoned, arrived in Bretagne by sea, and brought with him four thousand men. His company of Gens d'Arms, also in the king's army, revolted, and joined them. But these little successes were much qualified by the king's troops under la Trimouille being in the field before they expected them, and by another event which they did not expect at all, which was, the citing the duke of Orleans, the counts of Dunois and Comminges, Philip de Commines, and several others, to appear before the parliament; by which it was evident the king intended to treat them as rebels<sup>1</sup>. The French army began with the siege of Fougeres, a very strong place, well provided, with a good garrison, which it was imagined would make a long defence; but the French artillery, excellent for those days, reduced it in a week. This loss was followed by that of the fortrefs of St. Aubin du Cormier, upon which the Bretons and the malecontents took a resolution to fight<sup>2</sup>. This decisive engagement happened on Monday, the 28th of July. The first line was commanded by the marshal de Rieux and the lord of Albret; in the second there was a small corps under the command of lord Scales, with twelve hundred Bretons under the red cross of St. George, that they might be taken for English. There was also a body of German auxiliaries sent to the king of the Romans<sup>3</sup>. As the whole army had entertained great jealousy of them, the prince of Orange put himself at the head of the Breton infantry, as the duke of Orleans did at the head of the Germans, both on foot. The armies were very near equal, each about twelve thousand strong<sup>4</sup>. The French were superior in horse; and the Breton cavalry behaved ill; their foot fought gallantly, till, being attacked in flank and rear, they were broke; five thousand five hundred men were killed on the spot, the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange taken, and the victory as complete in all respects as could be desired<sup>5</sup>. The two princes were carried to St. Aubin, where the general la Trimouille invited them to supper, which passed very well, but had an untoward desert; since, just as it was over, came in two Cordeliers, who told the general, that, according to his orders, they were come to confess the prisoners. The duke and the prince looked upon each other, supposing they had not long to live. The general relieved them, by saying, that he should expect the orders of the court in regard to them; but that he had, by his own authority, ordered some gentlemen, who were taken in arms against the king, to be beheaded<sup>6</sup>. The duke of Bretagne was so humbled by this defeat, that he was forced to have recourse to submission, and to make such a treaty as the king was pleased to admit, which was concluded on the 28th of August at Sable; and, on the 9th of September, this unfortunate prince died of a fall from his horse, leaving his two daughters, Anne and Isabell, to the care of the marshal de Rieux and the count de Comminges, by his will, charging them to be guided by the advice of the count of Dunois<sup>7</sup>. A civil war had broke out in the Low Countries, in which the people of Ghent, by the assistance of the French, had taken the king of the Romans prisoner, and did not release him, but upon hard terms, and in consideration of a high ransom<sup>8</sup>. The duke of Bourbon being dead, his brother, the lord of Beaujeau, succeeded to that title; and, therefore, for the future, we are to stile his consort duchess of Bourbon<sup>9</sup>.

- THE affairs of Bretagne were now in such confusion, that there was no way left to preserve Henry VII. the whole country from being conquered, but to apply to Henry the seventh of England. He was indeed deeply interest in the preservation of that important sovereignty; but his politics were so refined, that he did not see the full extent of its danger. The people of England did, and how much it imported them to save it; and, therefore, they forced the king to conclude a treaty with the young duchess, and to send over six thousand men to her assistance<sup>10</sup>. But the main point of all was the marriage. Her father had made very strong promises to the lord of Albret, who commanded in Nantes with a great corps of troops, and the marshal Rieux, who took upon him to act as her guardian, was, in earnest, desirous that it should take place. The chancellor of Bretagne, who was against it, had her confidence; and, besides, the princess, who was but in her thirteenth year, had the utmost repugnance to a marriage with a man of forty-five, of a very indifferent person, hasty in his temper, whose estates were not very considerable, and who had three sons and four daughters by a former wife<sup>11</sup>. This was not all, the father had likewise, from a principle before-mentioned, concluded with the prince of Orange a marriage for his daughter with Maximilian, king of the Romans, in whose interest the chancellor was. There was a great disproportion in their age, but the king had a good person, and was reported to be of an easy temper; withal he was very indolent, and his finances were in great disorder: king Charles was looked upon as his son-in-law, the princess Margaret being bred up in France, agreeable to the treaty concluded with the king his father; and it was upon this that Henry of England chiefly depended<sup>12</sup>.

Charles encouraged these notions, when, after treating with Maximilian at Frankfort, he offered to submit to him the disputes in Bretagne, provided the duchess would do the like; and, by this means, a kind of a treaty of pacification was concluded, by which the English were obliged to return, and the king to restore the greatest part of his conquests. All parties seemed pleased with this treaty, which none of them intended to keep, because it kept things quiet for the present, and gained time, which they all of them wanted<sup>5</sup>. Each conceived that his view was a secret to the other party, and took his measures, while the calm lasted, for the storm which was to ensue.

The king releases the prince of Orange, and sends him into Bretagne, where he does great service.

A. D. 1490.

CHARLES, by the advice of the duke and duchess of Bourbon, released John de Chalon, prince of Orange, and sent him back into Bretagne, where he had a great interest, and where, out of gratitude, he did the king much service. The young duchess, in her perplexed circumstances, trusting to the advice of her chancellor, and being dazzled with the founding titles of Maximilian, consented to espouse him; and sent over the prince of Orange, with other ambassadors, to press king Henry to act with vigour in support of a princess, whose father had protected him when yet in deeper distress<sup>b</sup>. The lord of Albret, perceiving that he had no hopes left, by an unaccountable mixture of resentment and loyalty, reconciled himself to the king, and contributed to put the rich city of Nantes into his hands<sup>c</sup>. In the mean time Henry acted in a very ambiguous manner; for the Flemings being again broke out in rebellion against Maximilian, and being supported by the French, he sent assistance to the king of the Romans, and entered into an alliance with him, with the emperor his father, and with Ferdinand, king of Castile and Arragon, against France; but at the same time he treated with Charles, demanding first the kingdom of France, next the duchies of Guienne and Normandy, and lastly, the arrear of the pension due by the treaty of Pequigny, which amounted to a very considerable sum, and which was his real object<sup>k</sup>. The passion this monarch had for money, was but too visible in all his actions and negotiations.

Goes in person to Bourges to release the duke of Orleans, who in gratitude negotiates the king's marriage with the heiress of Bretagne.

THE king, perceiving now in what manner Henry might be pacified, having little fear of the king of the Romans, and believing the acquisition of Bretagne was worth running some hazard, resolved to push things to the utmost; and, with this view, directed the count de Dunois and the prince of Orange to negotiate his marriage with the duchess of Bretagne, at the same time that his troops besieged her in the city of Rennes<sup>l</sup>. The king's agents in vain represented to the duchess, that the king was young, a great prince, and who had plausible pretensions to her whole dominions, grounded on the cessions made to his father by the last heirs of the count of Pentbievre, to whom, in case of the failure of heirs male, the duchy was to descend; his claim of forfeiture, upon the charge of felony, depending in parliament against her father, and the right he might pretend to Bretagne, as a fief reverting to the crown on the extinction of the male line. To this the duchess opposed her marriage to Maximilian, which had been notified to her allies, had been publicly proclaimed, and his name joined with her's in acts of government; to which she added, that Charles himself was contracted to the princess Margaret, daughter to her husband Maximilian, which had been as publicly acknowledged; so that these seemed insuperable bars to a marriage, which must, in other respects, be very contrary to her inclinations, since she had been always bred up in an aversion to France, and had no reasons whatever to combat that aversion in favour of this monarch<sup>m</sup>. To this it was replied, that Maximilian had himself deserted her, at a time when he ought to have hazarded all things for her service; and that, probably, if she neglected it, he might make his peace at her expence. That the king's contract was no marriage; and that being made purely upon reasons of state, it might, from the like reasons, be dissolved, and a dispensation for that purpose be procured from Rome<sup>n</sup>. The duchess not yielding to these arguments, the king was advised to set the duke of Orleans at liberty, and to make use of his interest; but to this, though the match was of her own proposing, the duchess of Bourbon would by no means consent. The Sieur de Miolans, the king's favourite, told him, that he was now of an age to govern himself; that his own ease and the peace of his dominions depended upon his thorough reconciliation with the duke of Orleans; and that he might secure this, by making that prince's grace depend solely on himself<sup>o</sup>. Charles, wrought upon by these solicitations, went to the tower of Bourges, where the duke of Orleans was confined, and, after a short conference with him, set him at liberty, and sent him into Bretagne, where he very quickly performed all that was expected from him; and, though he had been the best received of all the pretenders to the duchess, prevailed upon her to lay aside all her scruples, and to consent to the marriage, which was entirely regulated by the middle of the month of December, at Langeais in Touraine, and celebrated the same day the contract was signed<sup>p</sup>.

- a THIS marriage astonished all Europe, and seemed to excite such a jealousy in its principal potentates against Charles, as was like to prove fatal to France. Maximilian exclaimed against the ambition and falshood of a prince, who had quitted his own wife to seize the wife of his father-in-law. Henry, who saw himself outwitted, was really angry, and shewed it so plainly, that he obtained a great supply from his parliament, and great sums from his people, for the invasion of France<sup>a</sup>. Ferdinand the Catholic repeated his claim to Roussillon and Cerdagne; and at the same time assembled troops on the frontiers of Arragon. Charles continued at Tours with a considerable army about him, but without discovering any great emotion, or making any extraordinary preparations for repelling the confederates. The archduke Philip had demanded his sister, but the king refused to part with her.
- b Maximilian found means to surprize St. Omers and Arras, and his troops found a passage into Amiens; but, by the spirit and fidelity of the inhabitants, were driven out again. In the operations of this campaign, the king of the Romans was assisted by an English fleet<sup>c</sup>. In the autumn, Henry debarked in France one of the finest and best appointed A. D. 1492. Boulogne: he knew very well that Maximilian could not, and that Ferdinand would not, execute the treaties they had made with him for invading France; and he foresaw this at the time he made them. He conducted this siege in such a manner, as to make it very fatiguing to his troops; and all the time was treating with Charles, with whom he concluded the famous treaty of Estaples, which may be esteemed a master-piece of policy in both kings<sup>d</sup>. Having finished the war upon the very plan he proposed by it, Henry returned well satisfied into England, and left Charles very well pleased. Maximilian, unable to continue the war, and unwilling to conclude a peace, suffered his son, the archduke Philip, to make a truce for a year<sup>e</sup>. It is generally reported by the French writers, that Ferdinand over-reached Charles in the settling their dispute. His agent at the court of France was a Cordelier, who is said to have influenced Oliver Maillard, the king's confessor, and John Mauleon, who acted in the same capacity to the dukes of Bourbon, both monks of his own order, by presents of Spanish wine of a very rich favour; that is, considerable sums of ready gold put up in casks<sup>f</sup>. These reverend fathers, thus intrusted, persuaded the king and the dukes, that nothing troubled their father Lewis so much on his death-bed, as the great injustice he had committed in retaining the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne; and that, dying in a disposition to restore them, his soul suffered incredible pains till this was accomplished: in consequence of which, the king consented to the restitution of those two counties, on the repayment of three hundred thousand crowns; and afterwards freely remitted that sum on the faith of Ferdinand's promise not to make war on France, or to support any of his allies with whom France should be at war: in all probability, this promise was the great object the king had in view, in a generosity for which he is universally condemned by all political historians<sup>g</sup>.

- AFTER so many treaties concluded, on purpose to leave France without enemies from old quarrels when she was about to embark in new, it is no wonder that Charles inclined to adjust his disputes with the house of Austria, and he accordingly did this by the treaty of Senlis, concluded with the archduke Philip; by which it was agreed, that the princess Margaret should be restored to her family, with all her fortune and jewels; and that the counties of Burgundy, Artois, and Auxerre, a few places only excepted, should be likewise restored, as they were yielded to France in consideration of her marriage. Henry the seventh of England desired to be, and was accordingly, included, as the ally of both parties<sup>h</sup>. The view of all these negotiations, censured by some writers, and justified by others, was to put it in the young king's power to vindicate his title to the crown of Naples, supposed to descend to him from the second house of Anjou, which ended in Charles count of Maine, and in virtue of whose will the county of Provence had been annexed to the crown<sup>i</sup>. This had been long in the king's mind, though he sometimes disguised it, under a pretence of making war against the Turks. It is very certain that this project was disliked by the wisest and ablest heads in the French council, who urged, that the king had not money, troops, officers, or statesmen, in any degree adequate to such a design: but he had those about him who represented it as very easy, and to these he listened. They were chiefly Stephen de Vers, his valet de chambre, the son of a taylor of Dauphine; and William Brissonnet, the son of an under officer in the revenue, who, by his own favour, had been raised to the management of the finances; men of very limited capacities, and whose abilities were only known to, and confided in, by the king<sup>j</sup>. The true secret was, that Lewis Sforza, furnished the Moor, aimed at the entire possession of the duchy of Milan, which he governed already in the name of his nephew John Galeas, son to his elder brother, whom he kept a kind of prisoner; but, being married to the daughter of Alonso, duke of Calabria, a princess of great wisdom and spirit, he durst not depose and murder him, as he intended, 'till the affairs of Italy should be so embarrassed as to leave nothing to fear from the king of Naples; and this it was that induced him to call in Charles. But it is not possible to say what it was that induced this prince to engage in such an enterprize, on a right not the most clear, with few troops, less treasure, and no allies<sup>a</sup>, unless Lodovic Sforza, the administrator of Milan, might be considered in that light, and he was such an ally as no other prince would trust. Alexander the sixth then occupied the see of Rome, of whom the Italians, who speak respectfully of popes, say, that he was without faith, without mercy, and without religion<sup>b</sup>. Ferdinand, king of Naples, had a bad character; his son Alonso, duke of Calabria, an indifferent one; and his grandson, Ferdinand, the best of all. The republic of Florence was governed by Peter de Medicis, whom the people hated; and that of Genoa subject to the administration of Milan, who had done homage for it to Charles himself.

Almost as soon as he joins his forces, he falls ill of the small-pox, and is constrained to stay at Aix.

THE king having, by the advice of his favourites, rejected the proposition made by Ferdinand, king of Naples, who offered to do him homage for that kingdom, and to pay him a tribute of fifty thousand crowns a year, and who died soon after, either of an apoplexy or of grief<sup>c</sup>, prepared for a war; all the honour and profit that could be hoped from which, he might have enjoyed without stirring from home. He appointed Peter, duke of Bourbon, regent, in his absence; and setting out from Paris, proceeded in the month of July to Lyons; after some stay there, he went to Grenoble; he repaired from thence to Aix, the capital of a small country, where he staid a month, while, with incredible labour and difficulty, his artillery passed the mountains: there he fell ill of the small-pox, which alarmed his subjects, and gave leisure and hopes to his enemies<sup>d</sup>. The most bitter of these was the pope, who, having already applied himself without effect to most of the princes in Europe, at length depended on the Turkish sultan Bajazet, with whom he entered into a close alliance, receiving an annual subsidy for keeping his brother Zizime in prison, and having a promise of three hundred thousand ducats, whenever he should think proper to earn it, by putting him to death<sup>e</sup>; and from him he expected, in virtue, as is said, of a treaty, a numerous body of troops. But, in the mean time, Andrew Palæologus, despot of Romania, the sole heir of the emperor his uncle, made a resignation at Rome of all his rights to the empire of Constantinople, but without the pope's knowledge, to Charles the eighth.

He proceeds to Pavia, enters the city of Florence, and afterwards Rome in triumph.

As soon as he recovered, his forces began to defile into Italy, consisting in the whole of about six thousand horse, and twelve thousand foot, one half of whom were Swiss. His naval force was commanded by the duke of Orleans, who defeated Frederic, brother to Don Alonso, king of Naples, at Rapalo; and Robert Stuart, lord of D'Aubigny, who commanded the van-guard of his forces, hindered Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, from entering Romagna<sup>f</sup>. By that time the king arrived at Turin he had no money, which obliged him to borrow the jewels of the duchess of Savoy; and at Cassel, the marchioness of Montferrat did him the like favour; upon these he raised twenty-four thousand ducats, which enabled him to proceed to Pavia, where he found the young duke of Milan dying of poison; and there Lodovic Sforza left Charles to go and take possession of the duchy, though the young duke had left a son<sup>g</sup>. The few wise heads in Charles's councils, advised him to punish that unnatural uncle, and to take winter quarters in the Milanese, without pretending to traverse Italy with a handful of troops, and destitute of money<sup>h</sup>. Stephen de Vers prevailed upon him to reject this advice, and to march into the territory of Florence, all places opening their gates, and his good fortune procuring him a loan from Peter de Medicis of 200,000 crowns. On the 17th of November he entered Florence in triumph<sup>i</sup>. To Sienna and Pisa he restored liberty. Having prescribed such terms to the Florentines as his circumstances required, and under which their situation obliged them to acquiesce, he proceeded to Rome, and the pope having shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo, the king, armed at all points, entered Rome as a conqueror, at the head of his army, by torch-light, on the last night of the year<sup>k</sup>, and did several acts of sovereignty there.

He marches on to Naples, and makes his public entry in imperial robes.

THE cardinals, who had any regard for justice and religion, pressed the king to force the castle, and to depose the pope; but he was diverted from this by William de Brissonnet, now become an ecclesiastic, and bishop of St. Malo, who, for this, received a cardinal's hat<sup>l</sup>. The pope, however, was compelled to make a treaty, by which he put several strong places into the king's hand, gave him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, yielded his son

- a Cæsar Borgia as an hostage, and delivered up the Turkish prince Zizime, who is said to have been poisoned, and who certainly died soon after<sup>m</sup>. Towards the close of January, the king began his march for Naples. King Alonso had resigned the crown to his son Ferdinand, who was unable to make any opposition; so that on the 22d of February, the king entered Naples, as he had done Rome, in triumph, and some time after in the manner, but in imperial robes, and was there saluted emperor<sup>n</sup>. He might have been so in effect, if the pope had not betrayed the intelligence he had in Greece to Bajazet; for which many thousand Christians lost their lives. Thus, in six weeks, he traversed Italy, and in a fortnight became master (we cannot say conqueror) of the kingdom of Naples<sup>o</sup>, Brindisi excepted. His fortune had been hitherto without impeachment, and without example; insomuch that many looked on him as an instrument of God, raised up to dethrone and destroy the execrable tyrants in Italy, which, if he had assumed that character, he might certainly have done, and carried his glory as high as that of any hero of antiquity. His behaviour, however, was of a very different nature; for he amused himself with feasts and shews; and leaving his power or authority, at the rates which they imposed<sup>p</sup>. Gilbret, count of Montpensier, was declared viceroy; the lord of D'Aubigny, constable of the kingdom; Stephen Vers had the duchy of Nola for his share; and the whole force he proposed to leave in his new acquired kingdom consisted but of four thousand men<sup>q</sup>.

- But while the king was losing his time, his enemies were far from losing theirs. A league was concluded at Venice against him, into which entered the pope, the emperor, Maximilian, the archduke Philip, Ferdinand the Catholic, Lodowic Sforza, and the Venetians. He had intelligence of this from Philip de Commynes, his minister at Venice; but he could scarce believe it. The confederates assembled an army of forty thousand men, commanded by Francis, marquis of Mantua, and they waited for the king in the valley of Fornova, into which he descended with nine thousand men. On the sixth of July he attacked that mighty army, and defeated them, with the loss only of fourscore men, after which he marched with great diligence to Asti<sup>r</sup>. From thence, after some stay, he marched to disengage the duke of Orleans, who was besieged in Novara, by Lodowic Sforza, and the army of the allies; but, before he arrived, the duke had capitulated, and had leave to join the king with his half-starved garrison<sup>s</sup>. Under these circumstances he was joined by sixteen thousand Swiss, which enabled him once more to give law. But, having made a treaty with Lodowic Sforza, by which he obtained Novara and the port of Spezzia, together with a large sum of money for himself, and another for the duke of Orleans, and a promise to send succours to Naples, he set out immediately for Lyons<sup>t</sup>. Ferdinand, being assisted with Spanish troops under the command of Gonsalez de Cordova, surnamed the Great Captain, recovered his kingdom almost as soon as he had lost it, notwithstanding a victory gained by the constable D'Aubigny<sup>u</sup>; and thus those mighty conquests, so rapidly gained, served only to amaze the world for a few months, and to exercise the talents of some great writers, who have described all the passages of these wonderful turns of fortune with great exactness, as the reader will see in other parts of this work, to which they properly belong; our design, at present, being no more than to represent them briefly, as inseparable from the history of this monarch; who, at his return into his own dominions, abandoned himself to those pastimes and pleasures which had been the bane of that expedition, that had otherwise placed him in a point of light, equal at least, if not superior, to any of his predecessors, since the days of Charlemagne.

- His favourite Stephen de Vers, to whom he had given the duchy of Nola, found means to return into France, and earnestly persuaded the king to resume the conquest of Naples; he shewed him that he had many friends in Italy, by whom he might be assisted with whatever he wanted, without putting his own dominions to any great expence; that the Florentines would furnish money, the Swiss troops; that doing justice upon tyrants, and setting the great cities at liberty, would secure his passage and facilitate his conquests. The king listened to this advice, in which there was a great deal of truth, raised forces, and made dispositions, as if he intended to repass the mountains. But the cardinal of St. Malo, who had been the prime author of the first war, was against these measures, being now, as most authors say, entirely in the interest of the pope<sup>v</sup>. The duke of Orleans refused the command of the army, perceiving that the king's health declined, and that consequently his interest lay in being near the court, which defeated the expedition<sup>w</sup>. The French, in the kingdom of Naples, who had shut themselves up in such fortresses as were still in their power, were gradually compelled to capitulate. The count of Montpensier was shut up in Astella, where he was at last forced to submit to a composition upon very hard terms, and died afterwards of the plague at Puzzoli<sup>2</sup>. The constable D'Aubigny threw himself into Gropoli, where he made a glorious defence, and surrendered at last upon honourable terms, by which he was permitted to march out with all his forces, drums beating, and colours flying; but this was the last effort; and the new king of Naples, Frederic; who had succeeded his nephew, A. D. 1496. swept the rest of the garrisons with ease<sup>3</sup>. The Pisans, whom the king had restored to liberty, and who had erected his statue on the ruins of the monument, framed by the Florentines, to express their dominion, on the arrival of the emperor Maximilian, overthrew the king's statue to set up his. A circumstance slight in itself, but which may be regarded, as expressing the temper of the Italians in those days, who, being exceedingly enriched by trade, became proud, luxurious, and false; incapable of preserving liberty, or of submitting even to the mildest government<sup>b</sup>. Some have believed the miseries they were exposed to judgments from heaven (F).

(F) It was a prevailing opinion in his time, that there was something supernatural in his expedition into and return out of Italy. The principal cause of this was the positive assertion of friar Ferom Savonarella, who assumed the character of a prophet. Philip de Commines, who knew him well, and was himself no superstitious person, seems to have believed it; the passage is curious, has a strict relation to our history, and may therefore be acceptable to the reader. Our author, speaking of a visit he made to him, proceeds thus (1): "The reason of my going to see him was, that he had always preached zealously in favour of the king, and his speeches had restrained the Florentines from turning against us; for no preacher had ever so great credit in any city. He had constantly affirmed that the king would come, whatever was said or written to the contrary, declaring that he was sent by God to chastise the tyrants of Italy; and nothing could oppose or defend itself against him. He had also said, that he would come to Pisa, and enter that city, and the same day the state of Florence would be extinguished: and so it happened; for Peter de Medicis was driven out the same day: and he foretold many other things in his sermons before they happened; as the death of Laurence de Medicis; and he declared publicly that he had this by revelation, and preached that the state of the church would be reformed by the sword. This is not yet come to pass; but it was very near it, and he still maintains it. Several blamed him for saying God revealed things to him; others gave credit to him. For my part, I think him an honest man; and I asked him whether the king might pass without danger of his person, considering the great body of men raised by the Venetians, of which he could give a better account than I, since he was just come from Venice. He answered, that his majesty would meet with some obstacles in the way; but that he would come off with honour, though he had not above an hundred men attending him; and that God, who had conducted him thither, would conduct him back again; but, because he had not acquitted himself well in the reformation of the church, as he ought to have done, and had suffered his soldiers to pillage and plunder the people, as well those of his own party, who had voluntarily opened their gates to him, as his enemies, God had given sentence against him; and, in short, he should be scourged; but, that I should tell him, that if he would shew pity to the people, and take measures to prevent his soldiers from doing mischief, and punish them when they did so, as his office required, God would recall his sentence, or abate of the severity of it; and that he should not think to excuse himself, by saying, I do no harm. He told me, that he would go himself to meet the king, and speak to him; and so he did, and talked to him of the restitution of the places belonging to the Florentines. I thought of the death of the dauphin, when he mentioned to me that sentence of God; for I saw nothing else that the king could take to heart; and I remark this again, in order to shew more clearly that this whole journey was a real mystery of God." In another place, speaking of the death of this dominican, he adds (2), "Friar Ferom, who foretold many things before they came to pass, had constantly affirmed the king would pass the Alps, and preached this publicly, declaring that it was revealed to him by God, as well as other things, which he mentioned; and he said that the king was chosen by God to reform the church by force, and chastise tyrants: and because he asserted that he knew these things by revelation, many people murmured against him; and he exposed himself to the hatred of the pope, and a great number of persons in the city of Florence. His life was extremely remarkable for its innocency and purity, as was evident; and his sermons were directed against vice; and he brought many people in that city to reform their manners, as I have observed. He always preached publicly that the king would return again to Italy, to execute the commission given him by God, which was to reform the church by the sword, and to drive the tyrants out of Italy; and that in case he did not perform this, God would severely punish him. All his first sermons, and those preached then, were printed by him and sold. With regard to the severe punishment which he declared that God would inflict on the king if he did not return, he wrote concerning it several times to the king a little before his death, and so Ferom told me with his own mouth, when I spoke to him (upon our return to Italy), and assured me that the sentence was given out in heaven against the king, in case he did not execute what God had appointed, and prevent his soldiers from plundering." It is true, that thro' the hatred of the pope Alexander the sixth, the rage of some of his countrymen, and the fickleness of the rest, Friar Ferom Savonarella, with two of his disciples, suffered a violent and an infamous death, as heretics and impostors; and it is farther true, that the ministers of the inquisition, by whose judgment they suffered, published, in the name of Friar Ferom, confessions, importing, that, from principles of pride and ambition, he had deluded the people with false prophecies, and that he never had any revelations (3). But then we are to consider first, that those who published these confessions were very deeply interested in proving him an heretic and impostor; and next, that they themselves acknowledged that these confessions were extorted by the violence of torture. To all this we may oppose the clearest testimony, that he died with heroic constancy; that he affirmed the truth of the doctrines he had a THE king, under colour of attending the affairs of Italy, resided chiefly in the southern parts of his dominions, amusing himself with tournaments, and such kind of shews as carried with them a kind of military magnificence, and gave him, at the same time, an opportunity of paying court to the fair sex<sup>c</sup>. His greatest weakness was his attachment to women, into which he was drawn by the bad example of some of his courtiers, and by the artifice of others, that they might govern him the more easily. This turn to pleasure was alike fatal to his affairs and to his health. When he had formed a design of passing a second time into Italy, and had advanced with that view to the very frontiers of his dominions, he made a short turn, and came back to Tours, on the score of an amour he had commenced with one of the queen's maids of honour<sup>d</sup>. This mutability of his temper, and continual fluctuation of measures, must have been fatal to his government, if any of his neighbours had been potent enough to have turned it to their advantage. Ferdinand the Catholic, indeed, made an irruption on the side of Arragon; but his troops were repulsed with some loss, and he thought fit thereupon to enter into a negotiation, by which all disputes between the two crowns were compromised<sup>e</sup>. This monarch, Charles VIII. had once an intention to have united the parliament of Dijon, which was the supreme court of justice in Burgundy, to that of Paris; but the parliament prudently deputed Sir Philip Pot to lay before him the numerous inconveniences with which this step would be attended; upon which the king revoked the edict, and left things as he found them. His whole administration was of this nature, being easily drawn into wrong measures, but more easily set right; and, his intentions being always just, he commonly corrected his faults as soon as he discovered them<sup>f</sup>.

The failings of Charles VIII. and their influence on the administration of the affairs of the kingdom.

A. D. 1497.

As the king found his health decay, he changed his sentiments and his manner of acting entirely, he quitted his pleasures, and spent but a small part of his time in the most innocent amusements. He had a great affection for the castle of Amboise, in which he had been brought up, and endeavoured, by various alterations, and the addition of many ornaments, to render a stately palace, a place that had rather the air of a prison<sup>g</sup>. He meditated an entire reformation of the state, and resolved to begin with his domestic affairs. He made some excellent regulations in regard to the administration of justice, and erected the great council which has subsisted ever since<sup>h</sup>. He recalled several old servants that had been placed about him by the duke and duchess of Bourbon, being convinced of their integrity, and that all things had been extremely well managed while they were at the head of affairs. But he could never conquer the dislike he had conceived against the duke of Orleans, for ruining the first expedition into Italy, by endeavouring to make himself master of the duchy of Milan (to which he had a just claim), instead of marching to his assistance<sup>i</sup>; his rendering the second expedition abortive, by refusing the command; and his appearing with a remarkable air of gaiety at court upon the death of the dauphin. The duke being sensible of this, and knowing that the people of Normandy, of which province he was governor, had made complaints of him to the king, he retired to Blois, where he lived in a kind of voluntary exile<sup>k</sup>. Charles was also inclined to relieve his subjects from that multiplicity of taxes, under which they laboured; to reduce the expences of his government within the revenue arising from his domain; to lessen the taille to twelve hundred thousand livres, and to levy no extraordinary impositions upon his subjects, but by consent of the states. His people lost the fruit of these admirable resolutions by his sudden death<sup>l</sup>. On the sixth of April he led the queen into a gallery of the castle, to look upon some of his lords, who were exercising themselves at ball below, and struck his head with some violence against the door of the gallery, which did not hinder his going in and staying some time, 'till being seized at once with a stroke of an apoplexy<sup>m</sup>, he fell down, and being laid on a miserable couch that happened to be there, breathed his last about eleven at night (G). Some suspicion there were of poison preached, and the revelations he had published, with his last breath (4); that his heresies consisted only in such tenets as have been since held by protestants; that many wise and good men amongst the Romanists own he was unjustly put to death, being a pious, prudent, and good man (5); and that the protestants have always reproached the papists with his murder (6); and that the most judicious of the French historians, ancient and modern (7), particularly Mexzeray, who styles him the generous victim of truth and liberty (8), have considered him as a true prophet (9).

(G) This prince was born in the castle of Amboise, June 30, 1470. Charles of Bourbon, archbishop of Lyons, and Jane of France, duchess of Bourbon, answered for him at the font (1). Yet some historians have mentioned a popular report, that he was not the poison supposed to have been given him in Italy, while others have attributed his long malady and sudden death to his harrassing a weak constitution in pursuits of pleasure, till it was wholly exhausted. He died, exceedingly lamented, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, and in the fifteenth year of his reign; and in him ended the direct line of Philip de Valois<sup>n</sup>.

issue of the body of Lewis the eleventh; but that, from a principle of policy, and that he might reign with greater security, he imposed this child (2) upon the people, which, however, is highly improbable. He had nothing pleasing about his person except his eyes, and discovered no great abilities, which might, however, be very well ascribed to his total want of education; for, that he did not want parts is very apparent. He was kept pretty strict by his sister, the dame de Beaujeau, who had much of her father's parts and temper, and who governed with great capacity in his name, though at his accession she was but twenty-two years of age. He was quickly weary of the strictness of her tutelage; and, by the advice of George D'Amboise, bishop of Montauban, cardinal and prime minister in the next reign, would have made his escape, in order to have gone to the duke of Orleans; but the person intrusted with the letter, to make his own fortune, betrayed them all (3). The situation of public affairs obliged the dame de Beaujeau to make much use of the king's person, as well as of his name; and this made it necessary to bring him into the council, and to accustom him to feats of arms. He was naturally inclined to reading, especially the history of his own country, and this inclined him to business, and to gain a thorough knowledge of his own affairs; but the young people who were about him took great pains to draw him from his studies, and to render him, like themselves, attentive only to pleasure, in which they succeeded but too well (4). He is allowed, though the worst educated, to be the best bred king that ever sat upon the throne; inasmuch that those who knew him best, affirm he never spoke a disobliging word in his whole reign. He was from hence surnamed the Affable and the Courteous (5). He married the heiress of Bretagne, in his twenty-second year, and by her had three sons and a daughter. The dauphin Charles died when he was three years and a half old, soon after the king's return out of Italy, which affected the queen extremely; but the king is said to have bore it with the more patience, as the sprightly parts of the young prince had already awakened in his breast some sparks of jealousy, which is surely a strong token of his being the true son of Lewis the eleventh (6). The other children died all in their infancy, which makes his zeal for reforming the government in the last year of his life more remarkable and more laudable. It is true that his good intentions came late: but then it is also true, that he was but a young man; and that, though he did not many, yet he did some, very good things for the state. He re-united the important country of Provence to the crown (7); he instituted the grand council as a sovereign court for the regulating affairs of war and the finances (8); he also instituted public audiences twice a week, in which he heard persons of all ranks; and though, as Commines remarks, there were no great matters done in these audiences, yet they were of very great use, as they kept ministers in awe; for they knew that a prince, who made it a point to hear every body, was very like to hear the truth from somebody (9). The character given of him by the same writer is, at once, very simple and very expressive. "Charles the eighth, says he, was, in truth, but a little man, and of no great reach; but he was so good, that it was not possible to find a better creature (10)." His queen passed two days upon the ground without food or sleep, weeping incessantly, and mourned for him in black, whereas the mourning of queens had till then been white (11). He was buried with prodigious magnificence by the care and the command of his successor, that his subjects might take notice of his great respect for his predecessor (12). But there happened somewhat at his funeral, which did much more honour to his memory. One of the grooms of his chamber, and one of the archers of his guard, when they saw the body of their master deposited in St. Denis, dropped down dead with grief (13). In him ended the direct line of Valois, of which he was the seventh monarch, and after they had governed the realm of France 170 years (14).

S E C T. VIII.

The reign of Louis XII. surnamed the Father of his People, who, from duke of Orleans, became king, and was the first and last of his house.

THE right of succession was so well established, and the duke of Orleans had been so long considered as the presumptive heir of the crown, that he succeeded without any opposition, by the title of Lewis the twelfth, to which he added, by his actions, the most glorious of all surnames, that of, The father of his people<sup>a</sup>. He was thirty-six years of age complete at the time of his succession, equally esteemed by the nobility, and beloved by the people. He was crowned at Rheims on the 27th of May, and immediately remitted a tenth part of all imposts. He continued all the ministers, magistrates, and officers, employed by his predecessor, to the amazement of the whole nation and themselves<sup>b</sup>. When some put him in mind, that Lewis de la Tremouille had made him prisoner at the battle of St. Aubin, and was now at his mercy, he made that ever memorable answer, That it did not become a king of France to revenge the quarrels of a duke of Orleans<sup>c</sup>. It is one thing to deliver a fine maxim, and another to make it the rule of one's conduct; but Lewis did both. The duke and duchess of Bourbon looked upon themselves as disgraced, and could scarce believe him in earnest, when the king not only assured them of his pardon, but of his affection. He very soon put it out of doubt. It was provided, by their contract of marriage, that, in case they died without heirs male, the vast estates of the family should be united to the crown; they had an only daughter, whom they meant to marry to Charles count of Montpensier, son to Gilbert, who died in Italy; the king frankly renounced his interest, and thereby rendered her the heiress of the first line of Bourbon<sup>d</sup>. He treated the queen-dowager with all possible marks of respect, settled her jointure to her satisfaction, allowed her to return into Bretagne, and to assume the sovereignty of her own dominions<sup>e</sup>. But at the same time that he piqued himself on his clemency and good nature, he shewed likewise his great spirit and resolution; he restored the military discipline of the army, which had been much relaxed; he obliged the magistrates, and officers of the crown, to do their duty; and the university and preachers at Paris having taken the liberty to censure his actions, he chastised their insolence, and made them sensible that he would be obeyed (A).

(A) In this note we propose to shew the descent of this prince, his right to the crown, and to say somewhat of his private life, and of his public conduct, before he came to it. Charles the fifth, surnamed the Wise, left two sons, Charles who succeeded him, and Lewis who became duke of Orleans, and who was killed by the command of the duke of Burgundy (1). This prince, by Valentina, daughter and heiress of John duke of Milan, left three sons, Charles duke of Orleans, Philip count of Verus, who left no issue, and John count of Angouleme (2). Charles duke of Orleans being taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, remained many years in England, and, after his return to France, he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover the duchy of Milan, which belonged to him in right of his mother, and was never able to acquire more than the town and county of Ast, which he added to his domain, and which he kept as an evidence of his right to the rest of that succession (3). He was thrice married; first to Isabel of France, the widow of Richard the second, king of England, who died in childbed. By her he had only one daughter, Joan or Jane of Orleans, who espoused John the second, duke of Alexson, by whom she had no issue (4). His second wife was Bonna, daughter of Bernard the eighth, count of Armagnac, and constable of France, by whom he had no children (5). His third consort was Mary, the daughter of Adolph, duke of Cleves, by Mary the daughter of John the Fearless, and the sister of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, by whom he had Lewis, of whom we are to speak, and Mary who was thrice married (6); first to Jean, viscount of Narbonne, the second son of Gaston count of Foix, by whom she had the famous Gaston duke of Nimours, killed in the battle of Ravenna, and Germain, who became the consort of Ferdinand the Catholic (7). The second husband of Mary was John marquis of Brandenburg; the third, Ferdinand of Aragon, duke of Calabria (8). Charles, duke of Orleans, died at the castle of Ambouise, on the 4th of January 1465, in the 74th year of his age, through grief, from the ill usage he received from Lewis the eleventh, in the grand council held at Tours, where, out of pure pity, he spoke in favour of the duke of Guienne, representing him as a young prince of an excellent disposition, misled by those about him (9). Abundance of conjectures have been raised, and some political reasons given, why Lewis the eleventh married his younger daughter, and not his eldest, to the duke of Orleans. But these fall at once to the ground, when we know that his father demanded her in marriage for him, as soon as she was born, the contract being signed May the 10th, 1464 (10). This was ratified when she was ten years of age, and the king gave her one hundred thousand crowns of gold. It was impossible to foresee, when the first contract was made, that she would be crooked and ugly. It is certain that the duke would have declined marrying her if he durst; but his friends advised him not to provoke a king, whose anger was usually attended with

with Joan of France dissolved, upon which he espoused Anne of Bretagne, his predecessor's
widow.

He was desirous of posterity, and he had other motives which induced him to wish the dissolution of his marriage with Joan the daughter of Lewis the eleventh. In an affair of this nature he stood in need of the assistance of the pope. There never was one more fit for this purpose than Alexander the sixth. He was desirous of providing for his bastard Cæsar Borgia, who had resigned the cardinal's hat, that he might act in another sphere. He sent him into France with a bull, by which he appointed Lewis bishop of Alby, and Ferdinand bishop of Ceuta, commissioners, to whom he afterwards added cardinal Philip of Luxemburgh. It is generally said by the French historians, that queen Joan, who was a very pious and good princess, gave the king no opposition; but it appears from records that this is not true; she defended her marriage with all the vigour imaginable; but when she found it to no purpose, she submitted patiently, and the king granted her the revenues of the duchy of Berry, with some additional ones, which she spent in works of charity, and led, during the remainder of her days, a quiet and exemplary life<sup>f</sup>. Cæsar Borgia reaped the fruits of his father's condescensions; the king made him duke of Valentinois, and gave him in marriage the daughter of the lord of Albret<sup>g</sup>, a lady of high birth, and his own relation: so that this affair, which might have proved very difficult and perplexed, was adjusted more easily and more speedily than he could well have expected: but, where their interests coincide, princes are very soon agreed. It was the apprehension of this that had excited some disturbances in Paris, the only city in France where the inhabitants retained any affection for the memory of Lewis the eleventh, which they shewed by espousing the interests of his daughter.

Precautions taken by Lewis to preserve
peace at home.

THE next great point the king had in view, was to conclude a marriage with the widow of his predecessor: this negotiation of great importance was very quickly terminated, and, the necessary treaties and contracts being concluded and signed, the marriage was solemnized on the eighth of January. On their majesties making their public entry into Paris, the king added to his other titles those of the Two Sicilies and Jerusalem, together with the duchies of Milan and Bretagne. He claimed the first, as heir of the house of Anjou, the second, as descending to him from his grandmother, and the third in virtue of his marriage<sup>h</sup>. The face of affairs was much changed in Italy; the pope was intirely in his interests, from the hopes of advantage; he had conciliated the friendship of the republic of Venice, by promising them a part of the Milaneze; and, that he might secure to himself better success than his predecessor had met with in a like expedition, he took care to have his own dominions in perfect security and quiet. The emperor had invaded the duchy of Burgundy, where his troops had received a defeat, which did not hinder the king from concluding a truce, upon very equal terms, with the archduke Philip, who thereupon did homage to the chancellor of France, at Arras, for the counties of Flanders, Artois, and Charolois<sup>i</sup>. The king renewed his treaty with Henry the seventh of England, and his alliances with Scotland and Denmark, and, after taking these precautions, assembled his forces, and prepared, in earnest, for his Italian expedition<sup>k</sup>. George d'Amboise, archbishop of Rouen, to whom, out of compliment to the king, the pope had given a hat, and, which was far more extraordinary, declared him his legate in France, hindered his master from commanding in person. His forces, consisting of twenty thousand men, were death. He was after this in great favour with that king, who was not at all displeased with his wildness, but indulged it, some say, from a malicious disposition, in hopes that, becoming one day his successor, the disorders of his reign might efface the memory of his own (11). In his youth, the duke of Orleans entered into a close friendship with George d'Amboise, who, after the death of Francis count of Dunois and Longueville, which happened November the 25th, 1491, became his sole confident. He procured for him, first the archbishopric of Narbonne, and afterwards that of Rouen, in his own government of Normandy. He quarrelled with Charles the eighth, because, when he demanded a cardinal's hat for Brissonnet, bishop of St. Maloes, he did not also demand one for his favourite d'Amboise (12). He gave the king also some other causes of offence. Instead of sending the troops that arrived from France into the kingdom of Naples, according to Charles's express orders, he kept them with him; and instead of continuing upon good terms with Lodowic Sforza, which the king likewise recommended to him in the strongest terms, he made use of those troops to surprise Novara, which threw Sforza into the league against the king, and was the ruin of that expedition. As he lost the king's favour by this conduct, he might have recovered it by pursuing it. Charles in the latter end of his life would have put him at the head of his army, and was desirous that he should have made war in his own name, for the recovery of his duchy of Milan. But this he declined, supposing that, from his ill state of health, the king could not last long, which motive Charles either penetrated himself, or was told by others, and repented it highly; so that at the time of his decease, as we have observed in the text, he was in a kind of disgrace (13). It was to cover or to extinguish the memory of this, that he made so pompous a funeral for the king, and, that he might gain the good graces of the people, he paid for it out of his own pocket, whereas commonly this expence was borne by the public (14).

a commanded by Lewis of Luxemburgh count de Ligni, Robert Stuart lord of D'Aubigny, and John James Trivulce, a native of Milan, who had been in the service of his predecessor<sup>1</sup>.

THE duke of Milan had provided every thing for his defence; his places were well fortified, his troops numerous, and the success of the war might have been doubtful, but that a prince universally hated is easily defeated, when attacked by an equal force. Sforza had kept faith with none, and none kept faith with him. The Venetians, who were to have the country beyond the Adda, made themselves masters of it in a week. The French proceeded as briskly. Novara and Alexandria were quickly taken; Mortara capitulated; the keys of Pavia were obtained without a siege; and Genoa submitted in the like manner: the citizens of Milan opened their gates; and the citadel, the strongest place then in Europe, with provision for two, and ammunition for four years, was sold by Bernardin Curtio, to whom it had been intrusted by Sforza<sup>m</sup>. But the French nobility treated this perfidious adventurer with such contempt, that he died in ten days, of mere shame<sup>n</sup>. As for the duke himself, who had been sold too if he had staid, he very wisely withdrew to Innsbruck, with the children and his treasures<sup>o</sup>. Lewis passed the mountains himself, upon this news, and carried with him his minister; made his entry into Milan, in the ducal habit, on the 6th of October, with the universal acclamations of the people<sup>p</sup>. The cardinal, whose maxim it was, that a people, well governed, would never revolt, restored all who had been banished, or their estates confiscated, by Sforza; established a court of justice; remitted a fourth part of their taxes; directed small garrisons only to be left in the principal places; appointed Trivulce governor of the duchy, and gave the command of the horse to the lord of D'Aubigny. These measures taken, and a treaty concluded with the Florentines, the king, having received the compliments of all the Italian princes, except Frederick king of Naples, returned home, as he had entered Milan, in triumph<sup>q</sup>. All this success was justly attributed to the care, circumspection, and foresight, of cardinal D'Amboise.

A GREAT change was soon effected in the affairs of Italy, not only by the revolutions of Naples, but also by the successive deaths of the Popes Alexander VI. and Pius III. which last was succeeded by Julius II. to the great mortification and disappointment of the cardinal D'Amboise.

LEWIS, in resentment of the ill usage which he had met with from Ferdinand the Catholic, attacked Spain with three armies, two by land, and one that was to act by sea. The first, commanded by the lord of Albret, and the marshal de Gie, penetrated as far as Fontarabia, and then retired, without performing any thing, either through want of subsistence, or from some misunderstanding between the commanders: the remains of this army having joined that commanded by marshal Rieux, besieged Salces, in Roussillon; but the Spaniards advancing with an army to his relief, they were constrained to raise the siege<sup>r</sup>. The fleet, after alarming the coasts of Valentia and Castile, returned to Marseilles, without performing any thing worthy of notice. In the kingdom of Naples, the Great Captain took Gaeta in three days, by a capitulation, which permitted all the French officers and soldiers to return home as they could: but as he was never famous for performing his capitulations, so he broke shamefully through this; restraining it to the natives of France, and thrusting all the Italians into dungeons. Lewis d'Ars, one of the French officers, had retired, after the defeat at Cerignoles, with a handful of men, into Venosa, a place of no great strength, where he declared that he rejected the capitulation of Gaeta, and meant to depend upon his sword. The bravest of the French, and of the Italians in the French service, resorted to him from all sides; and, having given a very severe check to the Spanish troops which attacked him, he returned through the heart of Italy, drums beating and colours flying, and brought his troops, in good order, into the duchy of Milan; whereas of those who capitulated in Gaeta, very few returned into France<sup>s</sup>. This reverse of fortune had such an effect upon the mind of Lewis, that it threw him into a fit of sickness, which was very near proving mortal. The point he had now chiefly at heart was the re-establishment of peace. A truce had been concluded with Spain for the countries bordering on the side of the Pyrenees; but the king had so little dependence on Ferdinand, that he would not so much as suffer him to participate in this new negotiation, which ended in a treaty, concluded at Blois, the twenty-second of September, between the emperor, the archduke, who now took the title of king of Castile and Leon on the death of queen Isabella, on one side, and the king on the other<sup>t</sup>. By this the treaty of marriage between Charles and Claude was again renewed, the kingdom of Naples and many other dominions confirmed to them, and the investiture of the duchy of Milan promised to the king, upon payment of a large sum of money. The space of four months was allowed to Ferdinand to accept the treaty; and here it was that the contracting parties first engaged to attack the Venetians, though, for the present, a this came to nothing.

On the marriage of Ferdinand with his niece Germain de Foix. THE king, who had a great dependence on the treaty concluded last year, and who, above all, had fixed his heart upon obtaining the investiture of the duchy of Milan, sent cardinal d'Amboise into Germany to receive it; which he did, after paying homage, and paying also a large sum of money<sup>w</sup>. But the cardinal clearly perceived, at this interview, that nothing was to be expected as to the emperor's performance of what he had stipulated of entering into Italy, in order to act against the Venetians<sup>x</sup>, whom Ferdinand the Catholic had informed of the confederacy that was upon the carpet against them<sup>y</sup>. The king falling sick, and, at the turn of his disease, being thought past recovery, the queen caused her richest furniture, her jewels, and her wealth, to be embarked on the Loire, in order to convey them to the castle of Nantes<sup>z</sup>; but, in their passage, they were stopped at Saumur, by the marshal de Gie<sup>a</sup>, who thought that, at this time, she ought to be occupied only about the king's person. This she resented so highly, as to procure him to be suspended from his employments, the most considerable of which was being governor to the count of Angoulesme, and to be forbid the court<sup>b</sup>. But posterity rendered him justice, and have considered this as the meanest action of her's and the king's life. The views of Philip, now, in right of his wife Joan, king of Castile, alarmed Ferdinand, his father-in-law, so much, that, recollecting the tenderness which Lewis had expressed for his niece Germain de Foix, he sent an ecclesiastic into France, to try whether, after all their disputes, he might not recover the friendship of the king by espousing that lady: this proposition being extremely well received, he concluded a new treaty, by which the kingdom of Naples was settled on his posterity, by the new queen, in favour of whom Lewis renounced all his pretensions, except as to the expences of the war, for which he was to receive one hundred thousand ducats, for ten years together: what redounded highly to his honour, he stipulated that all the Neapolitan nobility, who were seized by the Great Captain, should be set at liberty; and that the estates of such as had been confiscated for their adherence either to him, or to the house of Anjou, should be restored, which, as things were now circumstanced, Ferdinand found himself obliged to promise, and the king took care that he should be likewise obliged to perform<sup>c</sup>. This was one of the most remarkable turns of policy that happened in this busy age.

A. D. 1505.

AT the time of the king's sickness, in the preceding year, the nobility of France began to entertain great apprehensions of the alliance stipulated by the treaty of Blois, by which not only the Italian dominions, but likewise the duchy of Bretagne, and other important countries, were to be given, with the king's daughter, to Charles of Luxemburgh, on which, having modestly represented their thoughts to the king, he appointed an assembly of the states to be held at Tours, in the month of May. There, having received their remonstrances, and another from the states of Bretagne, who were more immediately concerned, he resolved, after mature deliberation, to yield to their request<sup>d</sup>; and thereupon contracted the princess Claude to Francis count of Angoulesme. By this he revenged himself sufficiently of all the slights he had received from the house of Austria; but, at the same time, shewed he could make free with treaties as well as they. In the circumstances Maximilian then stood in, he could not resent it, and death removed king Philip, before he had an opportunity of expressing his sentiments. But the sincerity of his friendship to the king he had already clearly shewed, by his appointing him tutor to his son Charles, which trust he very honourably discharged<sup>e</sup>. Ferdinand the Catholic, having made a tour to Naples, executed punctually his engagements to the king. At his return, he refused to go on shore at Genoa, and, when some deputies from the city came to compliment him on board his galley, he told them that he understood there were factions amongst them, that possibly might end in a revolt, which they would find not for their interests; but that, at all events, they were to expect no assistance from him. What he predicted came to pass; the people, having drove out the nobility, chose eight tribunes, and declared Paul Nuova, a silk-dyer, their duke; expelled the French governor, and reduced a great part of the Riviera<sup>f</sup>.

ON the issue of this war depended not only the continuance of the French power in Italy, but the reputation of their monarchy in Europe. The Pope, forgetting the protection given him in France during the reign of Alexander the sixth, and the many favours he had received from cardinal d'Amboise, was the principal author of this revolt, to which the emperor also was no stranger, and which the Pisans encouraged and supported by their troops<sup>g</sup>. As soon as the news arrived at court, the cardinal suggested to the king the necessity of going in

- a person into Italy, if he meant to reduce Genoa, or preserve Milan. But the queen, who had a great ascendancy over him, opposed it with all her power, not only out of tenderness to his person, but because she thought it would raise the minister's credit, and fix his authority<sup>b</sup>. Instead of wearying and disturbing his master with repeated solicitations, the cardinal pressed the military preparations in such a manner, that, at the very opening of the campaign, he had a numerous army, well officered, and a most amazing quantity of artillery, with the best engineers that were in Europe, whom he had drawn from all quarters into the service<sup>c</sup>. By this the expedition appeared so sure, and the glory of it so great, that Lewis could not resist the desire of commanding in person, which added, under the title of volunteers, all the young noblemen in the kingdom<sup>k</sup>.
- b THE Genoese depended on the situation of their country, and on a strong fortress which they had raised to command the passage, and the great number of men which they could at any time assemble for their own defence: this made them shew little or no regard to the overtures made, from time to time, by the king, who was naturally merciful, and had not the inclination of coming to extremities. But, when these could not be avoided, he committed the van-guard of the army to his most experienced officers, who quickly forced the passes, and at length came in sight of the new fort, which, being very difficult of access, the Swiss, when commanded, declined the attack<sup>l</sup>; but, when they saw the French infantry mount to the assault, their first lines, consisting intirely of officers, attempting it, they supported them very gallantly, which contributed not a little to their carrying the place. The Genoese were so disconcerted at this, that they sent deputies to demand the king's pardon, and, under colour of that treaty, endeavoured to surprise his camp<sup>m</sup>. But they had to do with those who understood perfectly their manner of fighting, and their manner of treating. The king refused so much as to see their deputies: the cardinal told them, it was too late to think of terms; and that all they could expect was to surrender at discretion; which advice, when it could be no longer avoided, they were obliged to take. The proper guards being posted, and the people intirely disarmed, the king, on the 29th of April, entered the city on horseback, at the head of his army<sup>n</sup>. His aspect was stern, his sword drawn in his hand, but on his coat of arms was depicted a royal bee, with a swarm on every side; which device was accompanied with these words; Non utitur aculeo rex cui paremus; that is, "The monarch we obey uses no sting<sup>o</sup>."
- c After a whole week's keeping them in terror, the king declared, that though, for their rebellion, they had forfeited their lives and estates, and that, having so often refused it, they had no title to his clemency, yet, in compassion to their distress, he pardoned them, their chiefs only excepted, of whom Paul Nuova and Demetrius Justiniani suffered death, and on the city he imposed a fine of three hundred thousand ducats<sup>p</sup>. After this he had an interview with Ferdinand the Catholic at Savona, where Lewis caused the Grand captain to dine with them at the table. On the other hand, Ferdinand conferred, for several hours, alone, with cardinal d'Amboise<sup>q</sup>. After a visit of four days, in which many things were secretly concluded, Ferdinand took his leave, and the king returned to France. The emperor had prevailed upon the dyet to assist him with a great army, upon an assurance that the king meant nothing less than the intire conquest of Italy. But when the king, by dismissing his troops, demonstrated the falshood of this suggestion, the princes of Germany grew cool, and the emperor, attempting to pass a small body of his own troops into Italy, they were repulsed with loss by the Venetians<sup>r</sup>.
- d THE emperor Maximilian, being extremely provoked at the opposition given his army by the Venetians, reinforced his troops, and at length marched in person; but, in a short time, he found himself so much distressed for money, that he was constrained to retire. The Venetians, who were now joined by a body of French troops, under the command of the marshal Trivulce, thought proper to ask his consent to a truce for three years, which was offered them by Maximilian. Trivulce readily offered to sign, if the truce was general, and the allies on both sides comprehended in all places: but this the emperor refused; and the republic, finding that truce of consequence to them, subscribed it, notwithstanding the French general's protest. The motives to his proposition was the king's having excited the duke of Guelders to arm against the house of Austria in the Low Countries; and, as he was in some danger, it was requisite to preserve him by this means; which, having failed, the king was much provoked. Maximilian was much more so, at his being forced to make such a truce; and, by the interposition of Margaret, governess of the Low Countries, proposed to Lewis the reviving that project, which had been approved some years before, for the destruction of this too powerful republic. The king, and his minister the cardinal, hated the Venetians; and the council in general, when this proposition came to be examined, concurred with them in opinion.

Stephen Poncher, bishop of Pavia, a man of parts and probity, was the single opponent ; he said, the republic of Venice was the only power in Italy that was not engaged in interest to dispossess the king of the duchy of Milan ; that Lewis could depend little upon the Pope ; that Maximilian and Ferdinand the Catholic had deceived him often, and, as soon as they found their account in it, would deceive him now. But, notwithstanding this remonstrance, cardinal d'Amboise was sent with full powers to treat with Margaret, who had the emperor's powers ; and, with her, under pretence of regulating the disputes in the Low Countries, he, after a long negotiation, concluded the famous treaty of Cambray, by which the state of Venice was consigned to destruction, and the king obtained the investiture of the duchy of Milan simply for himself and his heirs<sup>a</sup>.

Views of the several powers in the famous treaty of Cambray. THIS league of Cambray was one of the greatest and most singular events that Europe had ever seen, as being a league founded in resentment, and diametrically opposite to the interests of every one of the contracting powers. The republic of Venice was grown extremely potent, and not by the most direct methods ; for great power in states, like great wealth amongst private men, is very rarely acquired but by fraud or oppression<sup>b</sup>. But the republic of Venice was the bulwark of Italy ; prevented the Pope from drawing the emperor, or the king of the Romans, as the phrase then was, into Lombardy, against the French ; moderated the views of king Lewis, and hindered him from extending his conquests ; kept the Pope from being reduced to a state of dependency ; and preserved to Ferdinand the Catholic the kingdom of Naples. All this resulted from their great power, however that power might be acquired ; and therefore, though it might be the interest of each of these potentates, separately, to recover, if possible, what had been taken from them by the republic ; yet to oblige her to refund all her conquests, was to reduce a power of which they were all afraid, and open a source thereby of perpetual wars amongst themselves<sup>c</sup>. The catholic king wanted to have Trani, Monopoli, Brindisi, Otranto, Gallipoli, and other towns on the Adriatic gulph, restored to him. The Venetians had acquired some by mortgage, and had seized the rest ; but it was by the help of their money, and the assistance they had given, that Naples was preserved to the house of Arragon, and had been acquired by Ferdinand<sup>d</sup>. The emperor, by a mixt title, as head of the empire and of the house of Austria, formed pretensions on the patriarchate of Aquileia, some towns in Friuli, Rovero in the Trentin, and Verona, Padua, and Vicenza, beyond the Alps<sup>e</sup>. What the king desired was, Cremona, Crema, Brescia, Bergamo, and the country beyond the Adda. It is true, he had yielded this to them in consideration of their assisting him to conquer the rest of the Milanese ; but, after all, the Milanese was not complete without them<sup>f</sup>. Faenza and Rimini had been usurped from the church by tyrants ; Cæsar Borgia had dispossessed those tyrants ; from him they were taken by the Venetians, and Pope Julius was willing to have them again<sup>g</sup>. The allies were to be ready to act by the first of April, before which time the Pope was to signify to the republic what restitutions he expected ; upon their refusal he was to excommunicate them, and to demand the emperor's assistance, as the protector of the church, in which quality he might act against the Venetians, without breach of his oath, in respect to the truce he had sworn to keep for a year<sup>h</sup>. Julius, though in effect the first mover of this treaty, repented it very early ; he foresaw its consequences, and endeavoured to make the state of Venice conceive them, offering to dissolve the league, if Faenza and Rimini were restored. But the republic, confident of her own strength, rejected the proposal ; upon which Julius ratified the treaty, which, for some time, he had delayed<sup>i</sup>.

Lewis passes the mountains, to command his army in person, attended by the cardinal. CARDINAL d'Amboise, whose aversion to the Venetians had dictated this measure to the French court, acted with that indefatigable diligence, which was the characteristic of his ministry, in order to carry it into execution. He prepared every thing for the campaign ; caused the troops to march ; took the Swiss into pay ; and brought every thing to bear by the time that had been fixed, though he saw all the rest of the allies backward<sup>j</sup>. He pressed and he prevailed upon his master to pass the mountains once more, in order to command his army in person ; and this notwithstanding the intreaties and tears of his queen, for whom he had not only great tenderness, but much deference also for her counsels. The cardinal himself, though afflicted with the gout, a slow fever, and an inveterate cholic, passed the Alps in a litter ; for it was his maxim to leave nothing to others that it was possible for him to do<sup>k</sup>. When the army came to take the field, it appeared, that the confederates intended to leave the whole burden upon the French, and to reserve for themselves whatever advantages might arise either from their victory or defeat. It was impossible that the cardinal should not discern this ;

a and yet he advised the king to march directly, and give battle to the enemy <sup>e</sup>. The marshal de Chaumont, nephew to the cardinal, and governor of Milan, had surprised the town of Treviglio, on the other side the Adda; the Venetians besieged it; their army consisted of three thousand men at arms, four thousand light horse, and thirty thousand foot, commanded by the count Petigliana, and by Bartholomew d'Alviana, the former cool as water, the latter hot as fire <sup>f</sup>. The king had two thousand three hundred men at arms, as many volunteers of the first families in his kingdom, eight thousand Swiss foot, and thirteen thousand of his own subjects, the best infantry that France had ever seen. In marching to the relief of Treviglio, the van-guard was commanded by marshal Chaumont, supported by marshal Trivulce; the king, having the duke of Bourbon, la Trimouille, and many other persons of the first rank, about him, commanded the main body, and the duke de Longueville the rear. The Venetians had taken the place by capitulation, notwithstanding which they had burnt and plundered it. This gave the king leisure to pass the Adda without opposition.

THE king's design was to seize Vaila; the enemy had the same design, which brought on a battle, contrary to the intention of the Venetians, who were instructed to avoid it by all means. It was fought on the 14th of May, between Vaila and Aignadel, and the Venetians were totally defeated: they lost their cannon, baggage, colours, a vast quantity of ammunition, nine thousand men killed, and as many taken <sup>h</sup>. Bartholomew d'Alviana, whose warmth occasioned the battle, breathed his last on the field; and it was a fortnight before the count of Petigliana could assemble the remains of his army. Cardinal d'Amboise took care that this victory should be improved. Before the enemy's first terror was over, all the places the king demanded surrendered at discretion: Pesquera was the only one that made a defence; it was carried by assault; and the king caused the proveditor and his son, who defended it, to be hanged, and the garrison cut to pieces, because the Venetians had violated the capitulation of Treviglio <sup>i</sup>. Upon this great blow the republic lost her courage to such a degree, that she demanded peace from all the great powers that had embarked in the league on their own terms; and at the same time gave orders to the governors of those places to withdraw their garrisons. By this means the Pope and king Ferdinand acquired all that they sought by the war, and the emperor might have done the same, if his army had been in Italy <sup>k</sup>. The cities which he claimed being evacuated, offered their keys to king Lewis, who, in regard to his alliance, refused them. The emperor's indolence, and the king's great moderation, saved the state of Venice; for the inhabitants of Trevisa, having refused to admit the imperial commissary, who came without troops, the republic supported them: soon after they surprised Padua, and resolved to defend it <sup>l</sup>. Maximilian arrived at Trent in the month of June, where he was met by cardinal d'Amboise, to whom he granted the investiture of Milan; but, after appointing an interview with the king, the emperor failed, upon which Lewis, after entering Milan in triumph, returned into his own dominions, having concluded a new treaty with the Pope, and leaving a body of auxiliaries to act in conjunction with the emperor. Maximilian, with an army of forty thousand men, besieged Padua; but, after lying before it seventeen days, was obliged to retire. Some disputes arose between the king and the Pope; in which the latter was forced to give way <sup>m</sup>. The emperor and Ferdinand the Catholic referred their disputes about the government of Castile to the arbitrament of king Lewis, of which we have shewn the issue in another place <sup>n</sup>.

POPE Julius, instead of executing his treaties, endeavoured to engage the emperor to desist from the war; and, not succeeding in that, gained the electors, who advised him to make peace. Maximilian, persisting in his own measures, mortgaged the city and citadel of Verona to Lewis for fifty thousand ducats <sup>o</sup>. Julius absolved the Venetians, and laboured to reconcile them to the emperor, declared openly against France, and practised every method to distress king Lewis. With this view he negotiated with Henry the eighth, who had lately succeeded to the crown of England. He also brought over the Swiss, who, having demanded an increase of their pensions, and being refused by king Lewis, were highly irritated: but the king, having obtained troops by the like capitulation with the Grisons and their allies, was the less concerned <sup>p</sup>. The death of cardinal d'Amboise, which happened at Lyons on the 25th of May, was a great mortification, as he was equally esteemed by the king, and beloved by the people <sup>q</sup>. By the persuasion of the Pope, the Genoese attempted a revolt without effect, the Swiss endeavoured to invade the Milanese, and were constrained to retire, both by the incomparable prudence of the marshal de Chaumont. Julius granted the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand, and, instead of the usual tribute, accepted of a gennet, declaring, at the same time, that Lewis had lost all title to the kingdom<sup>1</sup>. The king, notwithstanding this provocation, being grown weary of the war, laboured all he could to conclude a peace, in which he was crossed by the Pope, who went so far as to imprison an agent from the duke of Savoy, who proposed his master's mediation, and even put him to the torture, under colour of taking him for a spy<sup>2</sup>. Lewis, finding milder methods ineffectual, appointed an assembly of his clergy at Tours, where they decided, that it was lawful to make war on the Pope, and to seize his territories, when he was the aggressor; that his censures, in such a case, were null, and not to be regarded: they forbid the carrying money to Rome, and granted large subsidies out of all the ecclesiastical revenues in France, to enable the king to defend himself against the Pope<sup>3</sup>. The emperor made a new treaty with the king, by which he confirmed that of Cambray, and consented to the assembling a general council, in order to bring the Pope to reason. Julius, to shew that he was not at all intimidated, excommunicated the duke of Ferrara, and besieged his capital; went in person to Bologna to promote that siege, where he was very near being taken by the marshal Chaumont<sup>4</sup>. Being obliged to raise it, he afterwards invested Mirandola, notwithstanding several cardinals, displeased with his conduct, retired to Florence. In this expedition he was very near being taken by the chevalier Baiard; notwithstanding which, and his being in a very declining state of health, he went in person to press the siege, lodged within cannon-shot of the place, and visited the trenches. The king, on the contrary, grew more and more tired of the war, which was become very burdensome, and which exposed his Italian dominions to great inconveniencies, the people of Genoa having conspired a second time, and the preservation of that city requiring a constant fleet in the Mediterranean<sup>5</sup>.

THE Pope, in his new vocation of a general, had the honour of reducing Mirandola, after a siege of three months; and, to shew how much he was pleased with it, he made his entry through the breach<sup>6</sup>. In the mean time, the marshal de Chaumont died of a lingering disease, which he took to be an Italian fever, or, in plain terms, the effects of poison. He was but thirty-eight years of age, and yet was marshal and admiral of France, governor of the duchies of Milan and Normandy, and one of the ablest officers of his age. The command of the French army devolved upon the marshal Trivulce<sup>7</sup>. But in the mean time Ferdinand the Catholic, under colour of zeal for religion, and his great respect for the Pope, procured a kind of congress to be held at Mantua, in hopes of bringing about a peace; which, however, had no effect. The emperor and the king, in support of the seceding cardinals, indicated a general council to be held at Pisa, in the month of September, to which the Pope was summoned. Marshal Trivulce advancing with an army into the neighbourhood of Bologna, the Pope immediately retired into Ravenna, the people revolted in favour of the Bentivoglios, and the garrison was cut to pieces. The marquis, soon after, drawing his forces out of that city, attacked the army of the Pope and the Venetians, defeated them, and might have marched to Rome, but he knew, that his master was not inclined to push things to extremities<sup>8</sup>. This moderation had no effect upon Julius, who, notwithstanding his being reduced to the very brink of the grave by a disease, and lying, in a manner, at the mercy of the French, lost nothing either of his spirit or his abilities. On the contrary, he negotiated with Ferdinand and the Swiss, excommunicated the council at Pisa and all their adherents, and declared war against the Florentines. He also called a council himself at Rome, and his emissaries at Pisa made the council that met there so uneasy, that the members, for their own security, removed to Milan<sup>9</sup>. All this was chiefly owing to the irresolution of Lewis, who, since the death of cardinal d'Amboise, paid too much regard to the queen's advice, who looked upon a war against the Pope as an act of impiety. It was owing to this, that, though the king did not desert, he never properly supported the council, which he had caused to assemble, in order to awe the Pope. The emperor was yet more fickle than the king; was desirous of transferring the council into his own dominions, in order to engage them not only to depose the Pope, but to raise him to the apostolic see<sup>10</sup>. While these monarchs acted so strange a part, Julius caused the treaty he had concluded to be proclaimed at Rome with great solemnity, and gave it the title of the Holy League. The Swiss attacked the duchy of Milan with their whole force, burnt fourteen or fifteen towns and villages, and then retired into their own country, which some ascribe to the conduct of Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, who harrassed them continually with small parties of horse; but it is more probable they thought they had done enough, as their principal a aim was not the expulsion of the French, but to oblige them to take them again into pay upon their own terms. Don Pedro de Navarra, with the title of general of the league, began to commit hostilities towards the end of the year, entered into the Ferrarese, and took several places. But the Venetians contented themselves with acting defensively <sup>c</sup>.

THE agents of Lewis had in vain endeavoured to engage the Florentines to declare in their favour. But they were wiser, and made choice of a neutrality; cardinal John de Medicis, at the head of the troops of the Pope, and the duke of Cordona, viceroy of Naples, at the head of the Spanish army, invested Bologna, but not so completely as to prevent Gaston duke of Nemours from entering it with his whole army; upon which they raised the siege, not without suffering considerable loss in their retreat <sup>d</sup>. In the mean time the Venetians had surprised Brescia, the French garrison having barely time to retire into the castle. The duke of Nemours was no sooner informed of this misfortune, than he marched to their relief, beat a great body of Venetian troops that attempted to hinder his passage, and, having entered the citadel in the night, sallied from thence upon the town, which he recovered, after putting to death eight thousand of the enemy <sup>e</sup>. He had promised the pillage of the place to his soldiers, and he kept his word; and the value of their plunder is said to have amounted to three millions of ducats. These exploits, performed in the space of a fortnight, acquired him the character of the greatest, at the same time that he was the youngest, general in the French service. He received soon after the king's orders to fight the enemy at any rate; for, in the midst of victories, Lewis found his cause declining <sup>f</sup>. The king of England had dismissed his ambassador from a scruple of conscience, in holding any friendship with a prince who made war upon the Pope. The Florentines were on the point of declaring for the league, and the emperor disposed to desert him; for all which evils a decisive victory was held the only cure <sup>g</sup>.

THE duke of Nemours, in order to oblige the enemy to come to a battle, besieged Ravenna. This had the effect he expected; the confederates marched to its relief, and he advanced to meet them. His army consisted of sixteen thousand foot, eighteen hundred men at arms, and three thousand light horse. He commanded the van-guard in person, having with him Alphonso duke of Ferrara, the main body was commanded by Monf. la Palisse, and the rear-guard by Yves d'Allegre. The army of the confederates was pretty near the same strength; they had two thousand men at arms, three thousand archers on horseback, and fifteen thousand foot. They were commanded by the cardinal John de Medicis, and, under him, by Fabrizius Colonna, the marquis of Pescaro, Don Pedro de Navarra, Antonio de Leva, and Don Juan de Cordona <sup>h</sup>. The battle was fought on Easter day, the eleventh of April: it lasted many hours; but, in the end, the confederates were defeated, and, in all probability, this victory had answered the king's hopes, if, after having gained it like an experienced general, the duke of Nemours had not thrown himself away like a young soldier. A corps of four thousand Spaniards retired in good order; he attacked them with thirty gens d'armes, and, not being supported in time, perished: in all other respects the victory was complete; for, except that corps of Spaniards, all the rest were either killed or taken: amongst the prisoners was the cardinal legate, the marquis of Pescaro, Pedro de Navarra, Fabrizius Colonna, and Juan de Cordona <sup>i</sup>. But the death of the duke of Nemours, in the twenty-third year of his age, more than balanced this advantage, and the taking of Ravenna. The army, for want of pay, dispersed, so that Monsieur la Palisse scarce conducted four thousand men to Milan <sup>k</sup>. The Swiss poured twenty thousand men into that duchy, and declared Maximilian Sforza, son of Lodovic, who died about two years before, duke. The Genoese revolted, expelled the French, and declared Janus Fregoza their duke. Henry the eighth declared for the league; Ferdinand the Catholic expelled the king of Navarre; the Pope put the kingdom of France under an interdict, and offered Henry the title of The Most Christian King, and even the realm of France, if he would attempt the conquest of it <sup>l</sup>. In this sad situation, when all was going to wreck, la Palisse shewed himself a politician; for he rendered most of the great towns to such of the allies as had the least title to, and could reap the least benefit from, them, in hopes that this would divide them amongst themselves, as it actually did, though not time enough to be of any great service to the French <sup>m</sup>.

The Pope, now in the zenith of his glory, undertook to reconcile the Venetians to the emperor; that is, to engage the republic, now they had recovered their losses, to fulfil the offers they had made, when on the point of being undone. But this they absolutely refused, and chose rather to declare themselves neuter ; which Julius took so much to heart, that it killed him<sup>n</sup>. Cardinal de Medicis succeeded him, by the title of Leo the tenth, and was crowned Pope on the anniversary of the battle of Ravenna, in which he was taken prisoner<sup>o</sup>. He proceeded on his predecessor's plan, and the confederates resolved the destruction of France, in the very manner that the ruin of the Venetians had been contrived by the league of Cambray. The Pope was to send an army into Dauphine ; the emperor to make an irruption into Champagne ; the Swiss to invade Burgundy ; Henry of England to march into Picardy ; and Ferdinand the Catholic was to attack Guienne and Languedoc<sup>p</sup>. Lewis, in the mean time, had regained the Venetians, in hopes, by their assistance, to recover the duchy of Milan ; and, by agreeing to abandon Navarre, he quieted Ferdinand, and had leisure to act on that side. Lewis de la Trimouille, the ablest officer in his service, marched at the head of sixteen thousand foot, two thousand men at arms, and six thousand light horse, to relieve the citadel of Milan, which he performed, and in a short time recovered the whole duchy, excepting only Novara and Como. Into the first of these places Francis Sforza, the brother and successor of Maximilian, entered, with a body of six thousand Swiss<sup>q</sup>. It appeared the shortest way to end the war, to besiege this place, which Trimouille accordingly invested with all his forces. The place was on the point of surrendering, when a numerous army of Swiss marched to its relief. The French generals, after mature deliberation, resolved, that, as the adjacent country was flat, la Trimouille should remain in his lines with his infantry, and marshal Trivulce, at the head of the cavalry, should march to stop the progress of the enemy<sup>r</sup>. The measure was right : but as Trivulce did not give into it, he drew his horse into a morass, which gave the Swiss, both within and without the town, an opportunity of putting the French foot between two fires, and, in the sight of their horse, who could not stir to their assistance, cutting them to pieces. In the space of a week Francis Sforza recovered the whole duchy : the French were completely expelled out of Milan<sup>s</sup>, and soon found so much employment at home, as, for the present, prevented all thoughts of return.

THE concerns of France were, in a manner, become desperate of a sudden ; for if the allies had executed their engagements, pursuant to the treaty they concluded at Mechlin, Lewis the twelfth would have found himself in a very distressed situation, as may be easily gathered from the risks to which his affairs were exposed, even from the different manner in which they were executed<sup>t</sup>. As for Leo the tenth, he had ambition, and he was not strait-laced in point of religion ; but he had no malice to the French nation, nor any prejudice to the person of the king : and therefore, upon his abandoning the council of Pisa, now transferred to Lyons, and some few other concessions of less consequence, the Pope consented to a reconciliation, which was highly acceptable to the queen, who had ever been in terrors about this war<sup>u</sup>. Most writers ascribe this mostly to superstition, and there is no doubt but it might have a large share ; and yet there is another circumstance that very probably had greater weight. Julius the second, amongst other threats, had given out that he would cancel her marriage, and very probably had done it, if the queen had not been always on his side. This accommodation with Rome put an end to all apprehensions on the side of Dauphine, which, in truth, were not very great<sup>v</sup>. The emperor Maximilian had received a subsidy from England of one hundred thousand crowns for an invasion, which, probably, he never intended to make. Henry the eighth, who had little or no cause for entering into the war, and who, notwithstanding, was at almost the whole expence of it, prepared to fulfil his engagements both by land and sea<sup>w</sup>. He landed himself in the month of July at Calais, and very speedily formed an army of thirty thousand men. He was joined by the emperor with a good corps of horse, and some foot ; but his business was only to excuse his not having executed what he undertook to execute by his treaty of subsidy ; for here he did not pretend to serve as the ally or auxiliary, but as the mercenary of Henry, who assigned him his quarters, and allowed him an hundred ducats a day for his table : a circumstance which sufficiently explains the vanity of one of those princes, and the sordid temper of the other<sup>x</sup>. The first enterprize they undertook was the siege of Terouenne, which they invested with an army of upwards of fifty thousand men. The place was strong and well defended, so that when the enemy had lain before it some time, the duke of Longueville marched to its relief with a numerous army, and succeeded in the attempt ; but, being unfortunately attacked in his retreat, the cavalry fell into a precipitate flight, the duke and a few of his principal officers excepted, who were made prisoners. This action happened on the 18th of August, and was stiled by the French, La Journée des Eperons, or, “ the battle a "of the spurs". On the twenty-fourth the place surrendered, after two months siege, and the allies, not agreeing who should keep it, it was dismantled and burnt. Henry then marched, at the emperor's request, into the Low Countries, and besieged Tournay, a place of large extent, and which might have made a good defence, but the inhabitants, confident of their own strength, refused a garrison, and yet thought fit to surrender in a few days. This city, though less convenient for him than Terouenne, Henry resolved to keep: having directed some additional fortifications, and left in it a strong garrison, he put an end to the campaign, and returned into his own dominions in triumph <sup>b</sup>.

THE king was the less in a condition to defend his territories against the English, as the Swiss, elevated by the victory they had gained at Novara, made an irruption into Burgundy with twenty-five thousand men, and were joined on the part of the emperor by Ulrick duke of Wirtemberg, who brought with him the gentry of Franche Comtè, and some artillery. These new invaders besieged Dijon, the capital of the province, into which Lewis de la Tremouille had thrown himself with three or four thousand men. The place being but indifferently fortified, must have been infallibly taken, and then the passage had been open to Paris, of which some of the richer citizens were so sensible, that they began to retire. At the beginning of the siege la Tremouille made a brisk sally with almost his whole force, which was thought very imprudent; but having taken some Swiss officers prisoners, he entertained them at his own table, treated them kindly, and enquired what were the sources of this enmity between nations whose interest it was to be constantly allied. This produced a negotiation, in which the Swiss claimed four hundred thousand livres as the arrears of their pensions; insisted on the king's renouncing all claim to the duchy of Milan, and also upon submitting the king's title to Burgundy to the determination of experienced lawyers <sup>c</sup>. All this la Tremouille admitted to be reasonable, and undertook should be complied with; giving his own nephew, one of his principal officers, and four of the best citizens of Dijon, as hostages, and twenty thousand crowns by way of earnest; upon which they raised the siege and retired. The king disavowed the treaty as dishonourable, and refused to perform it; but, notwithstanding this, it was universally acknowledged, that la Tremouille had saved France, and the hostages were afterwards disengaged for a considerable sum <sup>d</sup>. The English and French fleets had two engagements at sea; in the last Sir Edward Howard, high admiral of England, was blown up, and Prosmoguer, a native of Bretagne, who commanded the French fleet, was likewise slain; but the latter had the advantage, as appeared by their making a descent on the coast of Sussex <sup>e</sup>. The allies of France, in the course of this year, were as unfortunate as the French. The Venetians were beaten by the Spaniards with great loss; and James the fourth of Scotland, who invaded England with a potent army, was defeated and killed by the earl of Surry, in the fatal battle of Flodden, which was considered as a grievous misfortune in France, as no farther diversion was to be hoped for on that side, during the war <sup>f</sup>.

AT the opening of the year died the queen, equally regretted by the king her husband and by her subjects <sup>a</sup>; and yet her death proved an advantage to the state. The pope, who had vast designs for his own family, was equally desirous of excluding the French and Spaniards from Italy, and with this view laboured to reconcile the emperor to the Venetians, and king Lewis with the Swiss, which he knew could not be done but by renouncing his claim to the duchy of Milan: but the king, though much inclined to peace, had other views, and knew how to negotiate so as to obtain them. He began with offering Ferdinand the Catholic his second daughter for either of his grandsons Charles or Ferdinand, and to renounce, in favour of that marriage, his claims on Milan and Genoa. This proposal was approved, the truce renewed for another year, and the emperor included <sup>i</sup>. The king then married his eldest daughter to his presumptive heir, Francis count of Angoulesme, to whom he had been long contracted, and soon after put him in possession of the duchy of Bretagne, though this seemed to be a little dangerous, considering the trouble he had given his predecessor, when he was only protected by a duke of Bretagne <sup>k</sup>. The news of these negotiations was not well received at Rome, and much less so at London, where Henry made no scruple of declaring how little he was pleased with the conduct of the emperor, and how much he resented the double dealing of his father-in-law Ferdinand. But that which piqued him most was, that his sister Mary, for whom he had a real affection, was slighted by Charles of Austria, for a younger daughter of France. The duke of Longueville, then prisoner in England, but at the same time well received at court, took advantage of the temper the king was in to suggest that the king his master was a widower, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and that the princesses might be as well married to him as to a prince of Spain<sup>1</sup>. Henry entertained the motion, which was not disapproved by Lewis. A suspension of arms immediately followed, and a treaty was quickly concluded, by which Tournay was left to the English, Henry was to have a million of crowns, and Lewis was left at liberty to prosecute his intentions in Italy, even against the allies of England, without prejudice to the peace, which was at the same time an alliance offensive and defensive between the two crowns. This treaty was signed on the 7th of August, and ratified by both monarchs on the 20th of the same month<sup>m</sup>.

Queen Mary arrives in France, is received with all possible magnificence.

It is hinted by some historians, and not without great appearance of truth, that one of the principal motives which determined Henry to this peace was to be rid of Richard de la Pole duke of Suffolk, who, with a body of twelve thousand German mercenaries, was on the point of making a descent in England<sup>n</sup>. Richard the third had declared this family heirs to the crown. Henry the seventh left the elder brother of Richard prisoner in the tower of London; who, at the time he made his last expedition, Henry the eighth caused to be put to death: which shews that he was apprehensive that the warm affection the English nation had for the house of York was far from being extinguished<sup>o</sup>. At least it is certain that Lewis made another use of the German troops that were to have been employed in the invasion; and advised Richard de la Pole to retire to Metz, where he gave him an annual pension of six thousand livres<sup>p</sup>. The princess Mary passed the seas with all possible pomp and splendor, and, on the ninth of October, the marriage was celebrated at Abbeville<sup>q</sup>. On the 6th of November following their majesties made their public entry into Paris, amidst the universal acclamations of their subjects. In the midst of the pompous diversions which were made for the reception of the new queen, the king was far from neglecting public affairs. Charles duke of Bourbon, at the head of a numerous body of gens d'arms, advanced to the frontiers towards Italy, and was to be followed by sixteen thousand German foot which the king had taken into pay<sup>r</sup>. But in the mean time the castle of the lanthorn at Genoa, the only place France retained of all her conquests in Italy, was obliged to surrender, the garrison being absolutely destitute of provisions; and the Genoese were no sooner in possession of it, than they demolished it to its very foundation<sup>s</sup>. The king was very desirous of engaging the pope in his interest, and, on the other hand, Leo made use of every art to hide his true design, which was to preserve the duchy of Milan for the family of Sforza, to maintain his own family in Tuscany, and to procure for them, if possible, the kingdom of Naples; so that none but Italian princes should rule in Italy. These schemes of his were conducted with all the secrecy and address imaginable, and he omitted nothing that was requisite to keep fair with both crowns, who, notwithstanding, had their suspicions of what was his true design<sup>t</sup>.

Death and character of Lewis XII.

AFTER having extricated himself, from so many difficulties, and brought his affairs into so good order, whilst he meditated yet greater things, Lewis found his infirmities increase, and his health decay. His constitution was much broken by the gout, against which his only preservative was a very regular manner of living. He thought himself obliged to depart from this, in complaisance to his young queen, and his affection, his too great affection, say the writers of those times, for the most sprightly and the most beautiful young princess in Europe, hastened him to his grave<sup>u</sup>. He died in the night following the first of January, in the fifty fourth year of his age, and in the seventeenth of his reign (B). Perfection is not to be found in

(B) We have spoke so amply of this monarch, and have insisted so fully on his character in the text, that we may be the shorter here. He is reported by some historians to have been too easy in his temper, and to have been too much governed by his ministers and his queen. On many occasions, however, he exerted himself in such a manner, that such as are guided only by facts, and not by authorities, will clearly discern, that he acted according to his own judgment, even in those points in which he seemed to be governed. He did not restrain the magnificence either of the queen or of cardinal d'Amboise, which proves he was no lover of money, and that his frugality was the effect of sentiment and reflection, not of a covetous disposition. By this means his affairs derived all the assistance they could have done from magnificence in his own disposition, at the same time that his subjects escaped the oppression, and himself the embarrassment, that must have resulted, if, in his own court or person, there had been a display of splendor and parade. He put this out of doubt, when, observing the different turn of the count d'Angoulême, who loved nothing but pomp and expence, he said, with regret, "All our labours are in vain; that great boy will ruin all." His firmness in supporting the cardinal ought never to be esteemed a foible. His choice of ministers after his decease shews his good sense and penetration; he confided in Poncher bishop of Paris, who had so boldly opposed both him and his minister in the conclusion of the league at Cambray, the only blemish of his reign; and in Semblancé, whom he placed at the head of the finances, who was a man of exemplary probity, as well as excellent parts. His first

- a in mortals, and those are justly esteemed flatterers who ascribe it to kings ; but in this the severest of the French historians unanimously agree, that more royal virtues, with fewer defects, were never more conspicuous in any of their princes than in Lewis the twelfth. France, say they, was never more happy, more rich, more quiet, or more submissive, than under his reign. Justice was never better administered ; wiser laws were never made, and hardly ever so well executed. Military discipline was never so exact, or so severe, but, at the same time, the troops were punctually paid. In succeeding times the quartering of them in provinces was esteemed a grievance, but, in the time of Lewis, it was considered as an advantage, and the provinces solicited it in that light <sup>w</sup>. His family and his court, the populace and the nobility, equally
- b admired him, and unanimously called him their father, the title with which he was most pleased, and which he made it the study of his life to deserve. He began his reign with abolishing impositions ; and at the time of his death he had diminished above half of them. He was obliged sometimes to raise extraordinary taxes ; but when he signed edicts for that purpose, he did it with tears <sup>x</sup>. His very misfortunes endeared him to his subjects ; for he might have maintained his conquests in Italy, if he would have raised large sums upon his people ; but he thought any loss light when compared with that of their affections. He was thought a little too saving ; and, in the beginning of his reign, his subjects took the liberty of expressing this in satires, and even of ridiculing it on the stage. The king knew it very well, and, which was
- c singular, it gave him no offence : he said, upon that occasion, what ought to be ever remembered, “ I had much rather my subjects should laugh at my parsimony, than weep at their own “ oppressions.” The custom in France then was for the criers to proclaim the demise of persons of all ranks, as they did his in these words ; “ The good king Lewis, the father of his people, “ is dead <sup>z</sup> : ” at once the most artless and the most finished panegyric.

first consort Joan of France, when her marriage was declared null, December 22d, 1498, retired to Bourges, where she lived in the exercise of strict devotion, and where she founded the monastery of Annunciades, or Celestes. She died February 4th, 1505. Anne of Bretagne had two sons, who died in their cradle, and two daughters, Claude, who espoused his successor, Renée, promised at the age of five years to Charles of Austria, demanded in marriage by the king of England, offered to the marquis of Brandenburg, and at length married, in 1527, to Hercules de Este, duke of Ferrara, by whom she had a numerous posterity. She was one of the most amiable, virtuous, prudent, learned, and generous princesses France ever produced. After the decease of the duke her husband, she kept her court at Montargis, and became a protestant, and died June 12th, 1575, at the age of sixty-six. The third queen of Lewis was Mary daughter to Henry the seventh, and sister to Henry the eighth of England, who survived him eighteen years. His corpse lies interred in the monastery of St. Denis, near that of his beloved wife Anne of Bretagne, where a noble tomb has been erected to both their memories. He gave for his device a porcupine, with these words; Cominus & eminus, i. e. “ Near and afar off ; ” meaning probably, that he would vindicate his rights at home and afar off. The porcupine was also painted sometimes with this verse under or round it, Spicula sunt Humili Pax hæc, sed Bella Superbo.

“ But to the foe they speedy vengeance bear.”

The reign of Francis I. surnamed The Patron of Learning ; Henry II. Francis II. Charles IX. and Henry III. in whom the branch of Valois was entirely extinguished.

- d THE widow of the deceased king having declared that she was not pregnant, Francis Accession of the count of Angoulesme, duke of Bretagne and Valois, succeeded, without dispute or count of An- delay. He was crowned at Rheims on the 25th of January ; and his accession appeared highly acceptable to all ranks of people ; but to the nobility more especially, who, having lived with him in great familiarity, expected to share deeply in his favours <sup>a</sup>. The two first offices in the state were vacant, the chancellor and constable ; he bestowed the former upon Antony du Prat, and the latter on Charles duke of Bourbon <sup>b</sup>. He took great pains to renew the treaties then subsisting, but particularly with the Venetians and the crown of England. He made also a new treaty with the archduke Charles king of Castile, with whom he affected to contract a strict and inviolable friendship <sup>c</sup>. By this treaty the marriage between that prince and the younger daughter of the deceased king was again confirmed, but without any intention of performing it, but merely to prevent the reviving any propositions in respect to the queen dowager of France ; and it may be, that, to free himself effectually from all fears of this kind,

the king promoted her marriage with Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk<sup>d</sup>. Arthur de Gouffier, a whom he made great master of his household, and his secretary Florimond de Robertet, had a great share in the government; that is, he communicated to them chiefly his designs, for he was not very apt to take council from any. He was, from his accession, determined to pursue his predecessor's scheme for the recovery of Milan; which, belonging to the house of Orleans, as descendents from the duchess Valentine, they had always more at heart than any other part of their dominions: but he kept his secret well, so that it was not disclosed till he was on the point of carrying it into execution (A). This design requiring immense sums of money, and his coffers being absolutely empty, he had recourse to du Prat, who was his oracle upon such occasions. The chancellor told him that his predecessor had sold offices, and advised him to do the same; upon which he added a chamber to the parliament of Paris, and to each of the other parliaments, which was one of the first and one of the worst strokes of this minister's policy<sup>e</sup>. In the beginning of his reign, Lewis the twelfth had sold some offices, but none that were judicial, and purely with a view to avoid loading his people with taxes; whereas Francis had already raised them as high as his predecessor had found them. Besides, as soon as it was in his power, Lewis repurchased and suppressed those offices; and, rather than have recourse to this expedient again, alienated part of his domain, which sufficiently shews the disposition of a minister who could mention this as a precedent. It is thought a great historian<sup>f</sup> alludes to this amongst other ruinous extensions of regal power, when he says, that Francis the first made two promotions, of which the bad effects of one were felt by his whole race; and, the mischiefs arising from the other, down to the time in which he wrote, were like to fall as heavy on posterity: an honest remark, and a true prophecy.

Passes the Alps

THIS treasure, thus supplied, was very speedily expended. The new duke of Genoa, Frederick, was prevailed upon to depose himself, and to accept the title of perpetual governor, under the crown of France. Don Pedro Novara, who was made prisoner in the battle of Ravenna, piqued at the little notice that had been taken of him, entered into the service of France, and found means to raise ten thousand Biscaneers and Gascons. The duke of Gueldres brought many thousands of Landsquenets out of Germany; so that, when the army was assembled, in order to pass the Alps, it was the most numerous that France had even raised in this quarrel, as consisting of forty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse. The king having raised his own county of Angoulesme into a duchy, bestowed it upon his mother Louisa of Savoy, and declared her regent<sup>g</sup> in his absence: and this princess was the first to whom the French gave the title of Madame. All things being ready by the beginning of August, the troops began to attempt the passage of the Alps, by a new road, made with incredible labour, and at a vast expence, at Roque-perriere, the Swiss having secured all that they thought practicable. The van-guard was commanded by the constable, the main body by the king in person, who had with him, besides several princes of the blood, the dukes of Gueldres, Lorraine, and Savoy; the duke of Alençon commanded the rear<sup>h</sup>. (A) The descent of the house of Angoulesme was very clear, being a branch of that of Orleans. John count of Angoulesme was the fifth son of Lewis of France, who was assassinated by order of the duke of Burgundy. This John was surnamed the Good, and lived near thirty years in England, where he was an hostage. He espoused Margaret, daughter to Alain count of Roan, by whom he had Lewis, who died in his infancy, Charles who succeeded him, and Joan, who married the prince of Mortagne. After his return to France, he lived, universally beloved and esteemed, in his castle of Cognac, where he died April 30th, 1467; and near one hundred years afterwards, viz. an. 1562, his body being then whole and uncorrupted, was taken up and burnt by the Hugonots. Charles count of Angoulesme espoused Louisa of Savoy, the eldest daughter of Philip count of Bresse, and afterwards duke of Savoy. This princess was extremely beautiful, and had infinite wit, but, at the same time, had most of the foibles of her sex. She was gallant, vindictive, cunning, profuse, and vain. He had by her only two children. Francis, who succeeded to the crown, and his sister Margaret. Charles count of Angoulesme died January 1st, 1496, at the age of thirty-seven. After his decease his widow lived chiefly at her castle of Cognac, where she took great care of her children, who were wonderfully handsome in their persons, and in their tender years were very carefully educated. But when the countess came to court, as she was young, handsome, and the mother of the presumptive heir to the crown, she had great court paid to her, which so disgusted Anne of Bretagne, that she treated her with great coldness, so that the countess was quickly weary of residing there, and returned, as soon as she could, to her own house. She cast her eyes very early on Charles of Bourbon, whom she would have willingly espoused, notwithstanding their tempers were extremely unlike; for he was remarkably silent and serious, his thoughts continually occupied with affairs of importance; so that he had little leisure as well as little inclination to make his court to the ladies; and had either conceived some ill impressions of the countess's behaviour, or had given credit to some disadvantageous reports, so that he slighted the advances that were made him, which the countess took very ill. Yet this did not stifle her passion, or hinder her, at certain times, from expressing great regard for this prince, till, as we shall see hereafter, he carried his distaste so high, that it turned that affection she formerly had for him into a hatred, equally fatal to him, to her, to the king, and to all France. So injurious are the foibles, the passions, and the vices of persons in exalted stations, not only to themselves and their families, but to the community.

- a dred men at arms ; upon which Leo immediately sent one of his ministers, with full powers to treat of an accommodation ; and the Swiss, perceiving it to no purpose to guard them longer, abandoned the passes <sup>1</sup>. They continued, however, to march close by the king's army, fully resolved to attack it the first fair opportunity. Yet, by the interposition of the duke of Savoy, they were brought to a negotiation ; and by a treaty concluded at Guilletres it was stipulated, that the king should give them seven hundred thousand crowns, in full satisfaction of all their demands. To raise which enormous sum, the king was constrained to borrow not only all the money but all the plate also belonging to the princes and great officers. Such was the terror they had at this time, and not without reason, of the Swiss troops <sup>2</sup> ; and so desirous were the king and his general to recover their favour.
- b BUT the Swiss, receiving at this juncture a considerable reinforcement, under the command of captain Ross, and being persuaded by the vehement harangues of the cardinal of Sion, re-<sup>Defeats the Swiss at Marignano.</sup> solved to attack the king in his camp, though they were forsaken by the pope's troops, and were without artillery. Accordingly, on the 13th of September, about four in the afternoon, they attacked the French camp at Marignano, within a quarter of a league of Milan, with amazing intrepidity. The action lasted for several hours after sun-set, and ended then because both parties were so fatigued that they were unable to support themselves. The king himself slept an hour against the carriage of a cannon, intermixed with the enemy ; and as soon as he waked, gave orders for posting his artillery, and making all the necessary dispositions for renewing the fight <sup>3</sup>. Accordingly, as soon as day broke, the Swiss returned to the charge, with greater fury than the day before, but were so extremely galled by the cannon, and so miserably broken by the gens d'arms, who charged through them, that about nine they began their retreat, leaving near one half of their army, which consisted of twenty-five thousand men, upon the field. This retreat gained them more reputation than all their victories, for they made it slowly and in good order, and repulsed a corps of Venetian troops, which ventured to pursue them, with vigour <sup>4</sup>. Marshal Trivulce said, that eighteen battles, in which he served before, were but children's play in comparison of this, which he stiled the fight with the giants. But the victory, glorious as it was, cost the French four thousand of their best troops, and several persons of distinction <sup>5</sup>. Don Pedro Navarro reduced Novara ; and the city of Milan opened her gates ; the constable besieged the citadel, and took it by capitulation, Francis Sforza resigned his dukedom to the king, in consideration of a pension of sixty thousand ducats, and the promise of a cardinal's hat, thinking himself happy in being delivered from the heavy yoke of the Germans, the surly humours of the Swiss, and the crafty contrivances of the Spaniards <sup>6</sup>. The king made a triumphal entry into Milan ; established a parliament there after the model of that of Paris ; appointed the constable governor of the city and duchy, and left with him a corps of ten thousand men <sup>7</sup>. The pope having accepted a peace on such terms as the king prescribed, Francis had an interview with him at Bologna, where, to prevent a schism, he consented to the concordat ; and, having thus gloriously terminated his affairs in Italy, returned into his own dominions, after refusing the title of emperor of the East, which the pope offered him, in order to engage him to turn his arms against the Turks <sup>8</sup>.
- c AT Lyons the king met his mother and his queen, and the court resumed all that splendor and magnificence, which, while it delighted the eyes of the vulgar, occasioned infinite oppression at home, and at the same time excited the jealousy and hatred of foreign princes <sup>9</sup>. Amongst these the emperor Maximilian was ever the most forward. Assisted openly by the Swiss, and secretly by the pope, he made an irruption into Italy with thirty thousand men, and pushed the constable so vigorously, that he was almost on the point of abandoning Milan, the suburbs of which he burnt, by the malicious advice of the Venetians. King Francis having concluded a treaty with the Swiss (five cantons excepted), and having paid them six hundred thousand crowns, they sent twelve thousand men to the relief of the constable <sup>10</sup>. Upon this Maximilian, the best part of whose army also consisted of Swiss, retired hastily, from an apprehension that his person might be in danger ; and soon after his army disbanded. The king recalled the constable of Bourbon, to gratify the spleen of his mother, and sent Odet de Foix, viscount de Lautrec, to command in Milan, because he was the brother of his mistress <sup>11</sup>. This new governor took Brescia, which he restored to the Venetians ; but he was constrained to raise the siege of Verona. The death of Ferdinand the Catholic gave the king an opportunity of assisting the house of Albret with an army for the recovery of the kingdom of Navarre, which was speedily, and with great spirit performed, and as imprudently lost. D. 1516. demolishing all the fortresses, and rendering the country almost a desert, made any future attempt a of that kind less practicable *. Charles of Austria being about to pass into Spain, concluded the treaty of Nojon, upon terms so very advantageous to France, that the performance was not to be expected. He undertook to marry the princess Louisa, the king's daughter, who was but a year old, and to allow an hundred thousand crowns a year for her support; he promised to render Navarre, in six months, and consented, in case he failed, that the king should assist the house of Albret with an army. The true motive to this treaty was the security of the Low Countries w. The emperor Maximilian acceded to it; and, for the sum of two hundred thousand crowns in ready money, and the discharge of three hundred thousand more, which he had borrowed of the late king, he promised to deliver up Verona, and to grant the king the investiture of the duchy of Milan x. The five protesting cantons now acceded to the treaty of b Friburgh, since that time stiled the perpetual alliance, having subsisted ever since between the two nations and proved reciprocally advantageous to both y.

In pursuance of the treaty lately concluded, Maximilian rendered Verona into the hands of the Spaniards, by whom it was yielded to the viscount de Lautrec, who restored it to the Venetians; so that the republic was now pretty near in the same situation as before the league of Cambray. With respect to the investiture Maximilian took time to consider; which was his manner of refusing. The duchy of Urbino was conquered for Lawrence de Medicis, who being in France, confirmed the alliance with his uncle Leo the tenth z. About the same time Francis renewed the antient treaties between France and Scotland, and sent over the duke of Albany to administer the government in the name of the young king, or, in other words, to c render that country a province of France, which was highly displeasing to Henry the eighth, the young king's uncle, who had very kind intentions towards that young prince *. The parliaments and the universities of France were unanimous in their opposition to the concordat; but the king, to gain the favour of the pope, caused it to be introduced and executed by force b; sacrificing to the pleasure of a foreign prince the laws of his country, and the affections of his subjects. This was another effect of the new maxims of his chancellor, who was already a creature of the court of Rome, and who, for this and other subsequent services, received the usual gratification of a hat (B). (B) The affair of the concordat is a point of too great consequence to be hastily passed over, and yet of too great length and difficulty to be fully treated in this place. We shall therefore endeavour to give the reader a succinct idea of what it was, and of the principal consequences that attended it, and leave the rest to the inquisitive reader's perusal in the works of those authors we shall have occasion to cite. We have before observed that, in order to gain the good graces of pope Pius the second, Lewis the eleventh attempted to abolish the Pragmatic sanction, in which he was vigorously opposed by the parliament; and afterwards, finding no reason to be well pleased with that pontiff, gave up the point, and left the Pragmatic sanction to be considered as a law in the Gallican church, and as such to be respected in the state. Under the reigns of Charles the eighth and Lewis the twelfth it was strictly observed, though pope Julius the second, in the council of Lateran, fulminated against all who should support or submit to it. Leo the tenth pursued his predecessor's steps; and it was in this disposition the king found him at his interview. He consented, however, that the cardinals of Ancona and Santiquatro should confer with the chancellor du Prat, in order to find out some expedient that might satisfy both parties; and it was the expedient that these commissioners framed that was afterwards stiled the concordat. By this the abolitions of the reservations and expectatives was abolished, as in the Pragmatic sanction; but then the obligation of the pope to assemble a general council within a certain limited time, and the superiority of such councils to the pope, which were also in the Pragmatic sanction, were left out in the concordat. But the two principal points in this famous agreement were the granting the king the nomination to the benefices in his dominions, under certain restrictions, and the allowing the pope his annates, that is, a year's revenue clear out of every benefice to which the king named; and thus the right of election was taken from the chapters and convents, and the king and the pope jointly shared the spoils of the church. Francis, at his return, laboured all that he could to oblige his parliament to receive the concordat; and the pope's nuncio, having presented two books under the leaden seal, the one containing the concordat, and the other the revocation of the Pragmatic sanction, he sent the former, as virtually maintaining both, to the parliament, requiring them to register and publish it. Upon this occasion he held his bed of justice, and was present when the chancellor, in a long florid speech, gave the best account he could of the king's conduct and his own: after which the clergy retired into a room by themselves; where, after they had conferred, they returned, and the cardinal de Boissi reported, that, being a matter which concerned the Gallican church, it ought to be considered in a general assembly of the clergy, without whose consent the concordat could not be ratified. "But I," said the king in a passion, "will make you ratify it, or will send you to Rome to debate it with the pope." The parliament answered in softer terms, but to the same effect. The king then sent his letters patent, reciting the concordat, and commanded them to register it. The parliament submitted to examine the affair afresh; but, in the end, declared that they could not register or publish the concordat, but were resolved to proceed according to the Pragmatic sanction; and that, if his majesty would have this last abolished, it must be by an assembly of the Gallican church, as it was enacted in the reign of his predecessor Charles the seventh. Francis told them, in answer, that he was king of France, and that he would not suffer them to be a senate of Venice, and therefore would be obeyed. Upon this the parliament submitted; but,

- a THE birth of a Dauphin gave great pleasure to the king and to his subjects. The pope promised to answer for the young prince at the font, and accordingly Lawrence de Medicis performed that ceremony in his name, which was one of the arts he used to preserve the good opinion of the king, while he was secretly doing him ill offices, and concerting, or at least endeavouring to concert, a league for depriving him of his duchy of Milan. On the other hand, Francis still persisted in his desire of reviving his claim to the kingdom of Naples, which induced him to heap favours upon the pope, in hopes that he might gradually win and fix him to his interest. With this view, as he had already very unjustly fixed Lawrence de Medicis in the duchy of Urbino; so he next gave him in marriage Magdalen of Bologna, niece to the duke of Vendosme, and a great heiress<sup>c</sup>. From this sprung Katherine de Medicis, of whom we shall have much to say hereafter. He was still very diffident of England, and with reason; for he stood at that time upon ill terms with cardinal Wolsey (who, with the title of his minister, governed Henry the eighth as absolutely as if he had been his pupil), though he was in some measure indebted to him for his hat. Wolsey had influenced Henry to shew such marks of jealousy, as obliged the French monarch to leave Italy sooner than he intended; he had likewise prevailed upon him to furnish the emperor with money for his late Italian expedition: but perceiving that, as things were then circumstanced, it would be impossible to raise a war in Europe, he made some advances towards a reconciliation with Francis, who, being perfectly acquainted with his character, made him very rich presents, and consulted him upon points of great importance<sup>d</sup>. The point on which they had differed, was in respect to the see of Tournay, of which he had the administration and revenue, but was desirous likewise of having the title, which the king had not only refused, but had also solicited the pope to restore the administration to the deprived bishop, who was his subject. But now he treated with Wolsey for the restitution of the city, with a promise to indemnify him amply for the particular loss which he might sustain. The point being once settled with the minister, the admiral of France, with other persons of great distinction, came over as ambassadors to settle it with the king. The cardinal managed this affair with great address: he sold the town at a very high price: but, that his new client might have no reason to complain, he stipulated a marriage between the Dauphin, just born, and the king's only daughter Mary, to whom he assigned a large portion, and consented that it should be abated out of the purchase<sup>e</sup>. On the signing of this treaty on the 14th of October, king Francis, by his letters patent, granted the cardinal an annuity of fourteen thousand livres. The king was so well pleased with this bargain, that he proposed dealing for Calais, and Wolsey entertained the motion, and in all probability would have brought it to bear; but Charles, king of Castile, interposed, and made him sensible that he was well inclined to repurchase his good graces, which stopped that bargain<sup>f</sup>. Monsieur de Lautrec governed Milan with a rod of iron, harrassed the people extremely, and amassed immense riches; but perceiving that, in spite of these, marshal Trivulce was infinitely more esteemed, he rendered him suspected to the king his master, which, when the marshal perceived, though upwards of fourscore and infirm, he passed the mountains in the depth of winter to go and vindicate himself; the king, however, was so prejudiced against him, that he refused to hear him, which affected the gallant old foldier to such a degree, that he died of grief<sup>g</sup>. The princess Louisa being dead, Charles, king of Castile, still inclined to sooth the monarch of France, renewed the treaty of Nojon, and promised to espouse the princess Charlotte, who was just born, and, having the same intentions as to both, it was of little consequence.
- In pursuance of the late treaty with England, Monsieur Colligni took possession of Tournay, which, exclusive of the presents and pensions to cardinal Wolsey, cost king Francis at least four hundred thousand crowns. However, the two kings were still upon so good terms, that Henry was godfather to the king's second son, and gave him his own name<sup>h</sup>. The death of the emperor Maximilian operated strongly on the affairs of Europe. In the latter part of his life he had practised on Henry continually, by pretending that he would resign in his favour, or that he would engage the electors to chuse him his successor. But this was only with a view to obtain money; for his real intention was in favour of his younger grandson Ferdinand, till, upon more at the same time, made a protest before the bishop of Langres, duke and peer of France, that what they did was in obedience to the king, and by force; that they meant not to approve the concordat, nor would regulate their proceedings by that, but by the Pragmatic sanction, as they did some time after, when the king accordingly named a person to the bishoprick of Albi; and the chapter chose another; upon which a process was commenced before the parliament of Thoulouse, and from thence removed before the parliament of Paris; upon which the king sent for the first president, and directed him to give judgment pursuant to the concordat; notwithstanding which, he pronounced a sentence the next day in favour of the person elected by the chapter. While the king was prisoner in Spain, these disputes were suspended; and, at his return, the king transferred the cognizance of causes relating to archbishopricks, bishopricks, abbies, &c. from the parliament to the great council.

mature deliberation, he thought it more expedient to prefer Charles; and, on his behalf, therefore, he was labouring with the electors at the very time he died. Francis, though he had refused the title of emperor of the east, was not so indifferent as to the empire of Germany; but, on the contrary, very ambitious of restoring that title to the monarchs of France; and, as he was very generous, or rather profuse, he found it no difficult matter to obtain promises from the electors<sup>1</sup>. The pope pretended sometimes to be neuter; and at other times he affected to favour France; but, in reality, he was not desirous that either Charles or Francis should be chosen, in which he would have prevailed, if the duke of Saxony would have accepted the imperial crown. But he refusing it, the electors, after much consideration, bestowed it on Charles<sup>2</sup>. As one great reason of their preferring him to Francis, was, their apprehension of seeing themselves reduced from the rank of princes to that of nobility, like those of France, they resolved to limit the power of their new master, and with this view settled the capitulation, which he was to accept, at the same time he was admitted to the imperial dignity. A circumstance to which, in all probability, he had not submitted, but from the apprehension of being supplanted by Francis. This controversy was carried on with all the exterior marks of politeness possible between the competitors; but, notwithstanding, Francis was so much piqued at this disappointment, that it was the real source of that inveterate aversion, which, however disguised upon particular occasions, those monarchs bore to each other ever after. It immediately revived the old project of recovering the kingdom of Naples, which seemed to be facilitated by the old opinion, that it was incompatible with the imperial dignity.

A. D. 1519.

Interview between Francis and Henry at the camp of Cloth of Gold.

1520.

BEFORE he undertook any thing, Francis held it expedient to be sure of England; and therefore dispatched admiral Bonnivet to press king Henry to an interview, which was easily effected, for the monarch loved shews, and his minister presents. The two kings and their queens met between Ardres and Guines: there had scarce any thing been seen of equal magnificence in Europe, and it was long after memorable by the title of de Camp de Drap d'Or, or, the Cloth of Gold Camp; it lasted ten or twelve days, exhausted the treasures of both monarchs, ruined many of their nobility, and answered no end whatever<sup>3</sup>. The new emperor, passing out of Spain to the Low Countries, in July landed at Dover, obtained an exact account of all that had passed in the conferences between the two kings, and made such impressions on Wolsey, as weakened, if not effaced, all memory of the French politeness<sup>4</sup>. All the French historians agree in stating the facts and dates thus, and reason upon them in this manner. But, however, the truth is, the emperor's visit was prior to the interview between the two kings, as all our historians agree, and as may be proved by incontestible evidence. But this mistake must be accidental; for it would have been more for the French writer's purpose to expose Wolsey, to have stated the fact as it really happened: all the difference is, that, by a proper application to Wolsey, Charles prevented this interview from proving detrimental to his interests, instead of learning what passed therein, and then effacing their effects. Take it either way, the duplicity and falshood is just the same, or rather, in regard to the cardinal, as he changed sides before it, somewhat worse. While Charles was receiving the ensigns of the imperial dignity at Aix-la-Chapelle, and thought himself secure of the pope, who promised to take no advantage of his accession to the imperial diadem, supposed to include the cession of that of Naples, Francis began to treat with him, as if the forfeiture of Charles's title to that crown was a point incontestible. In a little time he concluded an alliance, by which Leo undertook to refuse the investiture to Charles, and to grant it to Francis as soon as he should be in possession, not, however, in favour of himself, but of his second son Henry, upon condition that Gaeta and a large tract of country should be granted to the see of Rome; and that, during the minority of the young prince, the whole realm should be governed by an apostolic legate. Upon the faith of this treaty, Francis begun to make his preparations, and to take his measures<sup>5</sup>.

Francis causes the kingdom of Navarre to be conquered, which is lost again soon after.

As the king could never have a more favourable opportunity than was afforded him by the insurrection of the commons of Castile for the recovery of Navarre, he directed a considerable body of troops to be assembled for that purpose, under the command of Andrew de Foix, Sieur de Esparre, the brother of Monsieur de Lautrec, and the countess de Chateaubrain. As the country was entirely open, after reducing St. Jean de Pie de Port, he met with no farther resistance till he came to Pampeluna, which, together with the citadel, he reduced, after a short siege. It is certain, that, if he had been content with doing all that he was ordered to do, and had bent his thoughts entirely to the keeping of what he had got, the house of Austria had been deprived of Navarre<sup>6</sup>. But being desirous to do more, he undid all that a he had done. On his besieging Logrogno, the nobility of Castile took up arms, and obliged him to raise the siege. Yet he afterwards fought this army within a league of Pampeluna, without staying for a reinforcement of six thousand men, which were in full march towards him; and being defeated and taken prisoner, Pampeluna and the rest of the kingdom was lost, much sooner than they were won<sup>p</sup>. At the time that the flame of war seemed to be put out on this side, it was kindled again on that of the Low Countries, by a very slight occasion, which, in reality, was not so much the cause of the war, as a proof that these two great princes were determined to seize the first opportunity of employing the whole force of their extensive dominions in expressing the inveteracy of their resentments.

SOME years before, the Sieur d'Aimeres and the prince de Chimay had a law suit for the town b of Hierge, in the Ardennes, which had been determined by the peers of the duchy of Bouillon in favour of the prince of Chimay. The Sieur d'Aimeres had lent the emperor a very considerable sum of money during the diet of Francfort, which had been very useful in the great affair of his election; and, instead of repaying this money, the Sieur d'Aimeres was allowed to appeal from the old sentence to the sovereign council at Brabant, who presently summoned the children of the prince of Chimay to appear before their tribunal. This inflamed Robert de la Marck, duke of Bouillon, who was guardian to the children of the prince of Chimay, and had married their aunt, not only for their sakes, but because it attached the sovereignty of his duchy, which, though small, he affirmed to be as much a sovereignty, and as independent, as any other. His brother Erard de la Marck, bishop of Liege, had been formerly strongly attached c to France, and Robert himself had been likewise in that service; but madame d'Angoulesme, the king's mother, having disappointed the bishop of a hat, because she had received a present of fifty thousand crowns to procure it for another, both the bishop and the duke went over to the Spanish interest, and had contributed not a little to the emperor's election. This aggravated, in their opinion, the ill usage they had met with; they therefore reconciled themselves immediately to France; and Robert carried it so far, as to go in person to demand the protection of king Francis. The king, having assured him of it in strong terms, and having probably made him a considerable present, he fell immediately to raising troops, and, having assembled between four and five thousand men, made an irruption into the duchy of Luxembourg, and sent a herald to declare war against the emperor, in his own name, in the face of d the dyet<sup>q</sup>. Charles, upon this, sent an ambassador to expostulate the matter with the king, and another to complain to king Henry of England, as the common umpire between them, of the high insult he had received; but these measures producing no effect, he sent an army, under the command of Henry count of Nassau, to take vengeance of Robert de la Marck.

It was this army that began the war, by reducing Mousson; but they failed of taking Me- zieres, which was defended by the chevalier Baiard: on the other hand, the French took Hesdin, and some other places. King Francis marched with his army directly to Valenciennes, where the emperor lay with his, and, having passed the Schelde, offered him battle, but the emperor retired; and, if the constable Bourbon's advice had been followed, in all probability had suffered a defeat. But the king, prejudiced against him by his mother, rejected the proposition, and gave the command of his van-guard to the duke of Alençon, who had married his sister, which was not only an affront to the constable, but derogatory to the rights of his office<sup>r</sup>. All this time the imperial and French ministers were debating their cause before Henry at Calais, where, at length, a project of a peace was signed, satisfactory to both parties. But the news arriving that admiral Bonivet had taken Fontarabia, the imperialists would hear of nothing unless this city was restored. If the admiral had followed his instructions, there had been no room for any dispute, since he was directed to demolish the place as soon as he was master of it; but he was so fond of his new conquest, and had such an ascendancy over the mind of his master, that the restitution of it was rejected, which cost France a war of thirty-eight years, and such an expence of blood and treasure, as brought her to the very brink of destruction<sup>s</sup>. Before the end of the campaign the emperor took Tournay<sup>t</sup>. In Italy, all things took a wrong turn: pope Leo, after embarrassing the French by his intrigues, at length declared openly against them, and joined his troops to those of the imperialists, in order to restore Francis Sforza to the duchy of Milan. Lautrec, who left his charge to go to court in order to solicit money, was persuaded into a belief that it would be sent after him. But the profusion of the king and his mother absorbed all that was produced by the funds assigned for that purpose; so that for want of pay the Swiss deserted, and the greatest part of the duchy, and even the city, of Milan fell into the hands of the enemy. The joy conceived at this extraordinary success, and the prospect of seeing the French driven out of Italy in another campaign, so hurried the spirits of Leo the tenth, that he fell into a fever, of which he died, which might have been of great advantage to the French in Italy, if those who commanded a their forces in that country had been in a condition to improve any advantage <sup>a</sup>. But, thro' the intrigues then reigning at court, this was not to be done.

More misfortunes which produce inquiries, and these, instead of remedies, acts of injustice.

THE forces of the pope, the emperor, and the duke of Milan, commanded by Prosper Colonna, were by their successes become inferior to those of the viscount de Lautrec, who had been joined by a large body of Swiss, and, therefore, Prosper, to avoid a battle, had intrenched himself at Bicoque, which was an old country seat, with a park and gardens well walled and fenced. Here he intrenched himself strongly; but, in all probability, he must have been forced to surrender with his whole army, if Lautrec had been suffered to pursue his own scheme of cutting off the enemies provisions, and prevented their retreat. But the Swiss, confiding in their numbers and courage, insisted that the French general should either give them their pay, or put an end to the campaign, by attacking the enemy in their posts. As he had no money, he was obliged to do what they would have him, and accordingly attempted to force the enemy in their lines, which, though performed with all the bravery imaginable, yet terminated in the loss of the best officers in his army, and about three thousand Swiss, who, being much dispirited, left him, and retired into their own country <sup>b</sup>. Prosper Colonna, having recovered the superiority, pushed the French so effectually, that, before the close of the campaign, the citadel of Milan, Novara, Pisghitone, and the castle of Genoa, for the city was surprized, were all the French had left <sup>c</sup>. The news of these misfortunes made a strong impression on the French court, and occasioned an enquiry into their causes. Lautrec insisted, that his not being supplied with money, according to the assurances he received, was the sole source of all this misfortune. Upon this, de Baune Semblansai, who had the direction of the finances, was called upon to know what became of the money. He alleged, and very truly, that madame d'Angoulesme, the king's mother, had received it, and appealed to acquittances, which she had given him for it. But those acquittances were not to be found; Gentil, who was his deputy, and who had an amour with one of the duchess's ladies of honour, had stolen and delivered them up. This drew the process into a great length; but, in the end, de Baune Semblansai, an honest venerable old man, whom the king himself had not been ashamed to stile father, was hanged as a public plunderer, and a false accuser <sup>d</sup>. Gentil, for his good service, was promoted to be president of parliament; but, all in good time, met with his proper preferment, that of the gallows. These proceedings did not at all contribute to restore the face of affairs, which, on the contrary, grew every day worse and worse <sup>e</sup>, through the unbounded progress of corruption.

Henry VIII. being solicited for succours, instead of granting them, declares war against France.

A. D. 1522.

AT this time cardinal Wolsey was entirely at the devotion of the emperor Charles, who replaced the great pensions given him by Francis, and many considerable presents besides; in order to merit which, he induced his master to act a very extraordinary part. King Francis, on the first suspicion of his change, sent to king Henry, under his great seal, an exemplification of the treaty subsisting between them, a long detail of the injuries he had suffered from the emperor, and a pressing demand of the succours stipulated by the treaty; in answer to which, Henry sent a herald to declare war; and, in the month of July, debarked a body of English troops at Calais, commanded by the earl of Surry <sup>a</sup>. This invasion did not produce any great effects; for, after lying about six weeks before Hesdin, they were obliged to raise the siege, and suffered considerably in their retreat; yet, in its consequences, this diversion was extremely fatal to the affairs of France. The king found himself so exceedingly distressed for money, that, by the advice of chancellor du Prat, he had recourse to the most destructive methods of raising it, such as mortgaging his domain, creating offices, merely to set them to sale, and many other expedients of a like nature <sup>b</sup>. Towards the close of the year the castle of Genoa was obliged to surrender for want of provisions. The important island of Rhodes fell this year into the hands of the Turks, in consequence of the war amongst the great powers of Christendom, and of the league formed by the pope, the emperor, the king of England, the archduke of Austria, the duke of Milan, the republic of Venice, the state of Florence, and that of Genoa against the French <sup>c</sup>, the loss of which island was irreparable <sup>f</sup>.

The constable Bourbon leaves France and enters into the emperor's service.

THE Spaniards had blocked up Fontarabia, from the time it had fallen into the hands of the French, and James Daillon, Sieur du Lude, had defended it with great spirit and success for near a year, till the marshal de Chabannes arrived with an army, and constrained the enemy to raise the siege. This raised the credit of the king's arms; and his affairs might have taken a more favourable turn, if his mother the duchess of Angoulesme, who had hitherto persecuted the constable, by drawing on him continual mortifications, had not changed her battery, and commenced a suit against him for his whole estate, which was, in all respects, the most con-

- a considerable that any subject possessed in France<sup>d</sup>. The constable was a person of great abilities, determined courage, of a high spirit, strong resentment, and had very great connections. When, therefore, he saw his ruin determined, he entered into a correspondence with the emperor, the king of England, and the rest of the confederates; and finding this discovered, retired privately, and went into the emperor's service<sup>e</sup>. (C). The desertion of such a person occasioned a general consternation; and though there did not immediately happen any insurrection, as was generally expected, yet it had a very bad influence on affairs, and excited such jealousies, that, for the present, the king was forced to suspend the sending succours, as he designed, into Italy, which cost him the few places that were yet held, the commanders of which thought it very excusable to surrender upon tolerable terms, and before they were reduced to such distress as should put it out of their power to expect any terms at all. At length, when it was in a manner too late, the king resolved to send a numerous army into Italy, though by this very step he exposed the rest of his dominions to the most imminent peril, and his subjects to distress and danger, even in his capital<sup>f</sup>.

- b CARDINAL Wolsey was exceedingly displeased with the emperor, upon the election of Adrian the sixth to the papacy; and could not believe that he, who had been the emperor's preceptor, and at the very time of his election at the head of the administration in Spain, could be chosen, as Charles would have it believed, without his interposition or assistance; however, as he was very old, and the emperor still continued his pensions and assurances, the cardinal persisted in his plan, entered into the intrigue with the constable, and concerted a new invasion of France, in conjunction with Charles, in both capacities of emperor and king of Spain; and

(C) The death of Susanna, duchess of Bourbon, April 28, 1521, at the age of thirty, opened the way to those troubles, which compelled, or at least induced, the constable to quit his country, and to enter into the service of the emperor; an affair of such consequence to the French history, that it deserves to be particularly considered. Madame, the king's mother, was about the age of forty-five, and was still, at least in her own opinion, handsome; the constable was about two-and-thirty. She caused it to be insinuated, on the one hand, to Bourbon, what mighty advantages he would reap from the marriage, in case he consented to it; and on the other hand, she gave her son to understand, that she had his interest greatly in view, since, as there was no appearance of issue by this marriage, the vast estates of the house of Bourbon, on the death of the constable, would revert to the crown. Francis, either seeing the thing in this light, or out of an earnest desire of obliging his mother, pressed the constable all he could to forget the many mortifications he had received, and to espouse Madame. The constable not only rejected absolutely all these offers, but likewise gave some disobliging reasons for his distaste, which the king took highly amiss. The duchess of Angoulême being provoked beyond all measure, and ascribing the constable's aversion to the insinuations of Anne, duchess dowager of Bourbon, his mother-in-law, who, notwithstanding the death of her daughter, without leaving any child living, had confirmed, as far as it was in her power, all the cessions made in favour of the marriage, resolved to attack the family settlements, and strip the constable of his vast estates. These consisted chiefly in the duchies of Bourbonnois and Auvergne, and the counties of Montpensier, Clermont, and Fores, some of which, it was pretended, reverted to the crown upon the death of Peter, duke of Bourbon, the last heir of the eldest line; and the rest, in virtue of old family settlements, ought to descend to Madame, as the cousin and heiress of the late duchess Susanna. At the accession of Lewis the twelfth, this matter had been stirred, the duchess Anne was inclined to marry her daughter to the duke of Alençon; and, though she had no great reason to expect that monarch's favour, whom she had imprisoned while duke of Orléans, yet, knowing that the best part of her husband's estates would revert to him, she requested a new grant in favour of that marriage; but the king told her, that Charles, count of Montpensier, was the heir male of the family; and that, in prudence as well as justice, she ought to give her daughter to him; in which case, he was ready to do all that she desired. Upon this, Susanna was given to the constable, then count of Montpensier, and, by the marriage contract, they made reciprocal renunciations of their respective rights in favour of each other, and to the longer liver: it was the cession of Lewis the twelfth that was attacked as prejudicial to the crown, and this marriage contract as inconsistent with the old family settlements. All writers agree, that the duchess of Angoulême's pretensions were unfounded; however, after a long process, her influence was so great, that she obtained from the parliament a sequestration of the lands in question, by which the constable was to be turned out of possession; this, with the death of his mother-in-law, the duchess Anne, daughter to Lewis the eleventh, threw him into despair, and induced him to send Adrian de Croi, count de Rieux, to offer his services to the emperor, who accepted them with great joy, and sent immediately his secretary Beaurain to the constable, to whom he offered his sister Elconora, queen-dowager of Portugal, with a portion of two hundred thousand crowns, and to declare her sole heiress of the house of Austria, in case himself and his brother the archduke Ferdinand died without issue. He further offered to receive him into the league concluded with the king of England, and directed that it should be communicated to him. In the mean time, the king had intelligence in general terms of the intrigue, upon which he took Moulins, where the constable was in his way on his march into Italy. He found him in bed, for he pretended sickness, to avoid attending the king in that expedition; and, having frankly told him what informations he had received, added that he supposed the law-suit had rendered him a male-content, and he did not wonder at it; but assured him, that, if the cause was determined against him, he would restore him his estates. The constable made no difficulty of owning that he had treated with the emperor, thanked the king for his kindness, and promised to follow him to Lyons, and began his journey accordingly in a litter, but turned off upon the road; and, by the assistance of Pomperant, made his escape, but with great difficulty, to Trent, of which, as soon as Charles the fifth had notice, he declared him his lieutenant general in Italy. The discovery of his intrigues hindered Francis from going that year, in person, into that country, and threw the command into the hands of the admiral Bonivet.

this was so well concerted, that it seemed scarce possible their design should miscarry <sup>a</sup>, as the emperor Charles sent a corps of troops through the Franche Compté into Burgundy, where they appeared very unexpectedly, and did a great deal of mischief; but they were at length compelled to retire, by the prudent conduct of the count de Guise, and by their disappointment in not meeting with the assistance they expected from the constable, who, if he had been able to remain in France till his schemes were ripe, had, without question, reduced the monarchy as low as it had ever been, even in the days of Charles the seventh. An English army of about fifteen thousand men, under the command of the duke of Suffolk, debarked at Calais, and was quickly joined by the count de Bure, with the like number of the emperor's troops, in quality of duke of Burgundy. The French having no army to oppose them, they made
A. D. 1523. themselves masters of Bray sur Somme, took Mondidier, burnt Roye, and came within eleven <sup>b</sup> leagues of Paris; but by that time Francis had sent a good body of troops from Lyons, under the command of the duke de Vendosme, upon which the allies retired; and, by the address of Monfieur la Trimouille, were obliged to abandon their design of taking up winter quarters in France. The emperor came, in person, into the kingdom of Navarre, caused his troops to invest Fontarabia, but suddenly, as if he had changed his design, though, in truth, he had only concealed it, ordered his forces to pass the mountains, and besieged Bayonne, into which Lautrec had thrown himself with a small body of troops. The Spaniards attacked it both by land and sea, and for four days successively, but without effect; so that, after ravaging the adjacent country, they raised the siege and retired <sup>c</sup>. It is true, that the enemies of France were every-where disappointed; but it is no less true that France was insulted on every side, the country ravaged, and the people ruined. The admiral Bonivet, with fifteen hundred men at arms, six thousand French foot, as many Lansquenets, and fifteen thousand Swiss, entered Italy, recovered so much of the Milanese as lies on this side the Tessin, relieved Cremona, that is, the castle, the only place that held for them, which, all the officers being dead, was defended by eight private men <sup>d</sup>. By this means an establishment was again made, the king's hopes were raised, and thereby a new fund settled for producing fresh miseries to that kingdom, which had already suffered so often and so deeply by these Italian expeditions.

Medicis suc-

the title of Clement VII.

THE desire as well as the need the emperor had of recovering Fontarabia, induced him to send the constable of Castile and the prince of Orange to make an attempt upon it, tho' they had very little hopes of succeeding. The name of the governor was Frauget; he had a good <sup>e</sup> garrison, every thing requisite for the defence of the place, and the example of Mr. du Lude, who had defended the place for more than a year without any of these advantages; but, being tempted by the offer of good terms, and being a man of no great abilities, for as to his courage it was never suspected, he surrendered the place, for which he was called to an account, and sentenced to be degraded, tho' the fault was not so much his as those who had intrusted him <sup>f</sup>. In Italy, admiral Bonivet was constrained to act on the defensive, which he performed for some time; but at length, finding himself disappointed of the succours he expected, seeing most of the places taken into which he had put garrisons, and being constrained to make the best retreat he could, his army suffered extremely: amongst those who fell was Peter du Ferrail, more famous by the title of the chevalier de Baiard, to whom the whole French nation in his life-time, and all historians since his decease, added this surname, or rather character, Sans Peur et sans Reproche, that is, without fear and without reproach. He was one of the worthiest, as well as one of the bravest men of his age, and one of the ablest officers in France; yet he never rose higher than to be captain of a troop of gens d'arms, which is ascribed to his great probity, and his despising the arts of a court. By the end of April, the French army had repassed the mountains, having not been able to preserve so much as a single castle in the Milanese <sup>e</sup>. Adrian the sixth being dead, cardinal de Medicis was advanced to the see of Rome <sup>f</sup>, by the title of Clement the seventh, and would have laid hold of this opportunity to conclude a peace: with that view he sent his legate into England, where he might have succeeded, if it had not been for Wolsey, who yet did not oppose it because he disliked the measure, or thought the conjuncture improper, but because he was resolved the pope should have nothing to do in it, and with a view of having himself the merit of it with king Francis, and the reputation with all Europe.

HOWEVER, he represented for the present to his master, that he had a favourable opportunity of humbling France for ever, by dividing it into two kingdoms, and having, at least, one of the princes for his feudatory. A treaty accordingly was concluded on this plan, in favour of the constable of Bourbon, to whom the king furnished money, the emperor troops, and himself the hopes of a great revolt, as soon as he should appear with a force sufficient to

- a protect his adherents. His own scheme was to march directly to Lyons, and thence into the provinces where his estates lay, fully persuaded that most of his vassals would join him. But the emperor, who furnished him both with an army and a fleet, insisted that he should enter Provence, and besiege Marseilles, which he at length consented to do, because he could not do otherwise<sup>a</sup>. He passed the mountains in the midst of summer, reduced Antibes, Frejus, Grasse, without a stroke, Brignolles after a short resistance, upon which Aix and Toulon submitted. By the middle of August he appeared before Marseilles, and besieged it forty days; but when he had made a breach, and commanded the troops to make an assault, they refused to obey, chiefly through the jealousy of the marquis of Pescaro; so that, after all, hearing that the king was in full march to its relief, he was constrained to raise the siege, and to retire into
- b Italy<sup>c</sup>. If Francis had been content with his good fortune, he might have repaired his past disgraces, and have made an honourable peace. But, being at the head of between thirty and forty thousand men, and having most of the princes of his blood and the great lords about him, he proposed, by the advice of admiral Bonivet, that they should pass the mountains likewise, and recover the duchy of Milan, which, though contrary to the advice of the wiser and better part of his officers, was resolved and executed, because it was his pleasure<sup>d</sup>. He left his mother, as before, regent in his absence, though the expedition was much against her will, and he had even altered his route to avoid seeing her, for fear her arguments might dissuade him. He met with all the success he could expect, made himself master of Milan, and the greatest part of the country, engaged the Pope to quit his alliance with the emperor, and that
- c he might drive his enemies at once out of that part of the country, besieged Pavia, though it was winter, and his own army stood in much need of rest and refreshment<sup>e</sup>.

THE city of Pavia was in itself strong by situation, well fortified, had in it a very strong garrison of Spanish and German foot, commanded by Antonio de Leva, justly esteemed one of the bravest men and one of the best captains in the emperor's service. It must, however, be allowed, that the king did not want as gallant and as experienced officers in his army; perhaps he had but too many, as may be gathered from his changing the manner of his attack more than once, which was one great cause of the length of the siege. It is, however, certain, that, tho' very plausible reasons might be assigned for them, yet the king committed several, and some say great, mistakes in the conduct of this siege, in which he plainly departed from his first principle, which was the importance of taking Pavia, a point that ought to have been thoroughly considered before he invested it, and never drawn into question afterwards. He first of all detached the marquis of Saluces, to carry on the war on the side of Genoa, which he did with great prudence and success; but this no way compensated the absence of that corps of troops which he commanded. After this, by the advice of the Pope, who, it is very probable, gave him this advice with good intention, he made another detachment of six hundred men at arms, a proportionable number of light horse, and four thousand foot, to make a diversion in the kingdom of Naples, which, it was supposed, would draw the imperial army, under the command of the viceroy Lannoy, out of the Milanese; which it was very near doing, but did not<sup>f</sup>. The duke of Bourbon brought twelve thousand Germans, hired with his own and with the emperor's money, to the camp of the enemy, by which their army was rendered superior to the king's. Francis, as soon as he was informed of this, recalled the duke of Albany; but receiving afterwards a reinforcement of Swiss and Grisons, countermanded those orders<sup>g</sup>.

THE enemy had their difficulties; the place was reduced to the last extremity, the bulk of the garrison consisted of Germans, they had mutinied for want of pay, and the governor, Antonio de Leva, was so distressed by them, that it was suspected he had poisoned their general, as the only means to prevent their giving up the place. The difficulties were as great or greater in the army, where the foreign troops were ready to mutiny every hour for want of pay. This induced the viceroy, the marquis de Pescara, and the duke of Bourbon, first to make an attempt upon Milan, in which la Trimouille had a good garrison, and, if they missed taking the place, to attack the king in his camp<sup>h</sup>. Francis was aware of this, and had deliberated more than once how his affairs were to be conducted; his best officers were clearly of opinion, that he ought to raise the siege, and to take the properest methods for refreshing and augmenting his army. Pope Clement, whose interest was now become the same with the king's, gave the like advice to his minister at Rome. The king thought his honour at stake; and that, having besieged Pavia, he could not rise from before it without disgrace. On this occasion, Trimouille laid down a short and decisive maxim, that the point of honour in war is success; and that no reasons can ever justify a defeat. He shewed him, that in fighting he risked all his army, his person, and even his kingdom; that in raising the siege he risked nothing; and, his own circumstances, and those of his enemies considered, was sure of success.

But the admiral Bonivet undertook to dispose his forces in such a manner as should infallibly reduce the place, and in which the enemy durst not attack; and this Francis approved<sup>a</sup>. Others assert the king had written to one of his mistresses, that he would return to her after taking Pavia; and that this silly motive determined him to risk all, rather than raise the siege<sup>w</sup>. Be that as it will, he soon saw, or at least might have seen, reasons sufficient to alter his resolution. The Grisons in his camp were recalled to defend their own country; he was constrained to bring almost all the troops that were in Milan into his lines, which when he had fortified with all possible care, the generals of the emperor's army resolved to attack, sure, if they gained a victory, to relieve Pavia, and recover the duchy of Milan; and as sure, that, if they did not attempt this, their army would crumble and drop to pieces of itself. In this, therefore, they acted wisely, and took that advantage of Francis which he might have taken of them.

The battle of Pavia, in which Francis was defeated and taken prisoner.

On the 24th of February, the feast of St. Matthias, and the emperor's birth-day, they attacked the castle and park of Merabel, in which the king's rear-guard was posted, under the command of the duke of Alençon, which they thought themselves secure of carrying, in case the king did not advance to its relief, and, if he did, he must lose the advantage of those works which both he and they considered as impregnable. The armies were pretty equal, and made together near fifty thousand men. What they expected came to pass; the king no sooner saw his brother attacked and in danger, than he marched to his assistance<sup>x</sup>. At the beginning, the advantage was on the side of the French, arising chiefly from the smart fire of their artillery, well posted, and well served; the Spanish infantry, unable to sustain it, began to give way. The king, to improve this good fortune, marched to attack them through a hollow way; but, being between them and his batteries, he lost the benefit of his artillery; and, the viceroy marching with his gens d'armes, and a good body of foot to sustain them, he was himself very soon in great distress. His own horse failed in their duty; the Swiss, contrary to custom, gave way<sup>y</sup>. The king behaved with great intrepidity, and Francis of Lorraine, brother to the duke, and Richard de la Pole, the last of the house of Suffolk, who had brought up the Lansquenets to his assistance, were killed by his side; the admiral de Bonivet had the same fate, and was not at all regretted; Galeas de St. Severin, master of the horse, and another of the same name, great master of the household, were slain at the same time and in the same place, where fell also the great Lewis de la Trimouille, at the age of seventy-five; the marshal de Foix, and the bastard of Savoy, covered with wounds, were taken prisoners, and died in a few days<sup>z</sup>. The count de St. Pol fell at the king's feet, and was taken up for dead by a Spaniard, who had a mind to a ring upon his finger, which attempting to cut off, he revived, and afterwards recovered. The king, having killed five with his own hand before he fell from his horse, and two after he rose from the ground, surrendered himself at length to the viceroy Lannoy. The French lost between nine and ten thousand men in the field, and, amongst them, a multitude of persons of distinction, besides those before-mentioned; the king of Navarre, and many others of the first rank were taken<sup>a</sup>.

The sad condition of France.

We must now turn our eyes to France, in order to see what passed there after this misfortune, the news of which was sent through that kingdom to Spain, by the viceroy of Naples; the person charged with the dispatches having a safe conduct from king Francis: he wrote also to the regent by the same conveyance; and as, under such circumstances, the reader may be desirous to see what the king wrote, we will transcribe his epistle, which contained only these words, "Madam, our honour excepted, we have lost all<sup>b</sup>." The duchess of Angoulesme found herself excessively embarrassed on all sides, the kingdom being without a monarch, without forces, without officers, without resources, without allies, and surrounded by enemies on every side. The Flemish troops were making continual inroads; many thousand boors, inspired by an unaccountable enthusiasm, were assembling in Alsace, in order to make an irruption; so much the more to be apprehended, as it was equally impossible to find means to prevent or to repel it. Henry the eighth had assembled a great army, and seemed to be on the point of embarking them for an invasion; and, as if all this had not been enough to distract and overwhelm her, there was a party in the kingdom who had formed a design of dispossessing her of the regency, in order to confer it upon the duke of Vendosme<sup>c</sup>. It happened very fortunately for her and for France, that this prince, who, after the constable, was the head of the house of Bourbon, was so generous as to forget, not only the injuries that had been done his family, but his interests. He went himself to Lyons, to assure the regent that he had no views but for her service, and that of his country; upon which she formed a council of the ablest heads in the kingdom, and of this she made him president<sup>d</sup>. The famous Andrew Doria sailed with the French galleys, to take on board the poor remains of the French troops, under the duke of Alva, whom he landed safely in France. Those who escaped out of the Milanese found also their way back as soon and as well as they could: the duke of Alençon broke his

- a heart, on account of the reproaches cast upon him for his behaviour at the battle of Pavia; the marquis of Saluces, though he lost his country, preserved his credit and his troops intire<sup>e</sup>. Henry the eighth, under the influence of Wolsey, acted a very singular part; he resolved not to oppress the oppressed, assured the regent that she had nothing to fear from him; and at the same time advised her to consent to no treaty by which France was to be dismembered: but he used another language to the emperor; he gave him to understand that the time was now come when this puissant monarchy lay at their mercy; and, therefore, insisted that so fair an opportunity should not be let slip; that, for his part, he would content himself with Normandy, Guienne, and Gascony, and hoped the empire would make no scruple of owning him for king of France, adding, he expected the emperor should make a right use of his victory, by entering
- b Guienne in person, with a numerous army, in which case he was ready to bear half the expences of the war. He foresaw what fell out; the emperor was alarmed at these conditions, did not care to have him for a neighbour; and, therefore, agreed to a truce with the regent for six months; and, to shew how little solicitous he was about the friendship of England, he negotiated a marriage for himself with the king of Portugal's sister, notwithstanding he was bound by treaties to marry the princess Mary, Henry's daughter<sup>f</sup>. This gave the king the occasion he wanted, and, on the 30th of August, he signed three treaties with the French plenipotentiaries (D). In Picardy, the Flemings were repulsed; and the count de Guise, with the duke of Lorraine, had the good fortune, with a handful of troops, to defeat and cut to pieces the German peasants. Let us now return to king Francis in his confinement, of which we shall
- c treat more succinctly, as we have had occasion to consider it already in another place; our business here being to continue the personal history of king Francis.

THE king was no sooner taken, than the great officers of the emperor's army began to make their court to him; and, as might be expected, were well received. The duke of Bourbon, indeed, found some difficulty; but at length the king saw and conversed, and, some writers say, was reconciled to him<sup>g</sup>. Amongst them all, the marquis de Pescara was the best received; instead of going, as the rest did, in great splendor, he appeared in mourning, affected so deep a concern, and treated the king with such profound respect, that Francis could not refuse his good graces to this lord, esteemed one of the greatest captains, one of the ablest statesmen, but withal the most artificial man in the world<sup>h</sup>. While in the castle of Pisigbitone, d Francis had proposed to the emperor, that, to purchase his liberty, he would renounce all pretensions to the kingdom of Naples, and to the duchy of Milan, relinquish the homage due to him for the counties of Artois and Flanders, concur in reducing under his obedience whatever

(D) There were in all five treaties signed at Moore, on the 30th of August, 1525. The first contained a defensive league between France and England, against all powers, spiritual, or temporal, that should invade either of the two kingdoms. The allies of the two kings were included, by name, in the league, with the limitation that this article was not to be understood of those who had usurped any thing upon either of the two principal contractors, since the league concluded at London, October the 1st, 1518. Hence the emperor, who had lately conquered the duchy of Milan, was excluded. Besides, Henry engaged to use his best endeavours to procure the liberty of Francis. The second treaty concerned the payment of the sums due to Henry from the king of France, viz. 1. By a treaty of the 7th of August, 1515, one million of crowns of gold. 2. By another of the 12th of January, 1518, for restitution of Tournay, five hundred thousand crowns of gold. 3. By another of the same date, twenty-three thousand livres Tournois. 4. By another of November 13th, 1520, four hundred sixty-two thousand crowns. For all these sums the regent bound herself, in the king her son's name, to pay Henry two millions of crowns of gold, of thirty-five pence Tournois each, which, being reduced to crowns de Soleil, of thirty-eight pence, amounted to the sum of eighteen hundred and ninety-four thousand seven hundred thirty-six pounds and thirty-two pence, Tournois. This sum was to be paid at several times; viz. forty-seven thousand three hundred sixty crowns within forty days after the date of the treaty, the like sum on the first of November, and the same every six months, till the whole was paid. This made, in all, forty payments, consequently the whole sum must be paid in twenty years. It was farther agreed by the same treaty, that if Henry died before he had received the two millions, the arrears were to be paid to his heirs and successors; but, in case he outlived the payment of the whole, he should receive, during life, a yearly pension of a hundred thousand crowns, to cease at his death. To secure the performance of the treaty, the regent was to swear to it solemnly before the English ambassadors and Francis the first was to ratify and swear to it immediately after his return into France. Besides, Henry had for security the cardinal of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendosme and Longueville, the earls of St. Paul, Maulevrier, Brienne, the lords of Montmorency, Lautrec, and Breze, the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Toulouse, Amiens, Bordeaux, Tours, and Rheims. It must be observed, that in the sum of two millions of crowns due to Henry, there was no deduction of what he had received from Francis the first, from the year 1515 to their rupture. This was all the advantage Henry made, which was not very great, considering how little punctual the king of France was in his payments. By a third treaty, the regent engaged to pay to Mary, Henry's sister, queen-dowager of France, all the arrears of her dowry at several payments; namely, five thousand crowns within forty days after the date of the treaty, and a like sum every six months, till the whole was discharged. Moreover, she promised to let her enjoy her dowry for the future. There was also a fourth treaty, which ran, that the king of Scotland should be reckoned in the number of the allies of France; but on condition the Scots committed no act of hostility against England, after the twenty-fifth of December next. Lastly, by a fifth treaty, it was agreed, that the court of France should consent, neither directly nor indirectly, that the duke of Albany should return into Scotland during the minority of James the fifth.

Charles claimed in Italy, furnish an army and a fleet as often as the emperor should go in that quality into that country, and, lastly, as he was now a widower, would espouse the queen-dowager of Portugal, Charles's elder sister, accepting the duchy of Burgundy as her dowry, which should pass to the children of that marriage<sup>1</sup>. These propositions were scornfully rejected by the emperor, who treated the titles to Milan and Naples with contempt, insinuated that he stood in no need of the king's assistance, and insisted that he could not consider, as a ransom, yielding those things to which he had an incontestable right. On the other hand, the terms he proposed were, that Francis should make a cession of the duchy of Burgundy, purely and simply give Dauphiné, Provence, and the Lyonnois, to the duke of Bourbon, without the reservation of any homage, to be erected into a kingdom; and should likewise give satisfaction to the English; to which Francis answered he would first die in a prison<sup>k</sup>. In the mean time there appeared no small difficulty in keeping him there. The princes of Italy began to cabal for his deliverance; and if the Pope had not been frightened into paying the imperialists money, but, on the contrary, had employed it in levying Swiss troops, the face of affairs had been quickly changed. To carry him from Genoa to Naples, by sea, was unsafe, because of the French fleet; to carry him by land more difficult, since the princes of Italy might easily have rescued him: but the viceroy Lannoy removed all these obstacles, by persuading them to make it his own choice to go to Spain on board his own galleys, manned by Spaniards, on a supposition that, when he came to treat directly with the emperor, face to face, all difficulties would be removed. This was done in the midst of June; but at his arrival in Spain he found himself miserably deceived, in being confined in the castle of Madrid, without so much as seeing the emperor; at length, falling sick of grief, the emperor, fearing to lose all by his death, went to visit and to comfort him<sup>l</sup>. His beloved sister, the duchess of Alençon, who was in all respects one of the most amiable women of that age, came to console, and at the same time to counsel him. She, in a short time, had so many lovers, and so many creatures in the emperor's court, that he knew not how to act; and, by her advice, the king seemed to give up all, instructing her, at her return, to cause the dauphin to be proclaimed king, and to abandon him, rather than his people, to distress and misery. But under all this were couched a variety of intrigues, for the king's escape, reviving the war in Italy, and for depriving Charles of his own kingdom, and giving it to his own general, the marquis de Pescara; contrivances which so amazed the emperor, though himself a deep politician, that he took a resolution of causing her to be arrested the very day her safe conduct expired, which when she had defeated by travelling night and day, and he heard of the king of Navarre's escape out of the castle of Pavia, he determined to make an end of the treaty, by obliging Francis to purchase his liberty upon as high terms as possible<sup>m</sup>: in which he acted contrary to the advice of the wisest of his council, who foresaw that all the advantages would be defeated, and the resentment remain.

At the entrance of the year this great affair was adjusted, the treaty bearing date at Madrid<sup>n</sup>, on the 14th of January; it was in all respects as advantageous to the emperor, as disastrous to the king, and as prejudicial to the French nation as it well could be (E). Those who say that the king's patience was tired out, and that he was determined to gain his liberty at any rate, which he might have done upon much easier terms, if he could have brought himself to bear his captivity with patience, do much more credit to him and to those who advised him, than such as pretend not barely to excuse, but to vindicate his conduct, which certainly was very irregular as well as extraordinary. He protested before certain notaries and witnesses, whom he could trust before he signed it, that what he did was against his will, under a force; and therefore null and void. A month after the signing the treaty, during all which time he remained as close a prisoner as before, the viceroy of Naples came into his chamber just as an ague-fit

(E) The principal articles of this treaty, so much exclaimed against, were these: That the king of France should marry queen Leonora, the emperor's sister, and have with her two hundred thousand crowns of gold. That Francis should be released on the 10th of March, and the same day should deliver to the emperor his two sons in hostage. That he should resign to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy, in full sovereignty. That he should desist from the homage the emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois. That he should renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Asti, Tournay, Lisie, and Hesdin, &c. That he should persuade Henry d'Albret to resign the kingdom of Navarre to the emperor, or at least should give him no assistance. That within forty days he should restore the duke of Bourbon and all his party to their estates. That he should restore Philibert de Chalons, prince of Orange, and Michael Antonio de Saluzzo, to their principalities. That he should give no sort of assistance to the duke of Gueldres, and, after that prince's death, should use his best endeavours to cause his towns to fall into the emperor's lands. That he should pay the king of England five hundred thousand crowns which the emperor owed him. That when the emperor went to Italy to receive the imperial crown, he should lend him twelve galleys, four large ships, and a land army; or two hundred thousand crowns instead of the army. Lastly, he promised, upon the word and honour of a prince, to execute all these articles; or, in case of non-performance, to return prisoner into Spain.

- a left him, and told him he was come to espouse him, as proxy for the queen-dowager Eleanor, though that princess was then within a few miles of Madrid; the emperor afterwards conducted him to see his future spouse; and, after the visit, sent him back to his prison, notwithstanding the great repugnance he expressed<sup>o</sup>. On the 21st of February, after exacting from his own mouth the strongest assurances that he would adhere literally to the treaty, under pretence of conducting him a little way on the road, the emperor took leave of him, and sent him under a strong guard to the frontiers: there he was exchanged against his two eldest sons, put into the hands of the Spaniards, without their being suffered to take leave of him<sup>p</sup>. The viscount de Lautrec received him; and as soon as he set foot into his own dominions, he mounted a fleet Turkish horse, and rode full gallop to St. John de Luz; there taking a little refreshment, he proceeded with all possible dispatch to Bayonne, where he found the regent and the whole court overjoyed at his return<sup>q</sup>.

- He immediately signed the bonds stipulated by the treaty, which the regent had made with Henry the eighth, and at the same time wrote in the strongest terms to thank that monarch for the share he had in his deliverance<sup>r</sup>. He was strongly solicited by the Spaniards to ratify the treaty of Madrid; but he refused, alleging, that many things were contained therein which regarded his subjects, and it was requisite for him to know their sentiments, and how far it would be in his power to comply with them, before he entered into any fresh engagements. Within the space of two months he entered into the holy league, which was calculated to reduce the emperor's power, to settle the quiet of Italy, and to vacate the hardest part of the treaty of Madrid<sup>s</sup>. In the month of June he publicly received remonstrances from the state of Burgundy, in which they told him, without ceremony, that he had done what he had no right to do, in breach of the laws, and of his coronation oath; adding, that if he persisted in his resolution of throwing them under a foreign yoke, they must appeal to the general states of the kingdom. He received these remonstrances in a public audience, the viceroy of Naples and other Spanish ministers present, who, perceiving the end aimed at, expostulated with him in pretty warm terms. At length the viceroy told him, that he had now king John had done in a like case; to which the king replied, that king John did well and right; that he returned to a king, who had used him like a king, and treated with him as a king; but that at Madrid he had received such usage as would have been unbecoming to a gentleman; that he had often declared to the emperor's ministers, that the terms they extorted from him were unjust and impracticable; but that he was still willing to do all that was fit and reasonable, and to ransom his sons at the rate of two millions of gold, in lieu of the duchy of Burgundy<sup>t</sup>.

- HITHERTO the treaty for the tranquillity of Italy had been kept secret, in hopes the emperor would have consented to some mitigation of that of Madrid; but now, the reason of the thing lying the other way, it was judged most expedient to proclaim it, though the viceroy of Naples and the Spanish lords were still at the French court. It was stiled the Holy League, because the Pope was at the head of it; the king, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, were the contracting parties<sup>u</sup>. Henry of England was admitted in the superior title of Protector; it was wholly defensive, and the emperor was at liberty to enter into it, provided he accepted the king's offer of two millions for the release of his children, and left the duke of Milan, and the rest of the princes of Italy, in quiet possession of their dominions. It is the common misfortune of all leagues, that the powers who enter into them keep their own particular interests in view, and, by endeavouring to accommodate their measures to them, defeat the general end of the confederacy<sup>v</sup>. This was the case here. The king's great point was to obtain his children upon the terms he had proposed; and he was desirous of knowing what hopes there were of that before he acted against the monarch who had them in his power. By this slowness the duke of Milan and Pope Clement were sacrificed. The former was obliged to surrender to the duke of Bourbon, and the latter was surprised by the Colonnas, both of which would have been prevented, if French succours had entered Italy in time<sup>w</sup>. A. D. 1526.

MARGARET, duchess dowager of Alençon, the king's sister, espoused Henry the second, king of Navarre, and king Francis gave his brother hopes of affording him powerful assistance for the recovery of his dominions<sup>x</sup>. In the spring, the king sent a splendid embassy, composed of the bishop of Tarbes, the viscount de Turenne, and the president de Viste, to London, where they concluded a new treaty<sup>y</sup>. But while these negotiations were carrying on, the duke of Bourbon sacked Rome, and, though he was killed in mounting the breach, his army, under the command of the prince of Orange, became masters of the place, and of the person of the Pope. It is by no means clear, that Bourbon had the emperor's orders for this expedition; on the contrary, it seems to have been dictated to him by necessity, his army being become what the companies were in the days of king John; and some have suggested, that if he had survived this enterprize, he would have marched into the kingdom of Naples, and have either seized it for himself, or have made his peace, by restoring it to the king his master<sup>b</sup>. Be that as it will, the news made way for another treaty between the kings of France and England, by which they engaged to send thirty thousand foot, and a thousand gens d'arms, into Italy<sup>c</sup>. But before the Pope received any advantage from these stipulations, he was forced to deliver up almost every place of any consequence that was in his possession, agree to pay a ransom of four hundred thousand crowns, and to remain a prisoner till this treaty was executed. At length, in the beginning of the month of August, marshal Lautrec arrived in the Milaneſe, with a numerous army; the king, about the same time, concluded a third treaty with Henry<sup>d</sup>. Genoa surrendered, and declared once more for France; the best part of the Milaneſe was conquered by marshal Lautrec, and fairly given up to the duke<sup>e</sup>. In September there was a fourth treaty concluded with Henry, some articles of which are worth the reader's notice. The arms of the confederates prevailed in Italy, where, on the second of October, marshal Lautrec took Pavia by assault; and, in the first transports of their fury, the French revenged themselves cruelly on that place, for the defeat which they had suffered before it<sup>f</sup>. He afterwards passed the Po; upon which the duke of Ferrara and the marquis of Mantua quitted the party of the emperor, and embraced that of the allies. In consequence of this change of affairs, the Pope recovered his liberty, not by treaty, but by stealing out of the castle of St. Angelo<sup>g</sup>. This year the princess Renee was contracted to Hercules de Este; and the parliament, after several letters of jussion, registered the letters patents, by which the county of Guise was erected into a dukedom and peerage, in favour of Claude de Lorrain, brother to the duke of that title<sup>h</sup>.

Francis and Charles defame each other.

ACCORDING to the agreement between the two kings, Francis and Henry, their ambassadors went into Spain, attended each of them by a herald, in order to summon the emperor to accept the terms which had been offered him; and, in case of refusal, to declare war. It seems, the emperor's answer was foreseen at the court of France; and therefore king Francis had previously called together an assembly of the notables, that is, persons of the several ranks of his people, upon whom he could depend, and in whom he could confide; he proposed to them the great question, whether he was bound to perform the treaty of Madrid, or whether, if he did not perform it, he was obliged in honour to return to Spain<sup>i</sup>. That assembly pronounced in favour of the negative on both points; they said, that Burgundy was united to the crown of France, and that he could not separate it by his own authority; that his person also was the property of the public, of which, therefore, he could not dispose; but, for the two millions, which they looked upon as a just equivalent, they undertook it should be raised for his service<sup>k</sup>. When the ambassadors had delivered their proposition, and the heralds had declared their message to the emperor publicly, Charles, as we have shewn in another place, treated the English herald with respect, and the herald from France with contempt, intimating, that Francis had broke his word, and that, as he had been before given to understand, there was but one way of ending such disputes between men of honour<sup>l</sup>.

New turn of affairs in Italy.

WHEN this was reported to the king, he was extremely angry, sent a challenge to the emperor, conceived in very coarse terms; and when an answer was returned by Charles's herald, refused to hear it, alleging, that his safe conduct was limited to the proposal of a proper field, where they might terminate this quarrel, and, therefore, he would hear him speak to that, and nothing else: if both these princes had not, upon other occasions, given indisputable proofs of their personal courage, this proceeding, which could have no other end than to raise a high opinion of it, would certainly have had a very different effect<sup>m</sup>. In Italy, Odet de Foix, marshal de Lautrec, reduced all the kingdom of Naples, except Gaeta and the capital, while Phillippin Doria beat the imperial viceroy Moncada at sea, and killed him; so that all things seemed to go prosperously; but the face of events quickly changed, an epidemic sickness prevailed in the French army that blocked up Naples, and, from twenty-five thousand foot, and eight hundred men at arms, reduced them to one hundred men at arms, and four thousand foot<sup>n</sup>. Marshal Lautrec himself died, rather of chagrin than any other disease; he was never fortunate, nor had a high opinion of his own merit, and had taken this command against his will; the king of England and the state of Venice refusing their concurrence to this expedition, if he had it not. His grief proceeded from his being ill supplied, and very indifferently supported by the Venetians; the marquis of Saluces, who took the command upon his death, raised the blockade of Naples, and retired to Averso, where, to save the handful of troops he had left, he rendered himself prisoner to the prince of Orange<sup>o</sup>. ther

- a ther misfortune, not inferior to this, happened about the same time. Andrew Doria, one of the greatest captains, and one of the worthiest men this age had produced, offered king Francis two hundred thousand crowns in gold, to have the disposal of the government of Genoa, and for the town and port of Savona. It was not through interest or ambition that he sought this, but out of a generous design of restoring liberty to his native country, and putting into her hands a place that was like to become her rival<sup>p</sup>: there was no reason the king should not have done this in return for the great services rendered him by Doria; but he had given the customs of the port of Savona to his favourite Anne de Montmorency; and the chancellor du Prat, to make his court to the favourite, represented this proposal as faucy and seditious, advising that the command of the gallies should be taken from Doria, and his person secured. Monsieur de Barbesieux was sent to Genoa for this purpose, to whom Doria delivered the king's gallies, but carried his own into the service of the emperor, and quickly recovered both Genoa and Savona<sup>q</sup>. The count de St. Pol coming, however, with a fresh body of troops into the Milanese, recovered several places from the imperialists, and revived a little the drooping hopes of the allies, who saw that a peace, made under such circumstances, would be their ruin<sup>r</sup>.

- ALL the French writers concur in giving Francis the character of an open, generous, and candid prince; but, at the same time, they record facts which are not very consistent with these praises; it may be he was naturally so; and that, in political points, he suffered himself to be governed by his ministers. The reader may possibly think this a poor apology; if he does, perhaps he will not be displeased to know that the writer is of the same opinion. The king instructed his ministers to press the allies to make their utmost efforts, which they could not do without his making at the same time promises of great succours, and giving them also assurances that he would act with vigour<sup>s</sup>. He sent, in all probability, the like instructions to his generals; so that thus far all was of a piece: but, at the same time, all that was meant by it was, obtaining better terms in the conclusion of a peace than on the carpet. The use, therefore, this great king made of his allies, was, to mislead them into measures that might turn to his profit at their expence. In consequence of these orders, the few forces he had left in Calabria acted very chearfully, in conjunction with the Venetians, as the count de St. Pol did with the troops of the same state, under the command of the duke of Urbino, and with the duke of Milan in the Milanese, till his army was intirely routed, and himself, chiefly by his own fault, taken by Don Antonio Leva, at the battle of Landriano, on the 22d of June<sup>t</sup>. This event contributed to the conclusion of the treaty at Cambray. This has been stiled, with propriety enough, the ladies peace, since it was intirely negotiated by the princess Margaret of Savoy, governess of the Low Countries, on the behalf of the emperor, and Madame, the French king's mother<sup>u</sup>. It was published on the 5th of August; and by this peace, instead of the possession, the emperor contented himself with reserving his rights on the duchy of Burgundy, and the two millions of crowns that had been so often mentioned; of these he was to receive one million two hundred thousand in ready money, upon delivering the prince's lands in Flanders; belonging to the house of Bourbon, computed at four hundred thousand, and the other four hundred thousand was to be paid by France, in discharge of the emperor's debt to the king of England. Francis was likewise to discharge the penalty of five hundred thousand crowns, which the emperor had incurred by not marrying his niece, the princess Mary of England, and to release the rich fleur de lys, many years before pawned by the house of Burgundy for fifty thousand crowns<sup>v</sup>. The town and castle of Hesdin was also yielded; together with the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and all the king's pretensions in Italy.

- As for the allies of France, they were abandoned to the emperor's mercy, without the least stipulation in their favour, and, which was more extraordinary, the bishop of Tarbes was actually soliciting the republic of Venice to prosecute the war, when the senate received advice of this peace. But, to be consistent, or rather inconsistent, in every thing, Francis protested against the validity of this treaty before he ratified it, as his attorney general did, before it was registred in parliament; but both with the greatest privacy imaginable<sup>x</sup>. Henry of England received the news coldly, and might probably have discovered his dislike in stronger terms; but, at the same time the news was communicated, the French ambassador added, that his master had a great influence over his universities, and would very gladly employ it to gratify his brother Henry. His majesty of England took this so kindly, that he remitted the emperor's penalty of half a million of crowns; and, as a farther instance of his generosity, sent the famous fleur de lys as a present to Henry duke of Orleans, his godson<sup>y</sup>. It happened very luckily for the Italians, that great troubles broke out about this time in Germany, and the Turks invaded Hungary, which induced the emperor to deal justly with them, and to leave

Sforza in possession of the duchy of Milan, which, otherwise, there is the strongest probability he would not have done. a

The children of Francis delivered, and his queen brought into France.

At this time the marshal de Montmorency was in the zenith of his favour, and therefore was chosen by the king to carry the money, which was to be paid to the emperor, and to receive his children and his consort. The king went to Bordeaux, while the marshal went to Fontarabia, where he settled all things with the constable of Castile; and towards the end of the month of June, the exchange was made at the same place, and with the same ceremony used at the deliverance of the king about four years before <sup>2</sup>. Francis went to meet his children and his queen, and, after the marriage ceremonies were performed, made a public entry with her into Bordeaux. She was at this time about thirty, no great beauty; but she had good sense, and by distinguishing the marquis de Montmorency, who was the king's favourite, she had an influence in the court, which she would not otherwise have had as queen <sup>3</sup>. The return of peace gave the king an opportunity of distinguishing himself in a way that did him great honour. We have spoken of the care taken by his mother of his education; and though business and amusements had left him little or no time to make himself a scholar, yet he had a general knowledge in, and a true taste for, the sciences. William Budé, one of the greatest lawyers of that age, and a very able statesman, John du Bellay bishop of Paris, and afterwards cardinal, and Peter du Chastel who became bishop of Mâcon, had acquired and maintained themselves in the king's good graces by assisting him in his studies. The king gave them, from time to time, heads of what he desired to understand; and it was their business to instruct him by succinct, methodical, and clear discourses, which were commonly read to him at or after his meals. John Lascaris, a Greek, of a most noble family, by procuring him many valuable manuscripts, laid the foundation of a royal library, to which a printing-house was added. By the advice of these great men, he erected chairs for Hebrew and Greek professors, in the university of Paris, which were first filled by Francis Vatable and Peter Danés. By these, and other acts of the same nature, he obtained the glorious title of FATHER and RESTORER OF LETTERS <sup>4</sup>, which he would have deserved still better, if he had followed his own inclination, and had built a college for six hundred students, with proper endowments, from which he was dissuaded by the chancellor du Prat, who told him that the war with the emperor was only suspended, and that arms would produce a better return than books. b

THIS year was fatal to some great persons, who have been often mentioned in this history. d
Margaret of Austria died in the Low Countries. The French say she never forgot the affront offered her by Charles the eighth, in sending her back when he married the heiress of Bretagne; and to this æra the hatred of France to the house of Austria is commonly referred. The old duke of Milan breathed his last in France, where he had lived quietly, while all Europe was disturbed with disputes about his dominions. Philibert de Châlons, prince of Orange, was killed at the siege of Florence, which, after a gallant defence of eleven months, submitted to receive Alexander de Medicis at the emperor's hand, for their master, who espoused the natural daughter of that monarch <sup>5</sup>. c

Death of the duchess of Angoulême.

THE coronation of the queen, and her public entry into Paris, having gratified the people with shews and feasts, the king thought it expedient, for his honour and their safety, to appoint judges by a special commission, who were to travel through the kingdom, and hold what the French call Les Grands Jours, which is pretty near the same with our assizes, wherein they judged all causes without appeal, and by that means redressed innumerable grievances which had crept in during the king's imprisonment, and other disorders in the government <sup>6</sup>. In the month of September died Madame, the king's mother, to whom the historian of Savoy <sup>7</sup> gives as high a character as words can well express; but the French writers, who consider that, by her piques against the constable of Bourbon and the viscount de Lautrec, she lost the duchy of Milan twice; that, by her intrigues, Semblançais, one of the wisest and most virtuous ministers France ever had, was brought to an unjust and ignominious death; and that she was the great support of chancellor du Prat, whose character was of another cast, they are not quite so lavish in her praises <sup>8</sup>; however, they acknowledge, that, during the king's imprisonment, she governed well, and that they were indebted to her for the peace of Cambray, of which the nation stood in great need; for though king Henry of England bore a part in the expence of the war, yet he only did this by discounting from the French debt, so that it did not ease the people at all. e

Francis is very desirous of uniting the noble duchy of Bretagne forever to the crown.

THE king had been long desirous of uniting the duchy of Bretagne to his crown, in some more effectual manner than by all the cessions that had hitherto been made. He consulted upon this, as upon every affair of state, his oracle du Prat, who studied the point diligently; and though expedients were his talent, yet he found this business so perplexed, that he knew not well what method to advise. Upon this, the king directed him to confer with Lewis des

a Deserts, president of the parliament of Bretagne, a man of great parts and probity. The chancellor entered freely into a long detail of the inquiries he had made, and of the projects he had formed. The president heard him patiently, and disapproved them in the lump. He told him there was but one way of doing this business, which was, to engage the states of the duchy to demand this union themselves. The chancellor shewed his great abilities in putting up all his papers, and declaring that he would leave the management of this arduous affair to a man who had convinced him, by a few words, that he understood it so much better than he <sup>e</sup>.

By the advice of the president, the king made a tour into Bretagne, where he corrected whatever was amiss, did many popular acts, caressed the leading members of the states, and, b by honours, gifts, and places, gained them to his party. But, notwithstanding this, when the proposal was opened, debates ran very high in the assembly of the states, more especially amongst the commons. The deputy from Nantz particularly inveighed bitterly against the proposal, as tending to invade and destroy their liberties, to make them, of a free state, a mere province, and to deprive them of all they had left, which was the hope of being, some time or other, what they once were, a free and separate principality; but he declaimed still more violently against the method in which this was to be done, which he represented as forging their own chains, renouncing their birthrights, and, instead of being forced, desiring this as a favour, which they ought to consider as the highest injury. The president, who expected this, obliged the friends of the court to be passive, and let the deputies vent their c resentments freely. But when their first fury was over, he sent for the deputy of Nantz, and for such as had manifested parts as well as zeal in the debate, and represented to them calmly, that they intirely mistook the matter and their own interest. He admitted, that the privileges, the independency, and the prerogatives of the duchy of Bretagne, were extremely valuable to its inhabitants, and what it ought to be their perpetual study to preserve; he shewed them, that they had been often in danger under their dukes; that their country suffered frequently by being the seat of war; and that, if it ever came to be separated again from the crown of France, it would be sooner or later conquered, lose its privileges, and become indeed a province. He added, that by being annexed in this manner, they gained all they could wish, and more than they could expect in another way; that, by having the monarch of France not d for their king, but their duke, they secured the protection of that crown, without losing their independency. In respect to the manner of doing it by their own demand, he proved, that this was so far from being injurious, that it was both honourable and advantageous; it was a proof of their freedom, an obligation conferred on their sovereign, and a treaty of union between one state and another. The deputies submitted, their heats subsided gradually; and thus, by a prudent application of lucrative motives, to those whom nothing else could move, and by opening the true state of things to those whose ears were not deaf to argument, he carried his point, and that in such a manner, that the parliament of Paris protested against the condescension which the king shewed in this matter, being ashamed to see, that, through the wisdom and weight of one man, the liberties of Bretagne were fixed upon so much a better e basis than their own <sup>b</sup>. A. D. 1532.

In the month of October the king had a conference with Henry the eighth at Calais, by which that friendship, which had subsisted for some time between them, was much strengthened; f they complained mutually of the double dealing of the Pope, and of the too great power and ambition of the emperor; but, as things then stood, they agreed on nothing but a declaration of their readiness to arm a body of eighty thousand men to act against the Turks, in which they sought to amuse Charles, and to gain a reputation with the rest of the European powers; for it does not appear that either of these monarchs was much in earnest in this affair, but rather gave it out for the purposes before-mentioned, and that they might, if they thought it convenient, arm by sea or land, in their own dominions, under this pretence, and without giving umbrage to other princes <sup>i</sup>. The emperor, on his side, amused them likewise, his affairs being so perplexed in Germany that he knew not well how to act, and the Turkish soltan being on the point of making an irruption into his brother Ferdinand's dominions with the whole force of his empire. In the management of these affairs, he made use chiefly of the mediation of the queen his sister, whose overtures Francis received with great testimonies of kindness and civility, but without suffering them to make any impression. These frivolous intercourses of mere policy answered the end of both parties, by keeping things quiet, and affording them leisure to take their own measures, till a favourable opportunity should offer for explaining their true sentiments.

THE king had many good reasons to suppose the peace would not last long. He was himself not much better satisfied with the treaty of Cambray, than he had been with that of Madrid; he was still as much persuaded as ever of his rights to the kingdom of Naples and duchy of Henry <sup>He causes his second son to be duke of</sup>

Milan, and extremely chagrined at the loss of his superiority over Flanders, which he had been obliged to renounce; besides these, which had been more than sufficient, the emperor had taken precautions for his own security, which gave Francis fresh disquiet. He had compelled the princes of Italy to enter into a defensive alliance, which was, in effect, and which he understood to be, an alliance against France. He had taken infinite pains to detach the duke of Savoy from the party of Francis, and had sold him the county of Aste, or Asti, very convenient indeed for that duke, but which had been the ancient patrimony of the house of Orleans. But what gave him most pain of all was, that, by the help of the duke of Savoy, who had a great influence over the Swiss, Charles was labouring to detach both them and the Grisons from their alliance with France. The king determined to use his utmost endeavours to prevent this blow, but at the same time very wisely considering, that a kingdom must be very insecure, while the principal strength of its armies consisted in mercenaries, he took a resolution to put an end to that evil, by establishing a national infantry; and as, in all probability, this thought occurred to him from his conversations with his learned friends, he directed those corps to be formed in the manner, and bestowed on them the name, of Legions. In order to gain once more an opening into Italy, he negotiated a marriage between his son Henry, duke of Orleans, and Katherine de Medicis, styled duchess of Urbino, niece to the Pope. The emperor Charles had proposed a marriage between this young princess and the duke of Milan; but when Pope Clement mentioned the overture that had been made him from France, the emperor himself advised him to prefer it, thinking it impossible the king should be in earnest, or ever intend to sink so low as such an alliance. In this, however, he found himself mistaken; and though the duke of Savoy, to oblige him, rendered an interview at Nice impracticable, yet the Pope, embarking at Genoa, landed at Marseilles on the fourth of October. The marriage was celebrated there with all the magnificence for which this prince was famous. He laboured likewise to engage the Pope to give his ally, the king of England, satisfaction; and though some have suspected the contrary, yet he appears to have acted in this with equal zeal and sincerity, and we may add, that if Providence had not interfered, would have acted with success. He could not indeed prevail on the Pope to suspend his excommunication of Henry on his marriage with Anna Bullen; but he persuaded him to keep it secret, and sent John du Bellay, bishop of Paris, to negotiate with Henry, which he did so effectually, as to prevent his separating immediately from communion with the church of Rome; though in the depth of winter, he went in person to carry this news to the Pope, with whom he concerted the means of adjusting this perplexed affair of the divorce, and procured the publication of the sentence to be put off to a day certain, that it might be known whether Henry would accept the terms or not. No answer coming, Bellay pressed for a farther suspension for six days only, which was refused, and the sentence published. Two days after arrived the king's submission, but it was then too late. This, however, shews the sincerity of Francis and his agent.

Measures taken by the emperor.

ALL this time the king had in view a breach with the emperor, when a proper opportunity should offer itself, and to this point all his endeavours were directed. Charles, who was by no means ignorant of this, took all possible methods to let the world into the secret, that, whenever a war happened, the blame of it might fall upon Francis. He had demanded assistance both in men and money for his war against the Turks, in a manner that he knew must produce a refusal: this he magnified to the dyet, and upon all occasions represented the king to the princes of Germany as his irreconcilable enemy. In this, as in the affair of the Pope, his politics were too refined; for the princes of Germany took from thence occasion to negotiate with the king for his assistance, in the support of their liberties, than which nothing could be more disagreeable to Charles. But while they were thus employed in secret leagues and negotiations, an event happened, which at once produced a war: the king had sent a Milanese gentleman, who had acquired a great fortune in his predecessor's service and his own, and who was uncle to the chancellor of Milan, as his ambassador to the duke, who being afraid to receive him openly, desired that his credentials should be only communicated to himself.

The king's minister is put to death by the duke of Milan, on which follows a war.

BUT the emperor, suspecting the truth, gave the duke to understand, that, unless he had satisfaction on the head of this French minister, he was not to expect his niece, the princess of Denmark, for a wife; the poor duke sent him king Francis's letters, in which he recommended him only as a gentleman who had a mind to make a tour into his own country, to settle his family concerns. Merveille having at this juncture a quarrel with one of the family of Castiglione, and this man coming with several persons armed to insult him in his house, was killed by his domestics. Francis Sforza upon this committed him to prison, and being apprehensive he might declare his public character, caused him to be beheaded without form or process.

- a This was resented by the king in the warmest manner; he even complained of it at the court of the emperor, who answered coolly, that the duke of Milan had a right to punish his own subject for the murder, on which the French ambassador produced the clearest proofs that Merveille had been sent to, and owned by, the duke of Milan, as the king's ambassador, which was a great satisfaction to Charles, who discovered at once the deceit of Sforza, and that he was now embarrassed beyond reconciliation with the court of France<sup>1</sup>. It is true he sent his chancellor to offer excuses, though he was the nephew of the gentleman who had been so hardly treated, which rather inflamed than abated the quarrel. Before the end of the year, an event happened, which was far from being acceptable to the French court; this was the death of Pope Clement, who had promised to give his niece Modena, Pisa, Leghorn, Parma, and Placentia, and to unite his forces with those of the king, for the conquest of Urbino<sup>2</sup>.
- b But Francis, who knew his ambition and his attachment to his family, to which he had more than once sacrificed his dignity, his safety, and his conscience, relied very much upon his aid in the expedition he was about to undertake; and there is no doubt that, after procuring his nephew to be raised by the emperor to the sovereignty of Florence, he would have been equally pleased to see his niece placed on the ducal throne of Milan, by the arms of France. The disappointment was great, and it had been happy for his subjects if the king had thought it so great as to desist from the intended war, of which, in losing him, he certainly lost his chief support.

- c THE war with Milan, was, notwithstanding, resolved, and the king made vast preparations for it; but, in order to reach the dominions of that prince, he was under the necessity of demanding a passage through those of the duke of Savoy; and this produced a previous war with that duke, which did not at all displease Francis, who had many reasons to be offended with him, and who resolved to take this opportunity of chastising him severely. But before he began the war, he took a very extraordinary step with regard to religion. His beloved sister Margaret, queen of Navarre, was inclined to favour the new opinions; that is, was disposed to become a protestant; and she had such an influence on her brother, that he had once taken a resolution of inviting Melancthon to his court, but he was diverted from that by the cardinal de Tournon: and taking occasion from some papers that had been fixed against the Louvre, in disproof of the doctrine of transubstantiation, he caused six persons to be burnt with extraordinary cruelty; and made a wild declaration, that if he thought the blood in his arm was tainted with the Lutheran heresy, he would cause it to be cut off; and that he would not spare even his own children, if they entertained sentiments contrary to those of the Catholic church<sup>3</sup>. This zeal was somewhat singular, or, to speak out, was strangely absurd, in a monarch, who had, at this very time, a minister at his court from the Turk, and made afterwards no scruple of acting in conjunction with the Infidels, both by sea and land. This barbarous execution over, he set out for Lyons, and sent admiral Chabaut with a numerous army into Savoy, the best part of which he speedily reduced<sup>4</sup>. But while he was thus employed, an event happened, that once more changed the face of affairs; this was the death of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan; upon which the emperor sent the famous Granvelle to offer the king the investiture of the duchy of Milan, for his third son, the duke of Angoulesme, which produced a long negociation, with strong professions of sincerity on both sides, and with very little of reality in it on either<sup>5</sup>. The duke of Savoy, to whom the king had made some propositions of peace, rejected them, notwithstanding the distress he was in, and made an offer to the emperor of exchanging the county of Nice, and all his territories on this side the Alps, for lands in Italy, which, if Charles had accepted, would have opened him a passage into the heart of France; and this irritated the king still more than all the injuries he had sustained from the duke already<sup>6</sup>.

- f THE emperor Charles the fifth was now in the zenith of his glory, returned in triumph from his African expedition, and having a numerous army and many great captains about him in the kingdom of Naples, framed to himself vast designs, in order to which he found it necessary to amuse Francis, which he performed with great success<sup>7</sup>. Then he proceeded to Rome, where, in the presence of Pope Paul the third, of the house of Farnese, and his cardinals, he inveighed bitterly, in a Spanish oration, against Francis, talking of fighting him hand to hand, in an island, on a bridge, or in the midst of a river on board a bark; but when the French ambassadors demanded a copy of this speech, and desired to know whether he intended it as a defiance to their master, or pretended to impeach his honour, he refused it, and qualified all he had said, by alleging, that in the heat of his discourse he had mentioned a single combat as a means of preventing the effusion of Christian blood, which, knowing the generosity and bravery of Francis, he conceived he would not refuse<sup>8</sup>. All this was mere art, as appeared by the emperor's causing copies of his harangue to be dispersed in Germany, of different tenors, according to the temper and dispositions of those they were to move<sup>c</sup>. At the same time his partizans gave out, that Francis had solicited the Turks to invade Hungary, and ascribed to French emissaries the fires that happened in different parts of the empire, by which such a spirit was raised, that William du Bellay, lord of Langei, whom the king sent into Germany to negotiate, durst not appear in public<sup>d</sup>. But in a little time, through the address of that minister, those schemes were dissipated, and, like all others of that kind, turned upon their authors, and proved highly prejudicial to the emperor's affairs, who really intended no more by all this, than to hinder his antagonist from levying troops in the empire, to ruin his credit with the German princes, and to facilitate his own enterprize<sup>e</sup>.

The admiral Brion reduces a great part of Piedmont.

In the course of these negotiations, the emperor affected to make the king believe that he was very desirous of having the peace concluded and signed by the admiral, Philip Chabot, lord of Brion, which was only to prevent his taking the command of the army, and making the conquest of Piedmont with the same ease he had done that of Savoy. The king at last perceived this, and sent the admiral with orders to reduce Piedmont, but not to commit any hostilities against the emperor. The admiral quickly became master of Turin, Fossan, and Coni, forced the duke of Savoy to shut himself up in Verceil, and had made himself master also of that fortress, if he had not been awed by the emperor's army in that neighbourhood, commanded by Antonio de Leva<sup>f</sup>. However, when the king received positive intelligence, that the emperor's true design was to invade France with that numerous army of veteran troops, which he thought invincible, the king ordered all his forces, a small number excepted, to leave Piedmont, and repass the mountains, declaring the marquis de Saluces, who had been bred up with him, and for whom he had a great affection, his lieutenant in Italy, directing him to put Turin, Fossan, and Coni, into the best posture of defence possible<sup>g</sup>, and to distribute his troops amongst them. The marquis believing, from the posture of affairs, that the French would never more be able to enter Italy, went over to the emperor, betrayed Coni, and would have given up the other places; but Montpesat, who commanded in Fossan, defended it so gallantly, that he kept the enemy before it a month, and at last obtained honourable conditions. Claude d'Annebaut had a good garrison in Turin, and appeared so little inclined to part with it, that the emperor, being afraid of losing the season, contented himself with causing it to be blocked up by a good corps of troops; and directing his march through the county of Nice, entered France in July, with an army of fifty thousand men, the marquis del Vasto acting as general of foot, Ferdinand Gonzago as general of the light horse, and the duke of Alba at the head of the gens d'arms, Antonio de Leva having the chief command under the emperor<sup>h</sup>. The king gave the command of his army to his favourite the marshal of Montmorency, with instructions to lay the whole country waste from the Alps to Marseilles, and from the sea to the frontiers of Dauphine; to encamp with his army under Avignon, covered by the Rhone and the Durance; and not to hazard a battle upon any terms<sup>i</sup>.

Charles invades France,
besieges Marseilles, and is forced to make a miserable retreat.

THE emperor quickly found the effects of this disposition: being extremely straitened for provisions, his army diminished daily; and, after attempting to draw the marshal out of his lines, and having brought his army before Arles, at length he besieged Marseilles<sup>k</sup>. While he was thus employed, the dauphin Francis died at Tournon on the 12th of August, of poison, which was charged, by the person who administered it, when he came to be executed, upon Ferdinand Gonzago and Antonio de Leva; whence a great, though probably undeserved, blemish was thrown upon the emperor's reputation<sup>l</sup>(F). On the twenty-fifth of September, Charles raised the siege, after losing more than half his army by sickness and skirmishes. He was so harrassed in his passage, that he had not ten thousand men in a condition to serve when he entered Piedmont, where he found his affairs in a very bad situation, Annebaut having forced his troops to raise the siege of Turin, and having a good army in the field. The count de Nassau, who had entered Picardy from the Low Countries, had met with no better fortune; for the marquis de Fleuranges, afterwards marshal de la Marck, defended Poreenne so obstinately, that after two assaults he was constrained to raise the siege<sup>m</sup>. Thus, by three places well defended, the king weathered this storm, which, it was believed, would have overwhelmed him and his dominions; and the emperor lost Antonio de Leva, with many other brave captains,

(F) The death of this young prince is differently reported by the French historians. An Italian historian reports, that he died of drinking cold water, when extremely heated by playing at tennis (1). A reverend

- a and, of both his armies, not less than forty thousand men: he felt this so sensibly, that, after A. D. 1536. a short stay in Piedmont, he went to Genoa, and embarked for Spain.

ON the first report of the great preparations made by the emperor to invade France, James James V. king the fifth, king of Scotland, assembled a considerable body of troops, and having embarked of Scots, goes them on board his fleet, endeavoured to transport them to the opposite coast; and though this to the assistance was prevented by contrary winds, yet that monarch landed himself at Dieppe, and repaired to of Francis, and the French camp, where the king then was with the dauphin Henry. This was esteemed so marries his daughter. generous an action, that, upon this king's demanding the princess Magdalen in marriage, Francis thought himself obliged in honour to grant it, though he was very apprehensive of its altering the good understanding between himself and Henry of England, which had been so beneficial to both crowns; and, therefore, he sent a minister to England, to obtain Henry's consent to the marriage of his nephew, or at least to excuse it; but the king was so angry, that he would not hear it mentioned<sup>n</sup>. It took place, however, on the first day of the new year, and the king returned soon after with his new queen to Scotland, where she did not survive many months<sup>o</sup>. If Henry had been well informed of this princess's disposition, he would not have been displeased with the marriage, for she had been bred up chiefly with her aunt, and was so sincerely addicted to the principles of the reformed religion, that, if she had survived, it is probable she would have brought her husband, who was extravagantly fond of her, to have favoured it likewise.

- THE success of the last campaign elevated Francis so much, that he acted the very same The king causes part Charles had done the year before in Italy. He ordered the emperor to be proceeded Charles to be against before the parliament of Paris; and that assembly having declared, that, by violating summoned be- the treaty of Cambray, he had forfeited all title to the advantages derived therefrom, and that the parliament of Paris. consequently the king entered into his antient rights of sovereignty over the counties of Flanders, Artois, and Charolois. Upon this he was summoned, by sound of trumpet, by the name of Charles of Austria, vassal to the crown of France, to answer before that tribunal, where, being condemned of felony and contumacy, in taking up arms and not appearing, those counties were declared confiscated, and united to the crown<sup>p</sup>. After this strange and useless parade, the king entered Artois with an army, where he took Hesdin and some other places. Afterwards the imperial army, under the command of the count de Burenex, covered most of d them, and besieged Terouenne, which was succoured by Claude d'Annebaut, who, in his retreat, was defeated and taken prisoner<sup>q</sup>. The dauphin then marched with an army to relieve the place, but, by the interposition of the queen of France, and her sister Mary, governess of the Netherlands, a truce was concluded for that frontier, for the space of a few months<sup>r</sup>. This afforded the king leisure to fulfil, in some measure, the treaty he had made with Solyman, 1537. emperor of the Turks, who executed his part punctually, which Francis did not, but was so far excusable, as that, in favour of his Infidel allies, he did all that he could. He sent the dauphin and marshal Montmorency before him into Piedmont, who forced the pass of Susa, relieved Turin, and restored the face of affairs on that side. The king followed them; but, at the persuasion of the Pope, consented, in the month of November, to a truce, during which both e parties were to keep what was in their hands, which mortified the duke of Savoy extremely, who saw his subjects and his dominions suffer alike from his allies and from his enemies<sup>s</sup>. But Solyman, who had made an irruption into Hungary, and sent a great fleet into the Mediterranean to join the French, was no less disappointed and provoked.

- THE king, to reward the services he had received from the marshal de Montmorency, who, Two inter- since the death of the chancellor du Prat, was become his first minister, bestowed on him the views between constable's sword, that he might command his armies with greater dignity, and made Mon- the king and tejan and Annebaut marshals of France<sup>t</sup>. One would have concluded from hence, that he the emperor. intended to carry on the war with greater vigour than ever; but, by the persuasion of Pope Paul the third, he agreed to an interview with the emperor and that pontiff at Nice, the only place the duke of Savoy had left, who was with great difficulty brought to this agreement. f The emperor remained at Villa Franca, the Pope at a monastery near Nice, and the king a quarter of a league from thence; so that the two princes did not see each other, but communicated their sentiments to the Pope, who conferred with them alternately<sup>u</sup>. The queen of France went to make her brother a visit by sea, which had like to have been fatal to them both; for a bridge made in haste being thrown from the shore to her gally, which was about fifty paces, and the emperor going to receive her as she came out of the vessel, the bridge gave way, and they fell both together into the sea, but were happily taken up without hurt<sup>v</sup>. After all, the Pope, finding it impossible to adjust things so between the two monarchs as to establish a peace, contented himself with doing his own business effectually, by marrying

Ottavio Farnese to Margaret of Austria, and prolonging the truce between Charles and Francis a for ten years, during which space the king was to keep that part of Piedmont which he had conquered, and the emperor, for his own security, kept the rest <sup>z</sup>. These points settled, the king returned, towards the end of June, into his own dominions, and the emperor embarked for Spain: but being driven on the coast of France, he sent one of the officers of his household to Avignon, where the king was, to let him know that he was very desirous of conferring with him. Francis, struck with this mark of civility and confidence, set out for Aigues Mortes, where he received and entertained the emperor on shore with great magnificence, and was in A. D. 1538. return feasted by him on board his galley, where they had a very long conference on the state of their affairs, and parted with great marks of esteem and cordiality <sup>y</sup> on both sides; but it does not appear that they concluded any thing of importance, or that this singular interview b had any other effect than that of alarming Henry the eighth of England, who could not be well pleased with a reconciliation between these two princes, more especially as it was brought about by the Pope, whom he considered as his capital enemy. The king making his public entry into Leon, the crowd was so great, that the chancellor, Anthony du Bourg, who rode near him, according to the custom of those times, upon a mule, was thrown down and trampled to death. He was succeeded by William Poget, whose great abilities might have enabled him to discharge with honour that high trust which he acquired by his agreeable conversation; a circumstance that had rendered him very acceptable to the king his master <sup>z</sup>.

In the beginning of the year a new treaty was concluded at Toledo between the emperor and the king, of a very singular nature, since it imported no more than that neither party should c enter into any engagement, or contract any marriage with England, without communicating it to the other <sup>a</sup>. The truce for ten years was soon after confirmed. The dauphin Henry did homage to his father, in quality of duke of Bretagne. About this time the people of Ghent, conceiving themselves oppressed, and their privileges invaded, by Mary queen of Hungary, and sister to the emperor, governors of the Low Countries, revolted, expelled the emperor's officers, and by a solemn deputation demanded the redress of their grievances from Francis, as their lawful sovereign <sup>b</sup>. This was the fairest opportunity that could have offered of resuming what he had lost by the treaty of Cambray. But the king, upon this occasion, laid aside the politician, rejected their proposals, and, not content with this, gave advice to the emperor of all that had happened. Charles found himself extremely embarrassed, notwithstanding the d king's generous proceeding; for judging his own presence absolutely necessary to extinguish this unexpected flame, he knew not how to pass into the Low Countries with ease and safety. By sea he was apprehensive of the Turkish fleets, which rendered the passage dangerous; and the religious disturbances in Germany rendered his route that way equally difficult and disagreeable. The shortest way was through France; and, with the king's consent, he knew it would be safest. In order to procure this, he addressed himself to the bishop of Tarbes, the French minister at his own court, and to the constable, the king's prime minister and favourite, suggesting, that he was willing to grant the investiture of the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans, and hoped the king would not insist upon his entering into any e treaties.

This point was disputed in the king's council; the cardinal de Tournon insisted that the emperor should make his proposition in writing; but the constable Montmorency was against f this: he said, that a promise in writing was not either more binding or more effectual than an unwritten promise, which, in a matter so concise, might be easily authenticated; and that the investiture, being the return of a favour, the best way to secure it was to heighten the favour as much as possible in the manner of doing it. This, being most agreeable to the king's own temper, was accepted; and the dauphin and his brother the duke of Orleans sent to meet the emperor at Bayonne, where they offered to remain hostages in Spain, till the emperor was safely arrived in the Low Countries; but Charles very politely refused it, and declared, that he would rely on his brother Francis's word <sup>c</sup>. The king himself, though but just recovered from a dangerous fit of sickness, went to meet him as far as Chastelleraud. All possible honours were paid him in his passage, and during his short stay at Paris. At his departure the king accompanied him as far as St. Quintin's, the dauphin and the duke of Orleans attended him to Valenciennes <sup>d</sup>. It was now thought good policy, and no breach of decorum, to desire an explicit promise from the emperor of the investiture, as the most solid proof of his friendship, and the surest means of establishing a lasting peace. But the emperor began by making a restriction, afterwards offered the Low Countries with his daughter to the duke of Orleans as an equivalent, and at length threw so many obstacles in the way, that the king found himself deceived. If the French writers are to be believed, it was not barely in this point; they alleged that the emperor gained such an ascendancy, by his address, over their g a monarch, that he drew from him all that had passed between him and Henry the eighth; and, while he yet held him in hopes of the investiture, prevailed on him to send an embassy to Venice, to dissuade the republic from making a separate peace with the Turk, which, having no effect, lessened his credit with the Italian princes; and ruined him for the present with Solyman<sup>c</sup>, who imputed to ingratitude what was owing to incapacity.

THIS transaction had terrible consequences in respect to the court and the king's favourites. The constable, Francis, from the most easy, open, and generous man living, became angry, vindictive, and suspicious. The constable was the first victim; who, finding himself disgraced, retired to the castle of Chantilly, where he resided during the remainder of this reign. The admiral, who was next in favour, was next also in disgrace. The king, one day out of humour, told him, that possibly some researches might be made into his conduct. The admiral told him, in return, that his conduct would bear any researches he could make. Francis caused him to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Melun<sup>f</sup>. The chancellor Pojet most unworthily undertook to be the instrument of the king's vengeance, picked out commissioners to inquire into his behaviour, and put himself at the head of them; and, partly by promises, but chiefly through menaces, prevailed upon them, in consequence of very equivocal testimonies of, or causing some duties to be levied as admiral, to which he had not a very clear right, to pronounce a sentence, by which he was deprived of his employments, and condemned to banishment. He had assured the king, that the admiral had been guilty of many flagrant, and some capital offences: when, therefore, he brought him this sentence, he laughed at it; and, having pardoned the admiral, sent for him again to court. The first time he appeared in his presence, the king said, "You see, my lord, it is not quite so safe to set me at defiance." "True, Sire," returned the admiral, with his usual steadiness, "but they did not find the slightest instance of my want of care or fidelity in your service." "No," replied the king, "we will look into that." Upon this the process was referred to the parliament to examine, and they declared him intirely free from blame; on which he was restored to all his employments, which did not hinder his dying of chagrin<sup>g</sup>. The chancellor met with a worse fate: the family of the admiral attacked his conduct, which brought in a multitude of informations; and upon these, after four years imprisonment, he was condemned in parliament to lose his office, pay a fine of one hundred thousand livres, and to suffer five years imprisonment<sup>h</sup>. He suffered the two first, but the last was remitted; and, being old and poor, he was forced to get his bread by giving opinions; for his knowlege was respected, while his person was despised.

ALL his old favourites being either dead or disgraced, the marshal d'Annebaut, who, without the title, executed the office of constable, came into the prime direction of affairs, William du Bellay, lord of Langei, succeeding him in the government of Piedmont<sup>i</sup>. The principal object the king had in view was to prepare for a war; and in this innumerable obstacles were to be overcome, the emperor's power being as great as ever, and the king's reputation much sunk with foreign powers. In the first place, it was thought expedient to make a treaty with Christian the third, king of Denmark, and Gustavus king of Sweden, who had the strongest interest in opposing Charles<sup>k</sup>. The king took the duke of Cleves next under his protection, whose title to Gueldres was questioned by the emperor, and whose alliance, by marrying with Henry the eighth of England, flattered Francis with the hopes of regaining that monarch, tho' these proved vain. However, the alliance of this prince was thought of such consequence, that the king gave him in marriage Joan of Albret, heiress of the kingdom of Navarre, in order to widen the breach between him and the emperor, as well as to attach him more immediately to his own interests; but, the princess being but eleven years of age, the marriage was never consummated. In order to dissipate the suspicions which the emperor's emissaries had infused at Venice and Constantinople, the king sent Cæsar Fregosa and Antonio Rincon, first to the Seigniory, and, when they had finished their negociation with that republic, they were to proceed to the Porte. The marquis del Vasto, or, as the French call him, du Guast, governor for the emperor of the duchy of Milan, and the countries depending upon it, having intelligence of their passage, and some hint also of their business, caused their vessel to be attacked by a party from the garrison of Pavia, and both the ministers killed. Some who were with them escaped, and gave an account of the whole affair to Monf. de Langei, who commanded in Piedmont, and, as soon as the king was acquainted with it, he published it to all Europe, as a most flagrant insult upon the law of nations, as well as a direct breach of the truce. The governor of Milan, however, steadily disavowed the fact; the emperor disclaimed its being done by his orders; and the king, finding that no satisfaction was to be obtained in the way of negociation, resolved, which was, indeed, the thing he wanted, to seek it by the sword<sup>l</sup>.

The French
army ravages Luxembourg
and Brabant.

IN the spring of the year the crowns of France and Denmark declared war against the emperor, who, contrary to the pope's advice, had made a second expedition into Africa, in hopes of ruining Algiers, and instead of that, had ruined his own fleet and army. At the entrance of the summer the French army, consisting of between forty and fifty thousand men, commanded by the duke of Orleans, and, under him, by the duke of Guise, entered the duchy of Luxembourg, took Damvilliers, and afterwards Yvoi, which was a place of strength; Arlon surrendered next, and then the army invested Luxemburg, which, though strong and well fortified, and provided with a good garrison, surrendered in a few days: Vireton and Montmedi had the same fate; and, if the young prince could have been prevailed upon to have followed the duke of Guise's advice, the whole county had been reduced, as the duke of Cleves ravaged Brabant to the very gates of Louvain and Antwerp<sup>m</sup>: but, of a sudden, he dismissed his army, and went to his father at Montpellier. Rene de Nassau, prince of Orange, recovered Luxemburg, and some other places, and had recovered all, if it had not been for the duke of Guise, who defended Yvoi, and afterwards recovered Montmedi; while the prince of Orange, entering the duchy of Juliers, revenged upon that poor country the mischief which the duke of Cleves had done in Brabant. The Dauphin's army, which was stronger than that of his brother, having with them Mons. de Montpesat, marched into Roussillon, and besieged Perpignan<sup>n</sup>. The king expected that the emperor, who was returned into Spain, would have marched to its relief with an army, and, in that case, he would have put himself at the head of his own troops, in order to have given him battle. But the duke of Alba saved him the trouble: he threw himself into the place with some bands of old Spanish foot, and finding the artillery, ammunition, and stores, that remained after the Algerine expedition, defended the place so well, that, after a siege of three months, the king having sent Annebaut, now made admiral of France, and the count de St. Paul, to see how things stood, they advised desisting from this enterprize; and accordingly, towards the end of October, by the king's command, the siege was raised<sup>o</sup>. The admiral then marched with part of the troops into Piedmont, where the French were this year on the defensive.

A. D. 1542.

The emperor served by English auxiliaries.

IN the beginning of the month of March, the army of the duke of Cleves, commanded by Martin du Rossen, defeated the emperor's forces, under the command of the duke of Arscot, killed four thousand upon the spot, took five thousand prisoners, and all their baggage and artillery. This hastened the king into the field, who marched towards Cambrai; and, having taken the little town of Landrecy, ordered it to be fortified, and left in it a good garrison. The duke of Orleans and admiral Annebaut reduced the best part of the duchy of Luxembourg; but, in the mean time, the duke of Cleves, being oppressed with the whole weight of the emperor's force, found himself under the necessity of making the best terms he could; and was able to obtain no better, than that he should renounce his alliance with France, send back Joan of Albret, and put part of his troops, under the command of his general before-mentioned, into the emperor's service<sup>p</sup>. This was a severe blow to the French interest; but the alliance of Henry the eighth with the emperor, which was the pure effects of the king's own imprudence, was a much greater, as it was immediately followed by the descent of ten thousand men in the Low Countries, which, having joined the emperor's army, induced him to lay siege to Landrecy, though the king was yet in the field, and consequently in a condition to march to its relief; but, having the good luck to relieve it twice by surprise, the emperor was forced to retire both from before this place and Guise, instead of marching to Paris, which he had threatened, after the junction of the English forces<sup>q</sup>.

The castle of Nice attacked by the French and Turkish fleets.

CAPTAIN Paulin, one of the king's agents, found means to dissipate at the Porte the impressions which the emperor Soleyman had received of king Francis; and, in consequence of these persuasions, the Grand Signor not only passed by what he knew, as well as what he had heard, but promised him also to send a fleet into the Mediterranean, in the proper season, on board which captain Paulin himself was to embark<sup>r</sup>. The French historians are themselves very much embarrassed in speaking of the treaties between their monarch and the Soltan, and inveigh bitterly against Charles the fifth, for exposing the king at the dyet, as being closely connected with Infidels: nor are they less angry at the same monarch's taking care to let Soleyman understand, that, by the help of a little condescension, he could have drawn this good ally of his, without receiving the least provocation from him, to have entered into an alliance for attacking, with all his forces, the Ottoman empire<sup>s</sup>. There is no reason for us to fall into this embarrassment likewise, since we are under no obligation so much as to dissemble, much less to deny the truth, which is, that Francis, if he could have gained the emperor,

- a would have acted against the Turk; but, as he could not, he demanded the assistance of the Turk against the emperor, and received it. Soleyman in person entered Hungary, and sent the famous Barbarossa, with a fleet of one hundred and thirty galleys, into the Mediterranean, where he put the city of Ostia, and all the sea coast of the pope's territory, under terrible apprehensions, but without doing them any hurt, upon captain Paulin's declaring that they were under his master's protection<sup>1</sup>. In the beginning of July this fleet arrived on the coast of Provence, and were joined there by twenty-two French galleys, commanded by Francis count of Anguien, or Engbien, the son of Charles, and brother of Anthony, duke of Vendosme, and then sailed to the coast of Nice, where they reduced the city of that name, but were not able to take the castle, though they besieged it two months<sup>2</sup>. Barbarossa shewed an equal
- b contempt for the French fleet and its commander; the former was so ill equipped that they were forced to borrow bullets, ammunition, and naval stores from the Turks; and the count being but in his twenty-third year, Barbarossa looked upon and treated him as a child, which the count shewed his judgment in bearing, and soon after made it evident, that old men, and even great men, might be mistaken. After this unsuccessful expedition, the Turkish fleet came and wintered at Toulon, where Barbarossa is said to have exercised his trade of piracy, without paying much respect even to the French flag; and, in the spring, demanding the king's leave to depart, very readily received it<sup>3</sup>. After this one cannot wonder that Charles V. reproached his antagonist with joining the Turks. In Piedmont, after the departure of the Turkish and French galleys, the duke of Savoy and the marquis du Guast took Mandovi, and,
- c in breach of their capitulation, cut to pieces a great part of the Swiss garrison, and plundered their baggage. Towards the close of the year Bouillieres, who commanded for the French, took St. Germain, and was on the point of taking Yvrée, which was a place of consequence; but, finding himself superseded, and the command given to the count d'Anguien, upon his sending to him for an escorte, Bouillieres marched to meet him with the whole army, and so abandoned the siege, rather than allow his successor to have the honour of taking the place<sup>4</sup>.

THE views of Francis and Charles in this war were very different; and those of the former, in comparison of the latter, might be stiled insignificant. What he aimed at was the duchy of Milan, which, once acquired, either by the sword or by a treaty, he had sat down contented; but Charles aimed at an ascendancy over all the powers of Europe, and to obtain this at the destruction of France. Francis took his measures but indifferently for the gaining his little end; whereas Charles took his measures so well, that he was very near carrying his point; so that it may be truly said, that Francis staked his kingdom against a duchy. At the dyet of Spire the emperor prevailed on the princes and states of Germany, Protestants as well as Papists, to declare the king an enemy to the empire, and to furnish him with an army of twenty-four thousand foot and four thousand horse, to carry on the war against him. At the same time he solicited the pope to declare him an enemy to Christendom, and the Swiss to relinquish their alliance: if he had succeeded in these, the king had been undone: as it was, he was very near it<sup>5</sup>. Henry the eighth agreed with the emperor to attack France on one side with fifty thousand men, while he, with a like number, entered it on the other, and the two armies joining, were to march directly to Paris<sup>6</sup>. Francis was not ignorant of this; and yet, to gratify the ardour of the count of Anguien, who besieged Carignan, for the relieving of which the marquis du Guast was assembling a great army, consented that he should give him battle. He did this against the advice of his council, who represented, that the safety of France would be risked by that engagement; since he had with him the flower of the French troops, and the king under the greatest necessity of employing them in another place. Yet, weighty as these arguments were, they urged them in vain; the young general had the king's consent; and, on the fourteenth of April, he fought the battle of Cerizolles, in which he gained a complete victory<sup>7</sup>, against a superior army, killed ten thousand men upon the spot, made three thousand prisoners, and took the enemy's artillery, ammunition, and baggage. If this victory had been improved, the whole duchy of Milan might have been easily conquered. It was not, indeed it could not, be improved; for the king was obliged to recall the best part of the army to defend his frontiers, and even his capital. What was in the power of the count d'Anguien he did; he took Carignan, Moncalles, St. Damien, Vigon, Pont Pierre, and, which was still more, he put it out of the power of the imperialists to attempt the invasion of France on this side<sup>8</sup>; the only signal advantage that arose from the victory.

The gallant defence of St. Dizier ruins the emperor's army and saves France.

COUNT William of Furstenberg, who had quitted the king's service upon some disgust, besieged Luxemburg on behalf of the emperor, and took it in a fortnight. Commerci surrendered also as soon as a breach was made. Ligny in Barrois was carried by assault, and then the emperor, with his army, invested St. Dizier, a place of no great strength, but which was defended by Monf. La Lende, and Monf. du Bueil, count de Sancerre, who preserved it for six weeks, and obtained a good capitulation at last<sup>c</sup>. Henry had landed at Calais in the month of May, but finding the emperor intent on taking towns, he followed his example, and invested Montreuil and Boulogne at the same time<sup>d</sup>. If they had held to their first proposal, and had joined their two armies before Paris, which would have consisted of eighty thousand foot, and twenty-two thousand horse, Francis must have abandoned his capital, and all the country on this side the Loire; nay, if the emperor, after the taking of Luxemburg, had marched to Paris, there was nothing to oppose him; for the king depending upon the defence that fortrefs should have made, had not hastened the Swiss, so that it was the defence of St. Dizier that, in this critical conjuncture, saved France. As soon as this place was taken, the emperor summoned Henry to march to Paris; but the king refused to stir till he had taken Boulogne and Montreuil<sup>e</sup>. The emperor then advanced with his army, which was much reduced, so far into Champaigne, that he was in great danger of being defeated by the Dauphin, or reduced to great distress for want of provisions, if Epernai and Chateau Thierri, where the king's magazines were, had not been betrayed into his hands: and this again threw the inhabitants of the city of Paris into such a consternation, that they fled on every side. But the emperor, instead of advancing towards that city, turned off to Soissons, and entered into a treaty, to which he invited Henry, who refused to treat at all<sup>f</sup>.

Treaty of Crepi, in which Francis is again duped by Charles V.

IN order to understand this, we must observe, that the French court was divided into two factions; that of the Dauphin, and that of his brother the duke of Orleans. The latter was his father's favourite, and the favourite also of Anne de Puissieu, duchess of Estampes, the king's mistress, who had an inveterate hatred to Diana of Poitiers, the mistress of the Dauphin. Charles the fifth made that duchess believe that he had a great affection for the duke of Orleans, and was very desirous of seeing him married to his daughter, which the Dauphin treated as mere artifice; and, believing the danger over, and himself in a condition to make the emperor repent his invasion, was not at all inclined to peace; of which the duchess seeing no hopes, if the emperor was beaten, contrived things so as to let the king's magazines fall into his hands. This brought on the treaty of Crepi, by which the emperor promised to give the duke of Orleans his own daughter, or his brother's daughter, and either the duchy of Milan or the Low Countries, with the counties of Burgundy and Charolois; and all the places taken since the treaty of Nice were to be restored<sup>g</sup>. The king was the more easily induced to sign this treaty, by the news of the loss of Boulogne, a place strong, well fortified, supplied with all things necessary, and which had a numerous garrison, but commanded by Vervines, a young man, who, for this slip in his conduct, in the next reign lost his head<sup>h</sup>. As for Montreuil, which was old, ill fortified, and had but a small garrison, the marshal de Biez preserved it; for half the duke of Norfolk's army that besieged it being composed of the emperor's troops, who quitted him upon the signing the treaty, he was obliged to retire<sup>i</sup>. Henry returned to England as soon as Boulogne surrendered; and the Dauphin, understanding that the breaches were not repaired, made a bold attempt, recovered the lower town, and, if his troops had not fallen to plundering the English baggage, had actually carried the place<sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 1544.

Francis at a vast expence equips a fleet, with an army on board, to invade England.

THE Dauphin was so much displeased with the peace of Crepi, that he protested against it privately, as did the parliament of Toulouse, as contrary to the dignity and unalienable rights of the crown of France. Some remains of the antient Vaudois being settled in the villages of Merindol and Cabrières, the former under the jurisdiction of the legate of Avignon, and the latter in the king's territories, some zealots, making an ill use of their power, fell upon the poor people, and cut the throats of about three thousand in the first of those places, and many more in the latter, and in twenty-two little villages in the neighbourhood; for which barbarous deed some of the principal authors were deservedly punished in the succeeding reign<sup>l</sup>. The king, being very desirous of recovering Boulogne, resolved to employ for that purpose the whole forces of his kingdom by sea and land; and having taken into his service a considerable number of ships from the Italian states, he appointed the admiral Annebaut commander in chief of this puissant navy, with a large number of land forces on board; but, before they sailed, the king intended to have given the ladies of his court a great feast on board the admiral, which carried an hundred guns; but, by some accident or other, in making preparations for this feast, the ship took fire, and, with most of the people on board

- a her perished <sup>m</sup>. The admiral, notwithstanding this accident, sailed with his fleet, consisting of one hundred and twenty large ships, and twenty-five galleys: their design was to attack an English squadron which lay at Portsmouth, in which their galleys gave them a great advantage: but they found them so securely posted, that after a little cannonading, they declined attacking them. They next debarked three different corps to ravage the Ile of Wight, and held a council of war to deliberate whether they should fortify themselves there, which was at length determined in the negative. Leaving the Ile of Wight, they made some descents upon the coast, with little advantage, and then returned home <sup>n</sup>. The land army, under the command of the marshal de Biez, was not more fortunate; he was ordered to build a large fort that might command the entry of the harbour of Boulogne, in which he departed from
- b his instructions, built it where it was of no use, and so small that it was forced to be pulled down. He forced, however, the lines of Oye, but did not prosecute this success with effect. The king, who had brought his son the duke of Orleans into Picardy, with an intent to be present at the siege of Boulogne, had the mortification to find the season so much advanced, and his army in so bad a condition, that it was impracticable. An epidemic distemper reigning at this time, the young prince was seized with it, and died on the eighth of September, A. D. 1545; not without great suspicion of poison <sup>o</sup>, to the inexpressible grief of his father. The council of Trent was opened this year, to which the king sent ambassadors, who were received and treated with great respect; but this did not console him for the loss of his son, and his disappointments in the war, which had cost him immense sums of money, and this levied in such a
- c manner, as grievously distressed his subjects, which filled the king's mind with very melancholy reflections.

- THE two kings were, by this time, tired of the war, and with equal reason; it had answered the purposes of neither, and was a heavy burden on both. Henry's health was declining, and Francis also felt himself daily decay: their subjects equally wished and needed a peace: but, notwithstanding this, the overtures that had been hitherto made for the conclusion of it, had met with great difficulties. Francis insisted on the restitution of Boulogne, and the Scots being included as his allies; but Henry would not listen to either. At length expedients were found, with respect to the first, and Henry consented to the latter, with this qualification, that the Scots gave him no fresh provocations. The two admirals of France and England
- d were the principal plenipotentiaries, and the peace was at length concluded in the beginning of June, on terms which were hard enough upon Francis <sup>p</sup>. He confirmed former treaties, recognized the validity of antient obligations, which he promised to perform; contracted a new debt of eight hundred thousand crowns, for the restitution and fortification of Boulogne, which was to be discharged by annual payments in eight years, and the place to remain till that time in the hands of the English. Francis was as well pleased with this as with the treaty of Crepi; they were neither of them favourable or honourable, but they were both necessary. The king was very desirous to leave his dominions in safety and in peace: he was sensible of former miscarriages, and intended to repair them as far as was in his power. It was with this view that he visited his frontiers, and directed several fortresses to be repaired, especially on
- e the side of Germany, because, under pretence of chastising the Protestants, the emperor was assembling a great army; and when the admiral Annebaut had demanded of him, after the death of the duke of Orleans, what his intentions were with regard to the duchy of Milan and the peace, he told him very roundly, that, as to the former, he looked upon himself to be under no obligation; and that he would observe the latter, unless he was provoked: which the king understood to be, when he found himself in a condition to break it with advantage. In this situation Francis might have availed himself, as his successors afterwards did, by a close alliance with the Protestants in Germany; but from this he was dissuaded by cardinal Tournon, who likewise prevailed upon him to revive religious persecutions in his own dominions, which rendered him unquiet at home, and ruined his reputation abroad; at the same time that it diverted him from what he had once designed, the reformation of the numerous abuses, that, through his own indolence, his frequent necessities, and the advice of bad ministers, had been introduced during his reign, and to which his duty and his interest obliged him.

AT the beginning of the ensuing year, being at St. Germain en Laye, he received the news of the death of Henry the eighth, his grief for which, some writers say, was the cause of his own <sup>q</sup>; for, notwithstanding their frequent quarrels, these two monarchs had a great affection for each other, as well as great resemblance, being nearly of a height, having the same air, the same tone of voice, and the same inclinations: Henry was, of the two, somewhat elder. Francis had reckoned much upon his assistance, in case of being attacked by the emperor, and, upon his loss, altered his sentiments with regard to the Protestants of Germany, with whom a he saw it absolutely necessary for him to unite : but before he could proceed far in these or in any other of his schemes, he found himself attacked by a slow fever, occasioned by a malady brought upon him by his pleasures. He sought relief from exercise and change of place, but in vain ; and as he went from one country palace to another, he found himself so ill at Rambouillet, that he began to prepare for death, which he received with great composure of mind, advising his son to imitate him in his good qualities, if he had any, and to avoid his vices and foibles, which were but too numerous and too apparent . He recommended to him the admiral in very strong terms, and dissuaded him from recalling the constable. This had little effect ; for, as a great historian * says, they were forgot before he was well in his coffin. He deceased on the last day of March , in the fifty-third year of his age, b and the thirty-third of his reign, and with all his faults, universally regretted by his subjects (G). We need the less wonder at this, when we reflect, that almost all men of letters in Europe received pensions from him.

Henry II.
breaks through all his father's injunctions.

HENRY the second acceded to the throne the very day that he became twenty-nine years of age, with great expectations of the whole French nation : it is said that his father exhorted him in his last moments to consider the admiral Annebaut as one of his ablest and most faithful servants ; to withdraw his confidence from the constable, whom he suspected of holding a correspondence with Charles the fifth ; and to keep a strict eye over the princes of the house of

(G) This monarch was tall and tolerably well-shaped, had an high open forehead, brisk eyes, a long nose, a fine complexion, and his hair black. He was very expert in his exercises, very brave, and took great pleasure in feats of arms (1). At the second marriage of Lewis the 12th he gained great honour in a tournament. At the beginning of his reign, in some diversions of this sort, captain de Lorges, lord of Montgomery, tossing a firebrand, it fell upon the king's head, by which he was so burnt, that he was forced to be shaved, and ever after wore his hair short, and his beard long, which became the fashion (2). In the battle of Pavia he slew with his own hand the last heir male of the famous Scanderbeg (3). He had great natural parts, as appears from several pieces of poetry of his composing, which are yet extant. At his meals, in his recreations, and at night, before he went to sleep, he had persons who read to him, and it was by this means that he gained so general an acquaintance with the sciences (4). He was magnificent in every thing, and not only introduced the belles lettres, but a taste for the fine arts. He built many royal palaces, such as Fontainebleau, St. Germain en Laye, Chambard, the castle of Madrid in the wood of Boulogne, and he had laid the foundation of the Louvre (5). In the first part of his life he was profuse, but however it was in a noble way ; his palaces were richly furnished ; he had as fine jewels and finer pictures than most of the princes of his time : but what cost him the most was his pensions to great men, that is, to men of superior talents ; for there was not an able officer, or an accomplished scholar of whom he had any knowledge, but he either gave, or at least offered, him a pension. After he became infirm, he applied himself with more assiduity to his affairs, and grew so good an economist, that, at the time of his death, he had disengaged his whole domain, had four hundred thousand crowns in his coffers, and a quarter's revenue untouched, which his successor received (6). His first consort Claude of France died at the castle of Blois, July 20th, 1524, at the age of twenty-five (7). By her he had the Dauphin Francis, who was poisoned at the age of nineteen ; Henry, who succeeded him ; and Charles duke of Orleans, who is said to have died as his elder brother did, in the twenty fourth year of his age. He had also four princesses by the same queen, of whom Louisa

and Charlot died young, Magdalen married James the fifth of Scotland, with whom she lived only seven months, and Margaret, who, after his death, married Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy ; she was stiled the Pallas of France, and died at Turin, in the fifty-eighth year of her age, universally beloved, esteemed, and admired. By his second queen, Eleanora, sister to the emperor Charles the fifth, and the widow of the famous Don Emanuel king of Portugal, he had no issue. After his death, she returned to the court of her brother, who, as we have shewn in another place, carried her with him into Spain, where she died at the age of threescore. Amongst all the foibles of Francis, his love of women was the greatest : he was extremely smitten with Mary of England, the wife of his predecessor ; and the chancellor du Prat is said to have owed his fortune to the good advice he gave him, not to suffer his passion to defeat his succession. In his youth he had a mistress whose name was Cureau, by whom he was thought to have been the father of Stephen Dolet, who suffered an infamous death for impiety. By another lady, whose name is not mentioned, he had a son, who took the name of Vilecouvin. His amour with Frances de Foix, countess of Chateaubriant, made a great noise, and some say her husband, after a long imprisonment, put her to death : but this seems to be disproved by her monument, which shews she was reconciled to him, and died in 1537. However this be, he had another gallantry which was equally fatal to himself and his mistress ; she was a married woman, and the husband's resentment induced him to give her a disease, of which she died miserably, and the king, after languishing for many years, owed his death to the same cause. His last mistress was Ann de Pisseleu, who, at her coming to court, was stiled mademoiselle d'Helli. She had a prodigious ascendancy over Francis, tho' he would have made the world believe that nothing criminal ever passed between them. She married John de Bretagne, who, for her sake, was created duke d'Estampes. He gave for his device a salamander in the flames, with this motto, Nutrisco et extinguo, that is, " I am nourished, and I " extinguish ; " but the meaning is either impenetrable, or at least very obscure. He was buried with great pomp at St. Denis, and the bodies of his two sons, were also interred with his, near that of their mother queen Claude.

- a Lorraine <sup>u</sup>. Henry, to gratify his own inclinations, or to shew that he was a king, broke every one of these injunctions. He disgraced Annebaut, and deprived him of his employments, without so much as assigning a cause; he recalled the constable immediately, and he took the duke of Guise and his children into his council <sup>v</sup>. His coronation was celebrated at Rheims, on the 26th of July, where the six antient peers were represented by six of the new, and the duke of Guise had precedence of the duke of Montpensier, as the elder peer, though the latter was of the blood <sup>x</sup>. This prince either delighted in change, or yielded implicitly to those who did. The duchess of Estampes, finding herself neglected and despised, retired to her castle in the country, and became a zealous Protestant; but Diana of Poitiers, the widow of Lewis de Breze, whom the king created duchess of Valentinois <sup>y</sup>, directed all at her will, and was the principal cause of so many changes. The chancellor was disgraced, tho' he could not be deprived, and the seals, in process of time, given to John Bertrandi. The cardinal de Tournon was turned out of the council, to make way for the duke of Aumale, son to the duke of Guise. The two secretaries of state were dismissed, and many others <sup>z</sup>. This was not all; the king, tho' he is represented as a good-natured prince, made some examples like wife. Edward du Biez, marshal of France, was not only disgraced, but, by a sentence pronounced upon him for his want of conduct, or rather for his want of success, in the late reign, was degraded from his office and imprisoned. His son-in-law James de Couci, lord of Vervines, lost his head for surrendering Boulogne to the English, when the succours were almost in sight; but this was not executed till two years after, the process being so long depending <sup>a</sup>.
- c AFTER his coronation, the king made the tour of his frontiers, and, at his return, permitted a duel on a private quarrel, occasioned by their amours, between Guy Chabot, lord of Jarnac, and Francis de Vivonne, lord of Chasteneraye: the former was but just recovered from a fit of sickness; the latter was an active vigorous man, for whom the king had a great affection. The court was present, as was sometimes the custom on such occasions, when, contrary to all expectation, Vivonne was borne to the ground by Jarnac, and so much enraged at his disgrace, that, obstinately refusing to have his wounds dressed, he died in despair; at which the king was so much troubled, that he is said to have made a vow never to permit any thing of this kind again <sup>b</sup>. The queen-dowager being desirous to retire into the dominions of her brother, the king made no difficulty of giving his consent, and, at the same time, settled her jointure, which consisted of the revenues of Touraine and Poitou, to her wish <sup>c</sup>. The ministers, apprehending that the residence of twelve cardinals at court might be prejudicial to their interests, and bring too many ecclesiastics into the council, advised, under colour of doing honour to pope Paul the third, who had begun to negotiate an alliance with the king, and that they might have a stronger party in the conclave, which, they judged could be at no great distance, as the pontif was arrived at a very great age, sent no less than seven of them to Rome, where they were directed to use all possible methods to promote the king's interest, and to thwart the views of the emperor <sup>d</sup>. The delivery of the queen being expected towards the close of the year, the king directed his ambassadors to intreat the Swiss cantons, as a mark of their kindness and friendship, to assist, in quality of sponsors, at the baptism of his child; to which they readily assented, and named ambassadors to give their attendance at this ceremony, which they did in the month of December, when the young princess, who was named Claude after her grandmother, was carried to church by one of the ambassadors. This was intended to signify to the world the close conjunction there was between the crown of France and the Swiss cantons, and to make way for renewing the alliance upon such terms as were most convenient for the king's designs, which was also, tho' at some distance of time, brought about <sup>e</sup>; only the cantons of Zurich and Berne absolutely refused to be included in this new alliance, on account of the great severities that were daily exercised in France against their brethren the Protestants; yet this procured them no indulgence.
- f THE king, as a fresh mark of his favour, made Francis duke of Aumale a peer of France; and it was ascribed to the influence of that family, as well as to the politics of those times, that the king determined to send a fleet, with six thousand good troops on board, under the command of the lord d'Este, to the relief of the Scots. The queen dowager was the daughter of the duke of Guise, and the sister of the duke of Aumale; she had vigorously promoted the views of France in hindering the marriage of her infant daughter with king Edward of England, and had, by that means, embarked the nation in a war, which had brought them to the brink of ruin. The sending this succour, whatever it might do to the Scots, clearly answered the king's intention, as it enabled the French party in Scotland to execute what they had long intended, the sending over their queen Mary, a child of six years old, to be educated at the court of France<sup>f</sup>, which lost her the love of her subjects, and was the true source of all her misfortunes. The king made another progress this summer thro' Picardy, Champagne, Burgundy, Savoy, and at length passed into Piedmont. His design was to see that all his frontier places were in a good state of defence, his forces complete, and to give countenance to his friends in Italy, where he was very desirous of reviving his pretensions to several countries; and, besides his jealousy of Charles the fifth, now at the very summit of his greatness, his personal resentment was stronger against him than that of his father, on account of some ill usage he had received when he was a hostage at Madrid. In the course of this progress he caused the marriage of the heiress of Navarre to be celebrated at Moulins, where Anthony duke of Vendosme espoused the princess Joan of Albret, whom Francis the first had given in marriage to the duke of Cleves, and who, through the terror of the emperor's arms, had been forced to send her back<sup>g</sup>. While the king was thus employed, and had his thoughts chiefly occupied with foreign affairs, there broke out, very unexpectedly, a kind of civil war at home. It first appeared at Saintonge, and in the Angoulmois, but quickly spread itself through all Guienne, and was owing to the impatience of the people in regard to the salt tax<sup>h</sup>; for the salt being the natural product of their own country, and considered as the peculiar blessing of Providence, derived to them without labour, by the influence of the sun upon the sea, they thought the tax very oppressive; but it was the insolence of the officers which rendered it intolerable. In this revolt the clergy and nobility had little share, the grievance did not fall upon them, and the people, as is commonly the case, tho' their cause was in itself worthy of compassion, rendered themselves, by their conduct, inexcusable, committing the most horrid acts of barbarity, and treating as enemies all who declined taking their method of expressing their resentment<sup>i</sup>. At length the flame of sedition caught the city of Bordeaux, where, notwithstanding all the care that could be taken by the magistrates, and in spite of the remonstrances of the parliament, the populace first besieged the king's lieutenant M. de Monem, in the citadel, and, when they had drawn him forth upon the public faith, that all possible respect should be paid to his person, they massacred him and another gentleman, who attempted to defend him in the streets<sup>k</sup>. The king, at his return, ordered two corps of troops, one commanded by the constable, the other by the duke of Aumale, to reduce the revolted provinces to their duty. The duke took the higher road: and passing through Saintonge, with fair words, and making a very few examples, brought every thing into perfect order<sup>l</sup>. The constable took his route by the sea-side; and though the city of Bordeaux opened her gates, and sent deputies to meet him, he would not enter otherwise than by a breach made in their walls, posted his troops in all parts, as if the place had been taken by storm, with cannon pointed at the head of every street; and, after a short process, seized their bells, as well as their records; declared all their privileges forfeited; hanged up one hundred substantial tradesmen; disarmed the rest; fined them in two hundred thousand livres; and finished by suspending the parliament from the exercise of their functions<sup>m</sup>. Some say his resentment was sharpened on account of Monem, who was his near relation; and indeed there is some appearance of it, for he caused the town-house to be demolished, and a chapel to be erected over it, where a solemn service was to be said annually for the soul of the deceased; the magistrates, with an hundred of the principal inhabitants, were obliged to dig his body out of the grave with their nails, which was then carried in great pomp to the church of St. Andrew, and there interred, upwards of five thousand citizens attending the ceremony with torches<sup>n</sup>. The king remitted a great part of these penalties; but the different conduct of his officers had a strange effect; the constable remained ever afterwards odious to the people; the family of Guise began from that moment to reign in their hearts. The king caused the edicts against the Protestants to be executed with the utmost severity; erected a chamber on purpose, composed of members of the parliament of Paris, because he found the clergy too mild in the prosecution of heresy<sup>o</sup>.

In the month of February the king was blessed with another son, who had the name of Lewis, and the title of Orleans, bestowed on him<sup>p</sup>. The astrologers who were in those days in great vogue, promised mighty things on the behalf of this young prince; but, as he died under three years of age, they gained no great credit by these predictions. The factions in the court of England, and the popular insurrections in the country, inspired the king with the hopes of recovering Boulogne easily; in order to which, he resolved to attack it by surprise,

- a the nobility having secret orders to bring with them a great number of gens d'arms when they came to attend the ceremony of the queen's coronation and public entry, which was fixed for the month of June. It was performed with great magnificence<sup>a</sup>; but the splendor of it was quickly clouded by proceedings of a different nature; for it was at this time that the lord of Vervines suffered, and his head and quarters were placed on the French forts nearest to Boulogne. After this followed a solemn procession, which was closed by the burning of many Protestants. The king was himself present at this dreadful spectacle, which, however, shocked him to such a degree, that he could never forget it, but complained, as long as he lived, that, at certain times, it seemed before his eyes, and troubled his understanding<sup>b</sup>. About the beginning of August, all things being ready, and Strozzi with the French fleet,
- b having attacked the English near Guernsey, with some advantage, by reason of a calm, which gave them an opportunity of using their galleys, the French forces attacked and carried all the advanced posts of the English about Boulogne; notwithstanding which, and the presence of the king, the constable, the dukes of Vendosme and Aumale, the place was so gallantly defended, that they were constrained to change the siege into a blockade<sup>c</sup>, after war had been proclaimed against England, as a sort of justification of this enterprize. At the close of the year died Margaret queen of Navarre<sup>d</sup>, the king's aunt, whose engaging manners and great abilities had rendered her admired throughout Europe. She had shewn so much zeal for the new opinions as occasioned their spreading in France, and, as far as she could, protected their professions.
- c On the humble application of the people of Bordeaux, the king restored them to his favour, and the parliament to its functions: they were likewise permitted, upon the payment of a sum of money, to withdraw their bells from the fortresses to which they had been carried at the time that city was punished by the constable<sup>e</sup>. The blockade of Boulogne, which had continued all this time, alarmed the new government of England, where John Dudley, earl of Warwick, and afterwards duke of Northumberland, had supplanted the protector Somer- set, and, not knowing how to relieve it, at the same time that money was much wanted, a treaty was set on foot for the sale of it, to which king Henry readily listened: The negociation was quickly concluded, by which it was agreed, that the place should be yielded to France, upon the payment of four hundred thousand crowns, one half on the day of restitution, and
- d the other before the middle of August following: Scotland was included, where the English restored what they had taken, and the claims of both parties were reciprocally reserved in general terms, and hostages given on both sides for the due performance of articles<sup>f</sup>. This was the most advantageous peace that France had hitherto made with England; the vast arrears that were due from that crown being, in effect, remitted, and those pensions, which looked so like tribute, for want of being mentioned, in effect extinguished. The earl of Warwick himself was so sensible of the disgrace his nation had suffered by this scandalous bargain, that he pretended to be sick, to avoid setting his hand to the ratification. But, notwithstanding this, it was both ratified and executed. A peace being proclaimed, to shew that a thorough understanding was restored between the two courts, it was agreed to exchange their orders:
- e and accordingly the marshal de St. André, the king's favourite, was sent with that of St. Michael to king Edward, and the garter was sent in return to Henry<sup>g</sup>. Claude duke of Guise, and his brother John, cardinal of Lorraine, dying, Francis, duke of Aumale, assumed the title of duke of Guise, and his brethren, Charles and Lewis, both cardinals, were stiled, the former of Lorraine, and the latter of Guise<sup>h</sup>. An edict was made to restrain the extravagant remittances the clergy were obliged to make to Rome, and for correcting other abuses committed by the papal notaries, with which pope Julius the third, of the house of Caraffa, who had succeeded Paul, was highly displeased<sup>i</sup>. About the same time the affair of Merindol, which happened in the former reign, was revived; and, after exposing all the cruelties with which it was attended, those who were most criminal escaped, and
- f only Guerin, the king's attorney, felt the weight of the sword of justice, by the loss of his head, considered by the Protestants as a victim, and by the Papists as a martyr. Charles de Cofse, count of Brisac, one of the gallantest and one of the handsomest men in France, was sent to command in Piedmont, in the absence of the prince of Melfi, that he might be out of the sight of the dukes of Valentino; and the prince dying soon after, he succeeded him in the government, and in the post of marshal of France<sup>j</sup>. The taxes were at this time so high, that the country people resorted in crowds to Paris to avoid them, by betaking themselves to trades; and, to prevent this, the king published an edict to restrain additional buildings, being apprehensive the city should become too big.

The king makes war on the pope and the emperor.

ALL things were now in that order, which the king had so much wished, for resuming a the old plan of foreign affairs'. The scheme of pope Paul the third had been to aggrandize his family. He had first given his natural son Peter Lewis Farnese the city of Camarino, with the title of duke, which he afterwards exchanged for Parma and Placentia. This son of the pope's was one of the most profligate men in the world, and had pushed his brutality such a length, that his subjects conspired against him and killed him: upon which Ferdinand Gonzagua, who governed for the emperor in the duchy of Milan, seized Placentia. This duke left behind him three sons, Alexander the eldest, on whom his grandfather had bestowed a hat; Octavio, the second son, had married the emperor's daughter, who, notwithstanding, would not restore to him Placentia, or even consent that he should keep Parma. Horatio, the third son, had the duchy of Castro, and the king had consented that he should marry his natural daughter Diana. The pope, in order to adjust things as well as he could, had formed a plan of accommodation, by which Octavio was to quit Parma, and consent that it should be united to the dominions of the holy see, which he refused in so peremptory a manner, that, upon reading his letter, the old pontif fell into so high a passion, as brought on a fever, which carried him to his grave'. Julius the third had been chosen by the French faction, and the creatures of his predecessor, with whom he acted at first, but quickly entered into schemes for the emperor, and laboured to dispossess Octavio Farnese of Parma, as well as some other Italian princes, which threw them into the arms of the king, who declared his resolution to protect them. The pope, upon this, became very angry, and, under pretence that Parma was a fief belonging to the church, and that Octavio Farnese was a rebel, declared war against him, and demanded the assistance of the emperor to reduce him; the king, who had all along determined to support him, sent proper orders to the marshal de Brisac, who, upon Gonzagua's besieging Parma, gave the duke such effectual succours, as saved the place".

He renders himself odious
by calling in the Turks.

THE war being carried on in the name of the pope, and the emperor acting as his auxiliary, Julius threatened the king with the censures of the church, more especially after the Turks entered into the war, and sent a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, where they threatened the island of Malta, ruined that of Gozo, and made descents upon Sicily. Charles the fifth also made loud complaints, that, for granting succours to the holy see, the French king had committed hostilities against him, and, after the example of his father, had called in the Turks. Henry vindicated himself, by shewing that the emperor had given the Turks sufficient provocation; and many of the French writers still insist upon this, and treat the emperor's complaints as calumnies; whereas, in truth, their own excuses are trivial, and can make no impression upon any that are not disposed to believe any-thing that can be alleged in favour of the French monarch; and what they urge as the strongest proof, that Henry did not call in the Infidels to his assistance, because the French ambassador on board the Turkish fleet interposed with effect, in favour of the order of Malta, is the fullest and clearest testimony to the contrary; since, if the king had not been in close alliance with the Ottoman Porte, his ambassador would not have been there, or, if he had, would not have been able to prescribe to a Turkish admiral, whom he should act against and whom not. This diversion had all the consequences that were expected from it; the emperor would not support the pope as he intended, and Julius, whose complaisance for the emperor rose entirely from the high opinion of his power, as soon as he found himself mistaken in that, began to lay aside his rough language, and consider how to get out of a quarrel which had already exhausted his finances".

Pope Julius
sues for peace.

THE king no sooner determined to enter into a war with the pope, than he very wisely resolved to prevent his enemies from drawing supplies out of his dominions, and, for that reason, forbid by an edict the sending of money to Rome on any pretence, which was almost as great a blow to Julius as the military operations of marshal Brisac, who made war with infinitely more prudence, better discipline, and more success, than any of the French generals had formerly done in this part of the world*. To qualify this, and to shew that, though he was an enemy to the pope, he was as zealous as ever for the church of Rome, the king published at Chateaubriant, a flaming edict against the Protestants'. The barony of Montmorency was erected into a duchy and peerage, in favour of the constable, who still continued at the head of affairs, and who, in the month of October, negociated, by the bishop of Bayonne, a league with the Protestant princes of the empire against Charles, by which it was stipulated, that the king should pay down two hundred and forty thousand crowns for the expences of the three first months of the war, and sixty thousand crowns towards the same expences every month after the war was declared, to be for restoring the liberties of Germany; neither party was to treat separately; and the king was to take into his possession, by way of a security for the just performance of this alliance, Cambray, or the cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and to hold them with the title of vicar of the empire<sup>2</sup>. Pope Julius, to shew his strong desire of peace, sent, towards the close of the year, a legate to Paris, and the king who, during his quarrel, affected to support the rights of the Gallican church, not only obliged this legate to send his powers to be recognized by the parliament, but also to signify to that illustrious body in writing, that he was content to execute them according to the restrictions made by the parliament, and not otherwise<sup>3</sup>. The reader will discern from hence, that, as the interests of the court dictated, the parliament or the pontif prevailed.

At the very opening of the year, the king ratified his treaty with the German princes, and levied immense sums of money upon his subjects, by a variety of oppressive measures, that he might be enabled to execute it<sup>b</sup>. Maurice elector of Saxony, and the rest of the allies, having received the stipulated subsidies, were quickly in motion, and pushed their enterprize with such vigour, that they were very near seizing the person of the emperor. As soon as Henry saw them embarked, the king gave orders for his army to advance towards the Rhine, which was one of the most numerous and best provided, that, to this time, France had set on foot. The queen was appointed regent in his absence; and, to give some satisfaction to the people, the admiral Annebaut, who had been lately recalled to court, was directed to assist her. At the king's entrance into Lorraine he was met by the duchess dowager, who was the emperor's niece, whom the king treated with great civility; but on his arrival at Nancy, he told her plainly, that, as it was a point of importance to have that country in the hands of a friend, he must endeavour to secure it for the future, by sending the young duke her son to be educated at Paris, and, for the present, by putting the administration into the hands of his uncle the count de Vaudemont<sup>c</sup>. The cities of Toul and Verdun opened their gates, of which Metz made some scruple; but the constable took them so unprepared, that the citizens could not resist<sup>d</sup>. The truth is, the princes of the house of Lorraine settled in France, that is, Francis duke of Guise, his brother Claude, to whom he had yielded the duchy of Aumale, and the two cardinals, one of whom was bishop of Verdun, forgetting the regard due to their family and to their country, promoted to their utmost the reduction of these places, by which the empire was deprived of its barrier, and the possession of Lorraine rendered thenceforwards precarious.

d THE king next extended his conquests into Alsace, taking every thing that had an appearance of strength between Haguenau and Wissembourgh: he made also an attempt upon Strasburgh, that he might have the command of the Rhine; but in this he failed; for the inhabitants, reflecting on the fate of Metz, had formed a garrison of nine thousand men, and were not either to be cheated or threatened out of their liberties<sup>e</sup>. The confederate princes also, being desirous to stop his further progress, intreated him to be content, and not give occasion to his and their enemies to say, that the prince whom they stiled the protector, was become the oppressor of the liberties of Germany. The Swiss, who were no less apprehensive of his entering their territories, sent deputies to make him a compliment of the like nature, which he received very graciously, and took a resolution to retire, as if it had been in compliance with their request<sup>f</sup>. This was a very high stroke of policy, and founded upon very different motives; he knew that the confederate princes were treating with the emperor; had a proper sense of the advantages already gained, which he resolved to keep; and found it necessary to provide for the safety of his own dominions; Mary queen of Hungary, governess of the Low Countries, having sent Martin Rossen into Champagne, where he committed most dreadful depredations<sup>g</sup>. The king made a turn, however, thro' the duchy of Luxembourgh, where he took Danvilliers, Ivry, and Montmedy, and furnished Robert de la Mark with a body of forces, with which he recovered Bouillon, that had been taken from his grandfather by the emperor thirty-one years before. But, through the fatigue he suffered in this expedition, the king was seized with a fever, which almost brought him to the grave, at Sedan, which alarmed the nation much, and the favourites more<sup>h</sup>.

In Italy the flame of war was stopped; the marshal de Brisac, though his army was far from being numerous, had seized the city of Sienna, and gained so many advantages, that the pope, who had concluded a truce with him for two years, inclined rather to his side; and the emperor, very wisely taking advantage of his having hitherto acted only as an auxiliary, desired to be included in that truce, which left the family of Farnese in possession of the duchy of Parma<sup>i</sup>. He knew that, whenever the circumstances of things in Italy would permit, he might revive this quarrel; and, being at present attentive only to the recovery of what had been taken from the empire, he was very desirous of being secure on this side, where, with the assistance of the Turks, he was apprehensive the French might make a the conquest of the kingdom of Naples. Henry having carried his own point in Italy, readily consented to the truce, without consulting the interest of his Infidel allies. The princes of the empire acted precisely from the same motives; they had obtained all they could desire by the treaty of Passau, and therefore made no scruple of leaving their troops at the disposition of the emperor, Albert of Brandenburgh only excepted. That monarch, with twelve thousand horse, one hundred thousand foot, and a numerous train of artillery, came before Metz, towards the end of October <sup>k</sup>. The place was large, and so poorly fortified, that he might reasonably have hoped it would make but little resistance. The duke of Guise threw himself into it with two princes of his house, three princes of the blood, fifty noblemen of the first rank, five hundred gentlemen of quality on horseback, with their followers, and five thousand of the b best infantry in France. While the siege lasted, Albert of Brandenburgh, having adjusted things with the emperor, surprized a good corps of troops, under the command of the duke d' Aumale, and put a great part of them to the sword; so that the garrison of Metz was equally deprived of succour, and of the hopes of any diversion in their favour <sup>l</sup>. The count de Roieux carried the war into Picardy, with all the circumstances of rage and fury imaginable, made himself master of Noyon, Roye, Nesle, Chauny, and burnt the royal palace of Folembray, which so alarmed the city of Paris, that the inhabitants demanded the king's leave to fortify on the side of Picardy, which he gave them, provided they did it at their own expence <sup>m</sup>. Thus the emperor had all the leisure and all the advantages he could desire in carrying on the siege. But the advanced season of the year, perpetual sallies from the place, the indefatigable c attention of the duke of Guise, and his great military abilities, rendered all his attempts vain; so that, after lying before it two months, during which his army was lessened one third, he did not judge it expedient to proceed to an assault, though there were breaches on every side; but, on the contrary, finding the diseases and distresses to which his army was exposed multiply every day, he was constrained to decamp <sup>n</sup>. The duke of Guise might have destroyed great part of his forces in their retreat; but he generously caused them to be picked up in the roads and villages, and sent to the hospitals, being ashamed, after having defeated an imperial army, to stain the glory of his arms, with the blood of diseased and dying men. But the city of Metz, which has remained ever since in the hands of the French, has never recovered its former splendor, since, in order to his defence, the duke of Guise found himself obliged to demolish thirty convents and churches in and about the city, in some of which were d the tombs of several of the kings of the Carlovingian race, whose remains were, with the formality of a solemn procession, removed.

The emperor takes and razes Terouenne and Hesdin, and the king attempts the siege of Cambray in vain.

THE relief of Metz was celebrated with all possible expressions of satisfaction and joy <sup>o</sup>, which was very natural, but ought certainly to have been accompanied with a reasonable regard to what might happen in the succeeding campaign. The emperor had been repulsed with loss; but Charles the fifth was not a prince capable of being discouraged by any disappointment. He used incredible diligence in recruiting his army, so that the next summer the count de Roieux invested Terouenne, with numerous forces: the place was strong, but very ill provided, and the garrison small. The French army was not able to take the field, though in the month of e June; but Andrew Mantalabert, lord D'Esse, who had commanded with great reputation in Scotland, and who had saved France by the defence of Landrecy in the former reign, was ordered to throw himself into it, which he did, with a handful of brave men. He defended it with that intrepidity which was expected from him; sustained a storm of many hours, till at length he was killed in the breach <sup>p</sup>. Francis de Montmorency, son to the constable, next assumed the command; but being surprized at the operation of a mine, consented to treat, and, while the articles of capitulation were regulating, the German and Flemish soldiers surprized some weak posts, and, entering the town, put not only the garrison, but the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the sword. The Spaniards, with some difficulty, saved f the principal officers; but the emperor carried his resentment so far, as to destroy the city to its very foundations, so that at present there is scarce any discernable marks of its ruins <sup>q</sup>. The count de Roieux being dead, the command of the imperial army fell to Cæsar Ponce de Lalain, lord of Biencourt: but the emperor, believing it would be more for his advantage to have his army commanded by a person of superior rank, replaced him by Emanuel Philibert prince of Piedmont <sup>r</sup>. His first enterprize was the siege of Hesdin, where the marshal de la Mark commanded, who was son-in-law to Diana de Poitiers. Horatio Farnese, duke of Castro, the solemnization of whose marriage with the king's natural daughter Diana had employed

- a the French court, while the emperor was forcing their barrier, threw himself into this place, with fifty persons of quality ; notwithstanding which the prince of Piedmont conducted his enterprize with so much diligence and vigour, that the marshal was forced to capitulate <sup>s</sup>. While they were treating, a priest throwing a granade at random, it fell into a mine, by which the castle was blown up, and the duke of Cajtro, and many other persons of distinction, buried in the ruins. The German troops, seeing this disorder, forced their passage into the town, and put the garrison, a few of the principal officers excepted, to the sword. Henry was marching to the relief of the place, at the head of a complete army, consisting of ten thousand excellent cavalry, and fifty-four thousand foot, with a train of a hundred pieces of cannon ; yet this mighty force performed nothing worth mentioning, except defeating a corps of Flemish cavalry, making the duke of Arscot, who commanded them, with about five hundred men, prisoners, and killing about six hundred more, amongst whom was the prince of Epinoy ; for prince Philibert declined a battle, and prevented the siege of Cambray, which so chagrined the constable that he fell sick, and upon this the French army went into winter quarters ; at which the people murmured exceedingly, but without shaking the credit of the favourite <sup>t</sup>.

- THE truce in Italy was broke almost as soon as it was concluded ; for the emperor thought it practicable to recover Sienna, with the assistance of the duke of Tuscany, and the prince of Salerno persuaded the French that it was very possible for them to become masters of the kingdom of Naples. These designs reciprocally defeated each other ; the Turkish fleet, commanded by the corsair Dragut, and Sinan Basba, came time enough on the coasts of the kingdom of Naples to oblige the imperialists to raise the siege of Sienna ; but the prince of Salerno did not reach the fleet so early as to excite a revolt in Naples, which otherwise he would have done <sup>u</sup>. Monsieur de Termes, who had defended Sienna, made, with the assistance of the Turkish and French fleet, which had defeated that of Andrew Doria, an attempt on Corfica, and reduced the whole island, except Calvi : but, some difference arising between him and Dragut, the Turkish fleet retired, and the Genoese recovered all except Fiorenzo, and the south part of the island. The marshal de Brisac took several places in Piedmont, and introduced a new method of making war, which has been but little imitated. The peasants were exempted on both sides from injuries, and people passed through the seat of war about their business, with as much security as in time of full peace <sup>v</sup>. Edward the sixth of England, being in a very declining condition, and the French ministers having intelligence of the emperor's views, Anthony de Noailles was sent over to assure the duke of Northumberland of the king's assistance, which served only to animate him to an enterprize, which had its conclusion on the scaffold <sup>x</sup>. On the twelfth of December this year, the duchess of Vendosme was delivered of Henry, first A.D. 1553. king of Navarre, and then of France <sup>y</sup>.

- POPE Julius thought it became him to endeavour, at least, the conclusion of a peace. But the emperor insisted on very high terms, which king Henry thought it dishonourable for him so much as to hear ; so that, instead of a treaty, the pope's propositions did not so much as produce a negotiation. What chiefly raised the emperor's spirits so much, was the conclusion of the marriage between his son Philip and queen Mary of England, in spite of all the endeavours of France, as well as contrary to the inclinations of the English. This, however, did not hinder Henry from sending Monsieur de Noailles, who had been employed to defeat her succession, to compliment queen Mary upon her marriage <sup>z</sup>. Cardinal Pole, in his passage through France, employed his eloquence with great sincerity to soften things between both princes, but to little purpose, though the king testified great esteem for his person. The remembrance of what had passed the preceding year engaged Henry not only to guard against a surprize, but to labour all that was in his power to be in the field before the emperor ; having assembled, in different places, about sixty thousand men, he entered the dominions of that prince with three different armies ; the first commanded, under himself, by the constable, the second by the duke of Vendosme, and the third by the marshal de St. André <sup>a</sup>. The constable having deceived the emperor's generals, came unexpectedly before Marienburg, a new town, to which queen Mary of Hungary had given her own name, and there he was joined by the other two armies ; the place being but indifferently provided, the governor and officers were made prisoners of war. The king was so much pleased with it, that he was resolved to keep it ; and, with this view, not only placed a garrison there, but also, to facilitate the correspondence with his own territories, fortified Rocroi <sup>b</sup>. In the beginning of July, the king took Bovines by assault ; and the duke de Vendosme reduced Dinant, though the castle was gallantly defended by a Spanish officer.

Charles at the head of his army, has the worst in the action before Renty.

THE emperor having put himself at the head of his army, the king, who was very desirous of bringing him to a battle, wasted all the country, and razed Maubrege, Bavay, Binch, and Mariemont; the last but one of these was a village, surmounted by a beautiful castle, and Mariemont a pleasant country palace of the queen before-mentioned, which was the reason that the king burnt the one, and beat the other to pieces, as he likewise did the castle of Roeux, in resentment of the ravages committed by the queen's order by its late master, and particularly for demolishing his favourite palace of Folembray<sup>c</sup>. There was an high antipathy between Mary and Henry, which, after venting itself in songs and lampoons, that were indecent, produced at length these acts of violence that were clearly inhuman. How much soever the emperor might be displeased at a war carried on in this manner, for which if any conduct could give cause, his own had afforded too much, he could not be brought to fight with any advantage. The king, therefore, having wasted the country about Cambray, passed through the country of Artois, and, towards the end of July, invested the castle of Renty, which, though but small, was very strong, and from whence the emperor's subjects made frequent excursions into the country of Boulogne<sup>d</sup>. Charles, who had under him Philibert duke of Savoy, and Ferdinand Gonzague, advanced to its relief, and encamped so close to the French army, that there was only a narrow valley between them. On the 13th of August, there happened a smart action, in which the king distinguished himself personally at the head of the Swiss, and the duke of Guise, who is the favourite hero of the French writers gained a considerable advantage<sup>e</sup>. The field of battle, strewed with two thousand dead bodies, a considerable number of standards and colours, and a few pieces of cannon, were the proofs of this victory, which, it is said, might have been more complete, if the constable had been more lively in his motions. It seems he remembered the battle of Pavia, and, with a superior army in his front, and a strong garrison in his rear, was unwilling to run any risk. What offends the French still more, he prevailed upon the king, a few days after, to raise the siege, and to retire before the emperor, which, they say, tarnished the lustre of this campaign. But a better judge than they thought otherwise; for when a great lord went to visit the emperor Charles in his retreat, and told him that he had adorned his gallery with the pictures of his military exploits, and particularly his last, which was the flight of the French from Renty, Charles answered gravely and gently, "Then you must set your painter to correct it; for instead of a flight it was a gallant and soldier-like retreat, in day-light, and in good order<sup>f</sup>." After this the army went into winter-quarters, having added some places to the French territories, and much to the security of the frontiers.

The French defeated in Italy, and Sienna besieged.

ON the side of Italy a new scene opened. Cosmo de Medicis, duke of Tuscany, who had acted covertly as an auxiliary, or rather as a feudatory to the emperor, perceiving clearly that he ran as great hazard, without being able to reap so great advantage, as if he declared openly against the French, and exerted his whole force, first made a good bargain with the emperor, and then did what his interest would have prompted him to, if he had made no bargain at all. He set on foot a numerous army, the command of which he gave to the marquis de Marignan, who was desirous of being thought the duke's relation<sup>g</sup>. The point he aimed at was to reduce Sienna, where Peter Strozzi commanded, an excellent officer, but unfortunate, because he was obstinate. The marquis besieged it in vain; he changed his siege into a blockade to as little purpose. Strozzi, leaving the command of the place to Montluc, marched with nine or ten thousand men into the duke's territories, and besieged Marciano. The marquis marched to the relief of the place, and the situation of the armies was much the same as between the French and the Imperialists at Renty<sup>h</sup>. Want of water forced Strozzi to decamp; it was much against his will, and he sent a courier to Montluc, to demand his sentiments, whether it was best to retire by night or by day. Montluc, whose bravery was as little questioned as his abilities, answered, "That is best which is safest." But, notwithstanding this, Strozzi had his head so full of the point of honour, that he made his retreat before a superior army, in open day, and was thoroughly beaten for his pains, being dangerously wounded, and losing four thousand men, his baggage, and artillery. It was the news of this misfortune that induced the constable to raise the siege of Renty. The marshal Strozzi preserved, however, Sienna for this year<sup>i</sup>. Monf. de Termes kept his ground in Corfica, and the marshal de Brisac made himself master of Joree in four days. The French ambassador at Rome protested against the investiture which the pope gave to Philip of Austria of the kingdom of Naples. At the very close of the year, Metz was on the point of being surprized by a conspiracy, which was managed by the superior of the Cordeliers, and was discovered by the vigilance and penetration of the governor, who killed about twelve hundred of the garrison of a Tbionville, that was charged with the execution of this project<sup>k</sup>, and had advanced into the neighbourhood of Metz with that view.

THE city of Sienna, the siege of which was continued through the winter, was defended with great courage and constancy by Montluc, who prevailed upon the inhabitants to resist both force and famine, and to venture a variety of deaths, from the sole hope of preserving their liberty. But the factions in the French councils hindered any relief from being sent to marshal Strozzi; for the queen, who had afterwards too much, had now so very little power, that she could not support her relation. At length, therefore, after a siege of eight months, Sienna was surrendered<sup>l</sup>. Montluc was consulted in the capitulation, by which the liberty of the city was preserved, under the protection of the emperor, and the garrison was permitted to march out; but, notwithstanding this, Montluc refused to sign it. The marquis de Maignan was surprized; but Montluc persisted in his resolution; adding, that the republic had made a good capitulation, and he was willing to afford them the benefit of it, by quitting their city; but that he and his garrison would owe their safety to their swords, in case they should be attacked on their march. The marquis thought so good a defence excused this singularity of sentiment, and suffered Montluc to take his own way, who, at his return to France, received the king's order, which was then a great honour, and afterwards the staff of marshal of France<sup>m</sup>. In Piedmont, the marshal de Brisac had meditated the relief of Sienna, with the small army that he commanded; but there was a faction against him too, so that the project he sent of this expedition to court was rejected. However, being at liberty in his government, he contrived and executed the surprize of Casal, on Sbrove Tuesday, when the officers of the imperial army were intent on the diversions that closed the carnival. Their general saved himself in the castle, but he was obliged to capitulate in a few days<sup>n</sup>. The duke of Alba was sent to command in his room: he took some places by storm, where he put the Italian soldiers to the sword, and sent the French to the galleys; but, the duke of Aumale arriving with a considerable reinforcement, he received several severe checks, and the campaign ended, as it began, on this side, to the advantage of the French.

IN the mean time cardinal Pole set on foot a new negociation for peace, to which the king seemed to listen with great cordiality; but this, the French writers fairly own, was owing to his apprehension of seeing the English embarked, as they afterwards were, in the Spanish quarrel. But the treaty, notwithstanding, came to nothing; for, though the coffers of both monarchs were exhausted, yet neither had any real desire of making peace. Henry resolved not to part with Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and yet he could not avow that resolution, for fear of provoking the princes and states of the empire. He seemed, therefore, willing to part with them, but then he peremptorily demanded the duchy of Milan, which the emperor refused, and, in as peremptory a manner, demanded Burgundy; so that Pole, seeing his good designs defeated, suffered the conferences to end, without testifying any thing more than a deep concern for the obstinacy of both princes<sup>o</sup>. The campaign in the Low Countries shewed that they were not more unwilling to make peace than unable to make war. The imperialists intended to besiege Marienburg, or at least to have blockaded it; but the French found means to relieve it; and therefore, as the last effort of his military genius, Charles directed the constructing two fortresses for the security of his dominions, which were Charlemont and Philipville<sup>p</sup>. On the other hand, the French were able to do nothing, not even to prevent William of Nassau, prince of Orange, from ravaging Picardy, after cutting a great part of the militia of the province to pieces. Thus ended the great operations of the year; but there happened besides several other events, of which it is absolutely necessary that we should take some notice, in order to preserve a perspicuous connection between the past and succeeding parts of this history.

THE emperor Charles the fifth, finding his faculties extremely exhausted, thought fit to resign his regal and hereditary dominions to his son, which he did gradually, and with all the circumstances of deliberation and dignity, which were conspicuous in the great actions of his life<sup>q</sup>. This was far from being a matter of indifference to France, and yet the king could not publicly take any share in it. His ministers in Germany, however, used all their skill to prevent Ferdinand king of the Romans from resigning that dignity in favour of Philip, in which their endeavours were attended with success. The death of Henry d'Albret king of Navarre, was another interesting circumstance; for the king, either of his own motive, or prompted by some of his ministers, had a strong inclination to take the poor remains of that kingdom from Anthony duke of Vendosme, who had married the heiress, and to give him an equivalent in the heart of the kingdom. But Anthony, having either some intelligence or some suspicion of it, made such haste into the principality of Bearn, as secured him peaceable possession, in which the king did not think it afterwards expedient to trouble him <sup>r</sup>. But, as a mark of his resentment, he detached Languedoc from his government of Guienne, and refused that of Picardy to his brother Lewis prince of Conde. On the death of pope Julius the third succeeded Marcellus the second, a man of exemplary virtue and rational piety. Pontiffs of this character are seldom long-lived. He possessed this dignity twenty-five days, and was succeeded in it by John Peter Caraffa, upwards of fourscore, who took the name of Paul the fourth, and laying aside that great shew of austerity and sanctity of manners by which he seemed to have merited the pontificate, assumed at once not only the state of a great prince, but of the prince of princes, which was the title he affected. He had two nephews, John and Charles : the former he made general of the forces of the church, and covered the head of the latter with a cardinal's hat. Pope Paul was scarce warm in his throne before he entered into a negociation with the king, for the recovery, as it was stiled, but in effect for the partition, of the kingdom of Naples, which proposal was well received at court, through the interest of the princes of Lorraine, the cardinal aspiring to the popedom, and the duke of Guise having a vehement desire to be viceroy of Naples, having also, as heir to the house of Anjou, a sort of title to the kingdom itself <sup>s</sup>. The better part of the council were against this project ; but their opposition was of little weight. The constable, indeed, was also against it, and might have opposed it with effect, but he contented himself with hinting at the bad consequences that might attend it, being willing to be quit of one who had so great a share as the duke of Guise evidently had in the king's favour. The cardinal of Lorraine, therefore, was sent to Rome, to put the last hand to this treaty, and directed to carry with him the cardinal de Tournon, who was but just returned from thence, who went, indeed, in obedience to the king's orders, but very plainly and honestly declared how much he disliked the commission, which did not hinder the treaty from being concluded in the month of December <sup>t</sup>, tho', for reasons of state respecting both parties, it was kept extremely secret, in order to save the pope from the emperor's immediate resentment, and to give time for engaging other allies.

A. D. 1555.

A truce between the emperor and the king ;

THE absence of the cardinal of Lorraine, left the king's ear more open to free council than it had been ; and some deputies of his, having conferred with some of the emperor's about the exchange of prisoners, the latter demanded if they had no instructions to agree to a truce, of which the court being informed, and cardinal Pole renewing his instances at the same time, the constable took this opportunity of procuring such instructions <sup>u</sup>. The pope, being acquainted with this by the cardinal de Tournon, refined a little too far upon it ; for in confidence that neither the emperor, nor his son the king of Spain, would leave Piedmont, part of Tuscany, and Corfica, in the hands of France, together with her conquests in the Low Countries, for any length of time, he dissembled his dislike of this proposition, and advised the king to accept the truce, which was accordingly concluded in the beginning of the month of February, at the abbey of Vaucelles, near Cambray, the emperor being exceedingly desirous to leave his son in peace <sup>w</sup>. The pope was greatly displeased, but not disconcerted, with this news ; he resolved immediately to send a cardinal legate to each of the monarchs, to congratulate them on the conclusion of the truce, and to exhort them, out of pity to their subjects, and charity to the rest of Christendom, to convert this truce into a solid and lasting peace. But the true intent of sending his nephew, cardinal Caraffa, to the court of France, was to prevail upon the king to break the truce, and to revive the war in Italy immediately ; the real motive to which was, that, according to the course of nature, he had not long to live, and he was desirous of seeing the house of Caraffa on a level with that of Medicis, or, at least, with that of Farnese. In the management of this negociation, cardinal Caraffa found some difficulty ; for the constable exclaimed warmly against the breach of the truce, as equally inconsistent with the kingdom's interest and the king's honour <sup>x</sup>.

but it is broke and the war renewed.

It was carried, notwithstanding, by the influence of the duke of Guise, supported by that of the queen, and, which was much more powerful, the solicitation of the duchess of Valentinois. The queen was desirous to see her cousin, marshal Strozzi, once more in command ; and the duke of Aumale having married a daughter of the duchess, that lady was entirely devoted to the house of Lorraine <sup>y</sup>. But the pope, to remove all obstacles, seized upon the king of Spain's minister, charging him with being privy to a conspiracy against his government, and even against his person, declared his master to have forfeited his right to the kingdom of Naples, and threatened both him and his father with excommunication <sup>z</sup>. Upon these provocations, the duke of Alva had orders to enter the ecclesiastical state ; and the pope thereupon exclaimed that the truce was broke, which gave him a right to demand the support of France. The marshals Strozzi and Montluc were thereupon a sent to Rome with some forces, marshal Brisac began hostilities in Piedmont, and the duke of Guise prepared to pass the mountains with a puissant army<sup>a</sup>. In the mean time king Philip, by offering to restore Placentia, drew over the duke of Parma, and the rest of the princes of the house of Farnese, to his party; so that tho' the pope had promised for all the powers in Italy, none would enter into the league, and none remained attached to France but the duke of Ferrara<sup>b</sup>. It is however true, that the pope solicited the Venetians with all the zeal imaginable; and finding all intreaties would not prevail, threatened at length to bring in the Turks upon them, which proved also ineffectual.

At the very opening of the year, the duke of Guise entered Italy with an army of twenty thousand men; and, by the king's command, conferred with marshal Brisac, as to the conduct of the campaign. The marshal observed, that their master had two things in view, the relief of the pope, who was extremely pressed by the duke of Alba, and the recovery of the countries upon which he had a claim in Italy. He proposed the invasion of the duchy of Milan, as a measure which would answer both ends, since it would oblige the duke of Alba to retire out of the ecclesiastical state, and would certainly put the king's forces in possession of the best part of that duchy<sup>c</sup>. This proposition was so reasonable, that there was nothing to be said against it, and yet the duke of Guise had no inclination to follow it. He approved it very readily; but as it did not agree with his instructions, he desired that the marquis de Villars might be dispatched to court with the marshal's reasons, in order to receive the king's commands; but before he proposed this advice, he had dispatched a courier to the cardinal his brother. The marquis, at his arrival, stated the marshal's proposition to the council, where it was so strenuously supported by the constable and the marshal de St. Andre, that the king could not help applauding it. In the evening, however, the cardinal of Lorraine, the queen, and the duchess, so importuned the king, that they obtained express orders to the duke of Guise to march directly to Rome, and sent back his courier with them in the night. The marquis de Villars being informed of this in the morning, went to the king booted and spurred, desiring his dispatch, pursuant to the resolution taken in council, which gave Henry infinite disquiet; but he made the best excuse he could, acknowledged the marshal de Brisac's capacity and zeal for his service, and sent him a small supply of money, which he had not obtained without<sup>d</sup>. We have reported this the more largely, as from this incident the reader may frame to himself a just idea of this monarch's conduct during his whole reign. When, in pursuance of these orders, the duke of Guise advanced into the papal territories, he was quickly convinced how ill he had taken his measures; and after being deceived over and over by cardinal Caraffa, he was plainly told, that, the pope being unable to fulfil his treaty, he must act as well as he could. But, tho' pope Paul could not furnish troops to his ally, he was very desirous of assisting France by his intrigues; and, with this view, set on foot a negociation with the duke of Tuscany, for the marriage of his son with Elizabeth, king Henry's eldest daughter. Cosmo de Medicis received this proposition with great respect and complaisance, on which it was published at Rome that the marriage was concluded. King Philip, who knew the consequence of this alliance, offered the duke the cession of Sienna, and its territory, which was precisely what he desired, who thereupon excused himself as to the marriage, alleging himself to be highly honoured in the proposition which, however, it was unfit for so little a prince to accept. Thus the houses of Medicis and Farnese acquired by this war all they could desire, without being exposed either to danger or expence, while the duke of Guise found it absolutely impossible to penetrate into the kingdom of Naples; and while things were in this situation, came the news of the total defeat of the French army at St. Quintin, with express orders to the duke of Guise to return without delay<sup>e</sup>. By this means the pope was left entirely at the mercy of king Philip, who treated him with such moderation in respect to his personal interests, with such deference in regard to his political capacity, and with such profound marks of respect for his dignity, by ordering the duke of Alba to go in person, and make his submissions to the pontif, that he gained him entirely; in-fomuch that he told the duke of Guise, at his audience of leave, that in this expedition he had done little for the king, less for the interests of the holy see, and nothing for his own reputation<sup>f</sup>. The marshal de Brisac, on the side of Piedmont, acted with the same vigilance and vivacity in this as in former campaigns, and with like success; but as the king's jealousy had sent him to this distant command, so his weakness and condescension deprived France of all the advantages which, by his great courage and conduct, he had obtained.

THE king, though he did not take the field this year, ran no small hazard of his life in his own palace; for one day as he was going to chapel, one Caboche, who had a small place in the secretary's office, drew his sword, and advancing hastily towards his majesty, cried out, "Stop, king! I have a command from God to put you to death." But the Swiss guards seized and prevented him from executing his purpose : and afterwards, by judgment of the parliament, he was hanged <sup>a</sup>. In the beginning of June, the queen of England sent a herald at arms to denounce war, having at the same time given orders for embarking twelve thousand men, which were to serve in conjunction with the troops of king Philip in the Low Countries <sup>b</sup>. This alarmed the French court exceedingly, as it was a step they did not at all expect. The war in Italy had so occupied their councils, and so exhausted the king's treasures, that there were but few forces in the garrisons of Picardy, and scarce any in the field, when, in the month of July, the king of Spain's army assembled, by the march of troops on all sides, at Givet, where, when Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, came to take upon him the command, they consisted of thirteen thousand horse, and fifty thousand foot. In his march the duke seemed resolved to besiege first Marienburg, and afterwards Rocroi ; but on a sudden, turning aside <sup>b</sup> in the beginning of the month of August, besieged St. Quintin, which at this time was the strongest place on the frontier of Picardy ; but having a very weak garrison, could not have made any great resistance. Gaspar de Coligni, admiral of France and governor of Picardy, with several persons of distinction, forced a passage into it, with five hundred horse and two hundred foot, where he disposed every thing in the best manner he could for an obstinate defence <sup>c</sup>. The constable, his uncle, had by this time drawn together an army of twenty-five thousand men, with which he resolved to throw a considerable body of infantry into the place. It was with this view that, on the 10th of August, which is regarded by the Roman church as the feast of St. Lawrence, he passed the river Somme ; and having surprized the enemy, Dandelot, the admiral's brother, found means to get in with five hundred foot. It is agreed <sup>c</sup> by all historians, that if the constable had made his retreat immediately after the succours entered, and before the duke of Savoy had recovered his surprize, which had obliged him to quit his own quarter, to retire to that of count Egmont, he might have done it with safety ; but he was so slow in his motions, and count Egmont pressed so hard upon his rear, that the persons who had the care of the artillery and baggage began to fly, which confusion was so well improved by that count, that at length the duke of Savoy came up, and charged with his whole army ; so that in the space of half an hour, the whole French army was routed, with the loss of three thousand six hundred killed, and at least as many taken, together with all the artillery, except two pieces of cannon, and the baggage entire <sup>d</sup>. But what was still more disastrous, as well as more dishonourable to the nation, was the number of great persons slain and taken prisoners ; amongst the former was the duke D'Anguien, the viscount de Turenne, with upwards of six hundred gentlemen of note ; the constable himself, the dukes of Montpensier and Longueville, the marshal de St. André, with upwards of three hundred other persons of distinction, were amongst the latter <sup>d</sup>.

Remarks on the conduct of both parties.

THE constable is exceedingly blamed for making such a retreat against the express advice of the marshal de St. André, and after the misfortune that had befallen Strozzi, for not sending away the baggage and artillery in time, of which he was put in mind by an old officer that served under him, to whom, when things were at a crisis, the constable said, " Tell me, " good old man, what shall we do ? " " Really Sir, replied he, I cannot now, but two " hours ago I did ; " and for not posting some infantry with fire arms in his rear, who might <sup>e</sup> have checked the enemy's cavalry, and saved the rest of the army at their expence. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy is as loudly blamed for not marching directly to Paris, which all agree he might have done ; but a Spanish writer wisely asked, could he as easily have come back ? Adding, that his father persuaded Charles the fifth to his expedition into Provence, where at their entrance they eat pheasants, but fed upon roots, and were glad of them when they came back <sup>m</sup>. But be this as it will, the duke of Savoy thought the advantage that might accrue from ravaging the flat country was not equivalent to the reduction of St. Quintin, and some other places on the frontier, from whence excursions might be made at pleasure ; and king Philip acquiescing in his reasons, the duke returned to his camp before the place, to which, soon after, the king resorted in person. The admiral Coligni <sup>n</sup> having, in the mean <sup>f</sup> time, received some fresh succours, laboured with incredible diligence to repair and strengthen the place ; on the other hand, the enemy changed their manner of attack, and proceeded by mining, till at length, all things being prepared, they renewed their firing, and, by the effects of their batteries and mines, having made five breaches, they prepared for a general assault, which, though he had no hopes of succour, and very little of repelling, the admiral resolved to sustain, which he did with incredible valour, till, through the cowardice of one officer, the Spaniards entered the place, of which Coligni being informed, he went with a very few persons of distinction, who were about him, to try whether any thing could be done, but was presently surrounded and taken prisoner. The place was then forced on every side, and

- a the greatest part of the garrison put to the sword<sup>o</sup>. Many have blamed the admiral for sacrificing so many brave men by his obstinacy; which is very strange, considering that the best informed writers agree, that his obstinate defence saved France, and fairly own, that, if but a thousand men had passed the Oyse, all its inhabitants were ready to abandon Paris: but a delay of three weeks gave people time to recover their spirits and their senses; the king came thither in person, the duke of Nevers, and the rest of the great officers who had escaped from the battle, drew together the scattered remains of the army, which was reinforced on all sides, fifty persons of quality undertook to defend each of them a town; and the great cities of the kingdom vied with each other in sending sums of money to the king, without being so much as asked; so that Henry had reason to confess the truth of the last words which his father pronounced, "Remember, son, the French are the best people in the world:" but, after all, it is very difficult to know what turn things would have taken, if it had not been for the interposition of the Swiss; for, while the king and all his ministers and generals were labouring to assemble such a force as might prevent the progress of the duke of Savoy, they were alarmed by an unexpected invasion, upon which, in all probability, the duke of Savoy depended for the plundering of Paris<sup>p</sup>, after the reduction of St. Quintin. There was one Nicholas de Pollweiler, a gentleman of distinction in Alsace, who pretended to raise, upon his own credit, a body of troops to march into Hungary against the Turks; but when they were in motion, and by throwing out dark expressions, he had increased their numbers to about ten thousand men, he suddenly passed the Rhine at Straßburgh, and, notwithstanding the neutrality established for Franche Comté, penetrated as far as Bresse, intending to proceed to Lyons, where he had some intelligence; and this threw the kingdom into such a consternation, as must have disconcerted all Henry's designs, if the cantons of Bern, Friburgh, and Soleure, had not thrown garrisons into several places, and begun to march such a numerous body of troops, that Pollweiler thought fit to abandon his design, and to march precipitately into Alsace<sup>q</sup>. The duke of Savoy, with the Spanish army, reduced, in the month of September, Catelet, Ham, Noyon, and Chauni, and probably would have proceeded further, if the English, Progrès of the duke of Savoy. disgusted with the haughtiness of the great lords in the army, had not insisted upon going home, which they did, and a great body of German infantry, mutinying for want of pay, not only disbanded, but went the greatest part of them into the French service; so that when the duke of Guise arrived, and had received the fourteen thousand Swiss, which the king had raised with his subjects free gifts, he was in a condition to stop the duke of Savoy's progress; and, that he might do it the more effectually, he gave him the title of lieutenant-general of his armies, within and without the kingdom; and it was once proposed to have given him that A. D. 1557. of viceroy. Thus the miseries of France proved the source of the glory of the house of Guise<sup>r</sup>; but at the same time that the king heaped these favours upon the duke, he did not forget his father's caution, not to raise the house of Lorraine too high, though he acted directly contrary to it; for he assured the constable that he acted merely from necessity; that he would never prejudice the authority of his office; that he retained the most sincere affection for his person, and would always pay the greatest respect to his advice; and in this, as it afterwards appeared, the king meant to keep his word<sup>s</sup>.
- f THE duke of Guise, on the other hand, studied to augment his reputation, that he might at all times preserve his power, which was already as great as could be enjoyed by a subject; and it fell out very fortunately for him, that he discovered the admiral Coligni, being governor of Picardy, had formed a design of surprising Calais in the winter, had reduced the project he had formed for this purpose to writing, and had employed some of the most experienced officers who served under him, to examine every thing with the greatest care. The duke of Guise, having read this paper, and examined the officers who had been trusted with the secret, saw, that notwithstanding the great appearance of difficulty, there wanted in reality nothing but a little good conduct to make this enterprise secure; and, as things then stood, the constable and admiral being both prisoners, he had all things in his own power. He began, by ordering the privateers of Normandy and Bretagne to cruise in the channel, and more especially in the very streights of Calais; he then detached the duke of Nevers with a considerable army towards the country of Luxemburgh, which drew the attention of the Spaniards that way; and, when all things were ready, he procured an application from the people of Boulogne, for a body of troops to secure them against the incursions of the Spaniards; he sent a strong detachment at their request, which was followed by another, under colour of supporting them, and then followed himself, secure that his officers would follow his instructions; and thus, on the first day of the new year, Calais was invested. He immediately attacked Fort St. Agatha, which the garrison quitted, and retired into the fort of Nieulai, which, together with the Risbank, they attacked at the same time, granted good terms to the officer who commanded in the former, but obliged the garrison of the latter to surrender prisoners of war<sup>a</sup>. By this means he opened a communication with the sea; and having received from on board the ships an immense quantity of hurdles, his infantry, by the help of these, passed the morasses that lie round the town. He then made a false attack at the water-gate, which drew the attention of the garrison, who fatigued themselves exceedingly in retrenching behind the breach; but when they had finished their work, he began to fire upon the castle, where the walls were very old, and had been neglected on account of the breadth of the ditch, which was also very deep when the tide was in; but a great breach being made, the duke caused it to be attacked in the night, and during the ebb, the soldiers passing almost up to the shoulders. The place was easily carried, though the governor made three vigorous attacks before the break of day, in order to dislodge them; but the French, though they lost a considerable number of men, kept their posts<sup>b</sup>. The governor then saw that it was impracticable to defend the place any longer; and therefore made the best terms for himself that he could, which, however, were not very good; and thus, in eight days, the duke of Guise recovered a fortress, which cost the victorious Edward the third a whole year's siege, and which had been now two hundred and ten years in the possession of the English, without so much as a single attempt to retake it. There are very different accounts given of this matter. Some English historians say, that king Philip penetrated the design of the French upon this fortress, gave notice of it in England, and offered to take the defence of it upon himself; but that this, out of jealousy, was refused, it being believed to be only an artifice to get a place of such consequence into his own hands. The truth of the matter seems to be this; the strength of Calais consisted in its situation and outworks, which required a very numerous garrison; but this being attended with a very large expence, the best part of the troops there had been sent to join Philip's army; so that the governor had not above five hundred men, and there were not more than two hundred and fifty of the townsmen able to bear arms. As to ammunition, artillery, and provisions, the French found there abundance; but with so slender a garrison it was impossible to make a better defence; and, therefore, when the lord Wentworth, who was governor, and whom the French call lord Dumfort, was tried by his peers for the loss of this place, he was acquitted<sup>c</sup>. The castle of Guifnes surrendered also, after a short, but a very sharp siege, and the garrison in that of Hames, tho' the situation rendered it impregnable, abandoned it; so that, by the end of January, the English had nothing left of what for so long a time they had<sup>d</sup> possessed in France. The duke of Guise obliged all the English inhabitants to quit Calais, and bestowed the government of it upon des Termes, who was soon after made a marshal of France<sup>e</sup>, in consideration of his eminent services in Scotland and Italy.

The marriage of the dauphin with Mary queen of Scots; the taking of Thionville, and the great defeat at Gravelines.

THE king, while this was doing in the field, held the states, as is generally said, or, as others stile them, an assembly, of the notables at Paris, in which the parliament entered as a distinct body, and took place between the nobles and the people. The king demanded from this assembly three millions of livres, which were very chearfully granted<sup>f</sup>. The states sat but a week, and as soon as they separated, the king went with the Dauphin to visit the frontiers, and made a kind of triumphant entry into Calais. The house, or, as it began to be now stiled, the faction of Lorrain, was predominant; and to secure their authority, as well as in some measure to perpetuate it, they pressed the marriage of the Dauphin with queen Mary of Scotland, which was accordingly celebrated on the 24th of April<sup>g</sup>; but the Scots ambassadors, who were sent over by the states to assist at the solemnity, having refused to acknowledge the Dauphin for their sovereign, are said to have paid dear for it, four of them dying with strong suspicions of poison, which threw a shade on that marriage, and verified the constable's prediction, that it would be fatal to both nations. But the cardinal of Lorrain and the duke of Guise, who were uncles to the queen, fortified their interest by it for the present. They procured, not long after, the king's permission for the duchess dowager of Lorrain to visit her son at Peronne: she brought with her the famous Granvelle, bishop of Arras, and the cardinal of Lorrain conducted thither the young prince. What the avowed motive of this interview might be, does not very clearly appear; but it is commonly, and with great probability, supposed to have been the source of all the subsequent miseries of France<sup>h</sup>. Granvelle informed the cardinal, that Dandelot, the admiral's brother, and the constable's nephew, was a zealous protestant. The cardinal told this to the king at his return, who did not believe it. He questioned him, however, about it publickly, as he attended him at dinner, and asked particularly what he thought of the sacrifice of the mass? He answered firmly, that he thought it an impiety. The king, going to throw a plate at him, hurt the a Dauphin who stepped in between them, and immediately sent Dandelot prisoner to the castle of Melun<sup>c</sup>. The pope, when he heard of it, was very angry that the king did not cause him to be burnt. The king deprived him of his great office of colonel general of the infantry, notwithstanding the great services he had performed, and bestowed it upon Montluc, who was attached to the duke of Guise<sup>d</sup>. He attended that prince at the siege of Tbionville, which, tho' a very strong place, was taken in seventeen days; but it cost the life of marshal Strozzi, whose baton was given to Monsieur des Termes<sup>e</sup>. Orders were sent to that officer to march with a small body of troops into the enemy's country, with an assurance that he should be supported by the duke of Guise. Monsieur de Termes executed this command with all possible spirit and success; he took Dunkirk and Bergue-Saint-Winock, and penetrated as far as Nieuport. Hearing nothing of the duke of Guise, he was obliged to retreat, followed by count Egmont, with a superior army, who forced him to a battle on the sands near Graveline, on the 13th of July, where, being exposed to the fire of ten English men of war, his troops were soon broke, about a third killed, another third taken prisoners, himself and many persons of distinction<sup>f</sup>. As for the rest, they were most of them knocked on the head by the peasants. The duke of Guise came in so good time with his army to cover the frontiers, that it highly raised his glory with the populace, tho' there wanted not those who suspected that marshal de Termes, with his forces, had been sacrificed with this view. Admiral Clinton, with a body of six thousand English, made a descent in Bretagne, and became masters of the town of Conquet; but they were quickly forced to reembark by the duke d'Estampes, who, after throwing great garrisons into Brest and St. Maloes, marched towards them with fifteen thousand foot, and seven thousand horse.

In Italy the French affairs declined extremely, and all the importunities of marshal Brisac, <sup>The princes of the house of Lorraine quarrel with the dukes of Valentinois.</sup> to obtain supplies, were fruitless; and the cardinal of Lorraine, to justify his own conduct in this manner, gave out that Brisac had raised a fortune to himself, by diverting the public money to his own use. The duchess of Valentinois upon this charge abandoned the marshal, for whom she had shewn so much esteem; and it was not without some difficulty that he obtained leave to come to court in order to vindicate himself, which he did so effectually, that he not only recovered his credit with the king, but grew also into his favour, which did not contribute to make his circumstances easier in Piedmont, since those who hated him for his abilities were now become jealous of him as their rival<sup>g</sup>. For these reasons it was never put in his power to avail himself of the diversions made by the Turkish fleet on the coasts of Naples and Sicily, which were afterwards victualled in Provence; so that they rendered the French exceedingly odious throughout Christendom, without rendering them any service. At the close of the summer, Henry and Philip both put themselves at the head of their respective armies, which were encamped very near each other, as if they intended to decide all their quarrels by a battle. But on a sudden things changed their face; for the princes of the house of Lorraine having taken the liberty to doubt whether a woman of seventy could pique herself on beauty, without being ridiculous, the duchess of Valentinois, in her turn, took the freedom of laying before the king the miseries of his subjects, and advised him to make use of the constable to set on foot a negotiation for peace<sup>h</sup>. Upon this Philip gave that nobleman leave to go to the king's camp, where he was received by his master with all possible marks of esteem and tenderness. Yet a short truce was all that followed, Philip insisting peremptorily upon the restitution of Calais, as Henry did that Navarre should be restored to its sovereign; but in the mean time died Charles the fifth, and Mary of England, which rendered Philip less positive, and made way for the conferences of Chateau Cambresis, where the English and Spanish plenipotentiaries differing, they treated apart<sup>i</sup>; at length each concluded a separate peace, notwithstanding the Dauphin, by the king's command, had assumed the arms of England, as if upon the death of queen Mary he had acquired a title to that crown, in right of his consort the queen of Scots; a circumstance useless to France, and fatal to her.

f THE princes of the house of Lorraine, sensible that their favour was rather on the decline, pressed the marriage which had been promised between the duke, chief of their house, and the king's second daughter the princess Claude, which was accordingly celebrated in the month of February<sup>k</sup>, while the negotiations for peace were yet depending. The duke of Guise and his brother, according to the maxims of their policy, affected to blame a treaty which was so visibly disadvantageous to France, since for Hames, Catalet, and St. Quintin, they rendered one hundred and ninety-eight fortified places to their enemies. But the constable had persuaded the king that, in order to become truly puissant, he did not stand in need of any accession of territory, but of a kingdom, where the people lived more at ease, had their lands better cultivated, and were addicted to industry and traffic. At the same time that he introduced these new maxims, he prevailed upon the king to discard two old ones, which, he convinced him, had been the one ruinous, and the other scandalous, to his predecessor; and so long as they continued to influence his councils, could not fail of producing the same effects: the first was the pretensions of the house of Orleans in Italy, which served only to exhaust the wealth and the force of the nation, and to exalt a number of new families in Italy to the rank and degree of princes; the other was the close alliance with the Turks, which had indeed made the French formidable; but had, however, made them hated by all the princes in Europe. These maxims once discarded, the quitting the places that were still in their hands in Italy was a thing natural, and in some measure, a thing political, which ought to have qualified the seeming inequality of the places rendered by the king, in comparison of those given up to France by the peace. But the true equivalent for all these places was the preserving Calais and its dependencies, and the three imperial cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, which were of infinitely more consequence to France than all that she relinquished. more especially when it is considered, that, by restoring his territories, the king had in view also the gaining the duke of Savoy, who was to marry the king's sister. At the beginning of June he came with the duke of Alba and the prince of Orange, and a train of one hundred persons of quality, to receive the princess Elizabeth for king Philip, and to espouse the princess Margaret himself. The first of these marriages being over<sup>1</sup>, the duke would hold a tournament, in which himself, with the duke of Guise, the duke of Nemours, and the prince of Ferrara, were defendants; the first day he acquitted himself with great applause, as he likewise did on the second, which was the 30th of June; but in the evening he would break a lance with the count de Montgomery, the son of Monsieur de Lorges, captain of his guards, who was esteemed one of the strongest as well as one of the ablest knights in France: the count did all he could to avoid it, and the queen pressed the king not to enter the lists again; but he persisted in his first intention; and in this encounter Montgomery broke his lance in shivers up to his hand, one of the splinters of which (the king insisting that they should tilt with their vizors up) flew with great violence into his right eye, so that reeling from his horse he was caught by the dauphin and some other persons of quality<sup>m</sup>. Some say that he lost all sense and the power of speech, and that he never recovered either; others affirm that he forgave the count of Montgomery, and forbid his being questioned. His surgeons, on the taking off the first dressing, had very little hopes of his recovery; the duke of Savoy, who foresaw the difficulties that would attend the restitution of his dominions, in case his marriage was deferred till the king's death, caused it to be represented to him; and it was thereupon celebrated on the 9th of July<sup>n</sup>, some say, in the king's chamber, others, in the church of Notre Dame: on the 10th the king died, in the forty-second year of his age<sup>o</sup>, and in the 13th of his reign, exceedingly regretted by his subjects; for, with many faults, he had most of the qualities that endear a monarch in France; he was brave, liberal, and polite; and though he was not learned himself, yet he had a great affection and esteem for learned men, and more especially for poets. He died very unseasonably for France, since he was disposed to have laid aside the princes of Lorraine, to have lessened the taxes, and to have concerted other means of giving ease and satisfaction to his subjects<sup>p</sup> (H).

(H) This great king, to whom the French writers, at least some of them, have given the surname of Bellicieux, or Warlike, was indeed of a martial disposition, and fortunate enough in some of his expeditions, particularly those against the English, by which he recovered Calais and its dependencies, and kept them by a well-timed negotiation. He was magnificent in his court, rather than in his buildings; he was not very nice in his dress, though it has been remarked, as an evidence of his finery, that he wore silk stockings (1). He had some tincture of learning, and was a patron to men of letters, more especially poets. He is blamed for suffering his court to sink into every kind of vice and luxury, under the specious titles of gallantry and politeness; so that he spent incomparably greater sums in gratifying his humour, and by an ill-timed liberality, than his father had done under all his necessities (2). He espoused, during the life-time of his father and his brother, Katherine de Medicis, daughter of Laurence, duke of Bourbon, born at Florence, April 13th, 1519, who, at the time of her marriage, though but fourteen, was esteemed handsome. It is true, she was not a regular beauty, but very agreeable; and, having excellent parts, and a good education, made it her principal study to sustain the lustre of her charms, by the prudence and affability of her behaviour. Yet, notwithstanding this, and her being 19 years younger than his mistress, she never made any great impression on the king's heart, nor had much share in the management of affairs during his reign, at which though she was exceedingly chagrined, yet she knew how to dissimulate it, and spent her time chiefly in the education of her children, whose tempers she diligently studied, and acquired over them an ascendancy which she preserved to within a few years of her death (3). She was ten years before she had any children. She bore afterwards ten; Francis, dauphin, and king of Scots in right of his wife; Lewis, duke of Orleans, who died at two years of age; Charles, who succeeded his brother Francis; Alexander, whose name at his confirmation was changed to Henry, who succeeded Charles; and Hercules, who at confirmation assumed the name of Francis,

<sup>a</sup> At the accession of Francis the second, he was not quite sixteen years of age, weak in his constitution, and no way remarkable for the forwardness of his capacity<sup>1</sup>. His wife, Mary queen of Scots, was also very young, but had infinitely better parts, which had been cultivated with great care by her mother and by her uncles<sup>2</sup>. In the eye of the law the king, however young or infirm, was of age, and at liberty to chuse his own council, those who in name were to govern under him; but who, in reality, were to govern both him and his kingdom. It was the full sense of this that excited those intrigues which gradually occasioned troubles that were of near seventy years continuance<sup>3</sup> (I). and who was successively duke of Alençon, Brabant, and Anjou, a prince of whom we shall have occasion to say much hereafter, but whose character may be easily collected from the appellations given him by his mother and his brother Henry. The queen always called him her Fils égare, that is, her light-headed son; and Henry never mentioned him by any other title than ce Scelerat, that villain, and charged the king of Navarre, who was afterwards his successor, to put him to death, which was not in that monarch's nature (4). Her daughters were also five, Elizabeth or Isabella, who was intended for Edward the sixth of England, demanded for the infant Don Carlos, and at length married to his father Philip the second: she died in child-bed, October the 3d, 1568. Claude, who espoused Charles the second, duke of Lorraine; she was the favourite daughter of the queen, who, it is thought, designed to place the crown of France on the head of her eldest son, in case she had survived Henry the third. Margaret, who was the first wife of Henry, king of Navarre. Victoria and Joanna, twins, who died in their cradles (5). Besides these, the king had several natural children. By a Scots lady, whose name was Fleming, he had Henry d'Angoulême, grand prior of France, and governor of Provence. By Philippa, who was a native of Piedmont, he had Diana d'Angoulême, who first espoused Horatio Farnese, and afterwards Francis de Montmorency, in order to which the law was made against clandestine marriages. By madame de Sevigné he had Henry de St. Remy. By the duchess of Valentinois he had no children (6). The manner of this monarch's death was so extraordinary, that an opinion very strongly prevailed of its being foretold by Luke Gauric, a famous astrologer. As this fallacious art was the grand foible of that age, even the most judicious of French historians has given into this tale, and reports, that Katherine de Medicis having caused the king's horoscope to be judged by the astrologer before mentioned, he predicted that the king would be killed in a duel by a wound received in his eye, for which he was extremely derided, till the king's misfortune verified his prediction (7). The first part of the story is very likely to be true, and part of the last; for the judgment of Gauric was, that if the king surmounted the dangers with which he was threatened in the 63d and 64th years of his age, he would live happily to the age of sixty-four years and nine months, in which he was mistaken full thirty years (8). Henry the second gave for his device a crescent, with this motto, Donc totum impicat orbem; that is, till her orb shall become full, in honour of Diana de Poitiers (9). His body was interred with his ancestors at St. Denis, the constable de Montmorency having this charge left to him by those who excluded him from any share in affairs of state.

(I) As this short reign was remarkable only for faction and intrigue, it is absolutely requisite, in order to render the text intelligible, that we should give the reader, in this note, a succinct memoir of the state of the court. The house of Guise was equally numerous and great, the duke having five brothers and two sisters. We shall speak of the ladies first. The eldest, Mary, had espoused first, Lewis duke of Longueville; and next, James the fifth, king of Scotland, whose dowager she then was, regent of that kingdom, and mother to the reigning queen of France (10). Louisa, who married Charles de Croy, prince of Chimay (11). The duke Francis was, in the opinion of all the writers of those times, one of the most accomplished men in France, gentle, modest, affable, liberal, an excellent officer, a finished courtier, polite without meanness, and sincere without offence; ambition was his only vice, and most think that, if it had not been for his brother, he would have kept this within bounds (12). Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, archbishop of Rheims, was a man of great natural parts, assisted by an excellent education, and an indefatigable spirit: he spoke eloquently, and wrote admirably; but his ambition was yet more boundless than his capacity; he was haughty and enterprising in prosperity; and had but a small share of that fortitude which his brother possessed in a supreme degree. He was no enemy to reformation, if it might have been done in his own way; and, it was suspected, would have brought in the confession of Augsburgh, in order to have governed, with the title of primate, the church of France (13). Claude, duke of Aumale, Lewis cardinal of Guise, the grand prior of France, and the marquis of Elbeuf, acted under their brethren, and rendered the family so much the more formidable by their adhering closely to each other (14). The princes of the blood were all of the house of Bourbon. The head of it, Anthony, king of Navarre, was a mild good-natured honest man, indolent, given to women, and less esteemed than he would have been from his loving his country sincerely, and having an inclination, if it had been possible to live in quiet (15). His brother Lewis, prince of Condé, did not resemble him in the least, except in his passion for women. He was a little man, and had nothing striking, either in his person or manners; his fortune was very narrow, not above six thousand livres a year; but he was brave, active, enterprising, eloquent when he took the pains to speak, and equally firm in council and in action (16). The duke of Montpensier was a gallant man, but a zealous papist, and strongly attached to the court. His brother, the prince of Roche Guion, followed his example, and never changed sides (17). The constable, Anne de Montmorency, was very justly reputed the wisest man in France. He remained firm in the old religion, through the persuasions of his wife, who continually put him in mind that he was the first Christian baron (18). He had five sons, of whom Francis the eldest was marshal of France; Henry, who took the name of Damville, was marshal likewise, and afterwards constable. His other sons were likewise powerful. Gaspar de Coligni, admiral of France, was nephew to the constable, and the great rival of the duke of Guise. He was a zealous protestant, and regulated his life by the principles of his religion; one of the

had a right, from custom and the constitution, to be consulted in the conduct of affairs, were a excluded through jealousy of their great power, as if they were like to be less dangerous when offended, than when employed. The constable, his children, and nephews, who, from their credit in the last reign, were of themselves a party, met with the same treatment, the king declaring that he meant to confide the management of his affairs to the Guises, the duke having the direction of whatever regarded military affairs, and his brother the cardinal of Lorraine having the management of the finances, and the domestic oeconomy. Though this agreed with, it was not so much the effects of the king's choice, as of the two queens. The dowager was persuaded, if the princes were admitted into a share, they would soon possess themselves of the whole administration; and, looking upon it as their right, pay her nothing more than exterior respect; and, as for the constable, she hated him and his whole family. b On the other hand, the Guises sought her friendship, and, being the uncles of the young queen, could not be easily disgraced. Besides, she wanted support, and therefore she insisted only on one condition, which was, their abandoning the duchess of Valentinois to her resentment, which, without regard either to gratitude or their alliance, the duke of Aumale having married her daughter, they did<sup>t</sup>. The marshal St. André adhered to the Guises; he was a voluptuous man, and immersed in debt, able to give a fair appearance to whatever measures he pursued, and who pursued this, because, neither in point of inclination or estate, it was not at all convenient for him to quit the court.

WHEN this step was taken, it rendered many others necessary. The king was instructed to recommend repose and a retired life to the constable, who thereupon went to his noble seat at c Chantilly: his office of master of the household was taken from him, and given to the duke of Guise; but, to make some small amends, his eldest son was declared marshal of France. The prince of Condé was sent into Flanders, with a ratification of the late peace, and the collar of the king's order to the king of Spain<sup>u</sup>. In his absence the government of Picardy, which had been intended for him by the late king, was bestowed on the marshal Brisac, who, chagrined at the ill usage of his old friend, was amazed, but at the same time obliged by this act of justice, in those whom he had never considered in that light. The seals being taken from Bertrandi, now become a cardinal, were restored to the chancellor Olivier, which raised the reputation of the new ministry, and some other promotions were made with the like view<sup>v</sup>. The constable, as soon as the late king was wounded, had written to Anthony, king of d Navarre, first prince of the blood, to press his coming to court. In pursuance of this advice, he was come as far as Vendosme, where he was met by the admiral Coligni, his two brothers Dandelot and the cardinal de Chatillon, with several other persons of great distinction, and at length joined by the prince of Condé, on his return from Flanders. There they deliberated on the state of affairs, and the ill usage they had met with; the prince Dandelot and some others were for having recourse to arms, under pretence that the king was in the hands of strangers; but his brother the king of Navarre, and the majority of that assembly, were for milder measures<sup>x</sup>. Upon this the king was sent to court, where he was cajoled by the queen-mother, and but indifferently treated by the ministers, who shewed so little respect to his dignity, as a king and first prince of the blood, that, when he came to St. Germain en Laye, he e might have lain in the streets, if the marshal de St. André, out of pure politeness, had not offered him his apartments in the castle<sup>y</sup>. However, he and the prince of Condé both assisted at the king's coronation on the 18th of September, at Rheims, which was performed by the cardinal of Lorraine, archbishop of that see<sup>z</sup>. After this, the king of Navarre was invited to council, where a letter was read from the king of Spain, importing, that he had intelligence of some discontents in the kingdom, and offering whatever assistance could be desired for the support of the young king's authority. The queen-mother, perceiving that this wrought, as it was expected it would, upon the king of Navarre, desired that he would conduct her daughter the princess Elizabeth to the frontiers of Spain, which would afford him an opportunity of f entering into a negociation for the recovery of his dominions, in which she promised him all the assistance that was in her power<sup>a</sup>. Anthony accepted this commission; and meeting with ablest statesmen and greatest captains of his time; and, though very unfortunate, yet this was so far from tarnishing, that it added lustre to his reputation (19). His second brother Dandelot, colonel general of the infantry of France, was a man of a warmer temper, but not at all less steady. He was imprisoned and disgraced in the reign of Henry the second for his religion, which he never dissembled, and which he bravely defended (20).

The third brother Odet, cardinal de Chatillon, and bishop of Beauvais, received the hat at seventeen, which did not hinder his becoming a zealous protestant. He married towards the end of his life, and took the title of count de Beauvais. He was naturally indolent; but, being once embarked in business, became an able negociator (21).

a the duke of Alva on the frontiers, he so charmed him with fair words and delusive promises, that he retired into Bearn, and quitted the party of the malecontents.

THE court seemed now so well settled, that they had nothing to fear, which, however, did not hinder them from concerting and carrying into execution every measure possible for their security; but, though this was the real view, they took care to conceal it, and to frame the edicts published in the king's name in such a manner, that they appeared to be calculated solely for the public good. They forbade the carrying of fire arms, or wearing such dresses as might conceal them, to prevent mischief and murder in the streets. They resumed lands alienated from the royal domain; they obliged all who had two or more places, to make choice of one, and to quit the rest. By these methods they provided for their own security, and for their own creatures. They likewise made a promotion of eighteen knights of the order at once, which, though it gratified many, exposed that honour, to which the first subjects had hitherto eagerly aspired, to a degree of contempt, from which it never recovered<sup>b</sup>. But when, by these other arts, they had thoroughly established themselves, and procured a general submission, they began to discover another kind of spirit, which at once augmented the number of their enemies, and furnished with matter of complaint multitudes, especially of military persons out of employment, most of which repaired to court, some to solicit their arrears, and others to obtain relief. The cardinal of Lorrain, vexed with their applications, and not knowing how to content them, published an edict, by which they were commanded to retire in a very short space, on pain of being hanged without process. The king going for his health to Blois, they persuaded him, that, to tread in the same path, and fulfil the will of his deceased father, he should, by an edict, add a chamber to each of the parliaments in the kingdom for the prosecution of heretics; and from the fury with which they proceeded, and the punishment to which they condemned those who were convicted before them, they were stiled Chambres Ardentes, i. e. Burning Chambers<sup>c</sup>. At Paris, the president Minard, who was remarkably violent, being killed in the streets, this was revenged upon Jean du Bourg, nephew to the chancellor of the same name, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, a man of invincible firmness and incorruptible probity, who had been condemned in the late reign for his religion, and was now hanged and burnt on the nineteenth of December, at the common place of execution, where he behaved with an intrepidity<sup>d</sup> worthy of his own reputation, and of the cause of truth in which he suffered.

In consequence of these acts of violence a new spirit began to manifest itself throughout the kingdom; those who had embraced the reformed religion, and were very numerous, saw that it was absolutely impossible for them to serve God in the way which they thought was most acceptable to him, without exposing themselves to imprisonment, tortures, and death. The more considerate catholics, amongst whom were some prelates and many of the clergy, disapproved this furious conduct, and testified an inclination to conciliate mens minds by a just and reasonable reformation, under legal authority; the scandalous ignorance, and more scandalous vices of most of those ecclesiastics who drove on these furious measures, discrediting their cause, much more than the authority of the court could advance it. The admiral and his brothers were avowed protestants; the king of Navarre, and his brother the prince of Condé, were inclined to the reformed religion; and, therefore, in the first general assembly held at Nantes, at which were present one hundred and fifty deputies from the reformed in all the different provinces, it was resolved to take the only measure left for their own defence, that of putting themselves in arms; with which view the prince of Condé was chosen Chef muet, i. e. the silent or concealed chief, and John du Barri, Seigneur de la Renaudie, Chef visible, or the acting and avowed head of the protestants<sup>e</sup>. This gentleman is on all hands allowed to have been a person of great parts and most determined resolution; but is reported to have been guilty of some irregularities in his youth, which might have been fatal to him, but for the favour of the duke of Guise. Subordinate chiefs were likewise chosen to direct the intended armament in different provinces; and Renaudie was sent over to England to solicit the countenance and pecuniary assistance of queen Elizabeth, in which his views were furthered by the imprudent conduct, or rather by the exorbitant ambition of the house of Guise, who, not content with the absolute direction of the two kingdoms of France and Scotland, aspiring to the like dominion over England, kept up the claim of their niece to that crown, and endeavoured to suppress the reformed in Scotland, which constrained Elizabeth, for her own security, to assist both the Scotch and the French maleconteuts<sup>f</sup>. The reformed in this kingdom, being once apprized of her sentiments, and those of the German princes in another assembly, resolved to surprise the court at Blois, to secure the persons of the king and of the Guises, or rather to rid themselves of the latter, to oblige the king to declare the prince of Condé lieutenant general of the realm, and, in short, to change the whole face of affairs<sup>g</sup>. March for this enterprize, for the execution of which, their forces were to defile, with all a possible secrecy, in small numbers, under chiefs already appointed from every quarter. This was conducted with such profound secrecy, that the court had not the least intelligence of it, till Renaudie, having communicated the whole of it to Peter Annelles, an advocate of Paris, with whom he lodged, this man, either through fear or from some other motive, gave intelligence of it to the court<sup>b</sup>, where at first the thing appeared so amazing, that it was scarce credited; but, upon closer inquiry, it was thought requisite to lose no time in providing for the king's security and their own; in order to which the duke of Guise was confirmed in his post of lieutenant general of the kingdom, and the court removed from the castle of Amboise, of which those embarked in this hazardous undertaking were apprized<sup>i</sup>; but, finding themselves so far advanced, resolved to proceed, more especially as the prince of Condé was actually b with the king, and there were also many other persons about the court, of whose good intentions towards them they had, or persuaded themselves they had, reason to be assured. Thus both sides seemed to agree to put the king to a trial, in a manner that must of necessity throw the whole realm into convulsions.

Amboise defeated; cruelties thereupon,
and narrow escape of the prince of Condé.

It was foreseen by the duke of Guise, that respect to the king's name, and the influence of his own authority, would enable him to assemble troops enough to disappoint those who were embarked in this attack; and, by his great resolution, joined to his indefatigable diligence, and his superior skill in military affairs, it ended as he imagined it would. The count de Sancerre defeated the troops from Bearn; the duke de Nemours surprised the baron de Castelneau, and made him prisoner, with the greatest part of his officers; Pardaillan fell upon Renaudie in a c wood, defeated the troops that still remained with him, and, in a personal engagement, ran him twice through the body; his page also shot him through with a harquebus, notwithstanding which, that desperate man killed the page. His body was exposed upon a gibbet, and afterwards quartered; three of the chiefs who surrendered were tortured and put to death in the presence of the queen-dowager and of all the ladies of her court. One of them, whose name was Villemonge, having first washed his hands in the blood of one of his companions, held them up to heaven, and cried out, "Lord, revenge our cause." Upwards of twelve hundred were beheaded, hanged, or drowned in the river; the streets of Amboise literally swam with blood. The good old chancellor Olivier, after having laboured all he could to recommend milder measures, died of regret and horror, at the sight of cruelties, which it was d not in his power to prevent<sup>k</sup>. La Bigne, secretary to la Renaudie, was grievously tortured, in order to oblige him to accuse the prince of Condé, who was confined; but all that could be drawn from him was, that he had heard him reported to favour them. The prince, being admitted to speak for himself before the council, made his defence with great intrepidity and eloquence, closing his speech with observing, that, as there were only suspicions and insinuations against him, he could only offer to maintain his innocence with his sword, against any who should question it. The duke of Guise, observing the impression which his discourse had made on all the assembly, rose up, and, professing a belief of what the prince had said, offered to be his second<sup>l</sup>. This was only the effects of a resolution taken to dissemble what they knew, in order to prevent the prince from putting himself immediately and openly at the head of the e protestants, in case they spared his life, or of provoking the king of Navarre, with the constable, the admiral, and his brethren, to take the like step, if they put the prince of Condé to death. He very well understood this; so that, notwithstanding the feigned reconciliation which followed upon the compliment paid him by the duke of Guise, he was no sooner at liberty than he retired into Bearn to his brother<sup>m</sup>.

Methods taken to conciliate
all parties.

It required no great penetration to foresee, that what had passed might, instead of appeas- ing, excite fresh trouble; and therefore art was to achieve what had been begun by force: a relation of what had passed at Amboise was transmitted to the constable, with the king's ex- press orders to communicate it to the parliament of Paris, which he did, with great com- pliments to the duke of Guise; but he took the liberty of dropping the most material part of the relation, which was, that the conspiracy reached the king's person, because he knew it was f not true. The parliament complimented the court, and particularly the duke of Guise, to whom they gave the sounding title of Preserver of his Country<sup>n</sup>. Pieces of the same kind were transmitted to all parts of the kingdom, and the king wrote particularly to the two princes in Navarre, and to admiral Coligni in Normandy, to dispel any insurrections, and to keep things quiet. The queen-mother wrote to the latter, pressing him exceedingly to perform what the king expected, and to give her his advice on the present state of affairs, which he performed with great freedom. He told her, that, to restore the public tranquillity, two things were necessary; to remove the house of Guise, and to grant them liberty of conscience; after which, if she assumed the government intirely into her own hands, her prudence would teach her to

- a preserve the peace which she had restored<sup>o</sup>. Katherine saw it was impossible to take this advice, as things then stood; but, however, she did not dislike it. Michael de l'Hospital, the son of the constable de Bourbon's physician, was raised by her favour to the high post of chancellor of France; he put the seal to the famous edict of Romertin, by which the decision and declaration of heresy was left to the bishops, and power given to the subaltern judges to punish without appeal; which, it is said, he would not have done, if it had not been to avoid introducing the inquisition<sup>p</sup>. It was chiefly by his advice the resolution was taken to assemble the princes, the great lords, prelates, and ministers, which is, what the French call Assemblée des Notables, in the month of August, at Fontainbleau<sup>q</sup>; and in the mean time a treaty was made with queen Elizabeth, by which their majesties quitted all pretensions to England, and abandoned their attempt to suppress the reformed religion in Scotland, where the death of the queen-mother had fallen out very unseasonably for their schemes; for she was a princess of great modesty and moderation, and, though strongly attached to the old religion, was very willing to take any measures, or to make any concessions that were requisite to preserve her daughter's authority<sup>r</sup>.
- b

- UPON the departure of the court for Fontainbleau, the Guises, under colour of providing for the king's safety, but in which at the same time they had their own security chiefly in view, assigned him a new guard of two hundred musquetaires, commanded by Anthony du Plessis Richlieu, who had many bad, and but few good qualities, exclusive of determined courage. The assembly was opened on the 21st, when the constable with his sons, and the admiral with his brethren, appeared. The king was seated on his throne, with the two queens, and the princes, his brothers, by him, and the business of the assembly was opened by the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine<sup>s</sup>. At the second sessions, the admiral presented the king a petition in favour of the Protestants, who about this time began to be stiled Hugonots. This was warmly opposed by the duke and the cardinal; but it was boldly seconded by Montluc, bishop of Valens, and Charles de Marillot, archbishop of Vienne, who inveighed bitterly against the general want of learning and of morals amongst the clergy; pressed a national council for regulating the disputes in religion; alleging, that since the flame appeared in all parts of the kingdom, it would be weakness to send for water from the Tiber to put it out, when the Seine was so near at hand. At length it was agreed that a general assembly of the states should be called in the beginning of the year, and that the prosecution of the Protestants should be stayed in the mean time<sup>t</sup>. The reason why the court yielded to an assembly of the states, was, in hopes of drawing all the chiefs of the malcontents into the same place, and consequently of surprising them at once. It was with this view that they laboured assiduously, though with all possible secrecy, to strengthen their own hands, and, instead of Meaux, which had been the place first named, declared, in the king's name, that the states should be held at Orleans. Some attempts were in this space likewise made, by the adherents of the prince of Condé, to surprise Lyons, in which they were disappointed, by the king of Navarre's sending a countermand, as soon as he was acquainted with it, for which the French blame his irresolution; whereas the truth seems to be, that he had no intent to rebel. Such was the dismal state of things in this nation!
- c

- WHILE the nation was in this suspense, and those, who had the welfare of France at heart, conceived great hopes that measures would be effectually taken in the states for procuring such a reform of abuses of all kinds, as might qualify that violent fermentation, which religious and factious disputes had occasioned, the Guises pursued inflexibly their own plan; and having disposed every thing in the best manner possible to keep the provinces in some degree of order, brought the young king to Orleans, with his new guards, and drew gradually, under a variety of pretences, considerable forces into the neighbourhood, and by degrees into the city. In the beginning of October, the king wrote to the king of Navarre, in very precise terms, to repair to the assembly, and to bring with him his brother the prince of Condé, to which, however, neither of them were much inclined<sup>u</sup>. The marshal de St. André was thereupon sent to invite them, charged to give them the strongest assurances, and to pledge the king's royal word for their safety. The cardinal de Bourbon, an honest innocent man, was also prevailed upon to join his intreaties, and, as the memoirs of those times say, the mistresses of the king and prince were engaged by presents to join their endeavours, which at length had their effect, notwithstanding all possible pains were taken, by the true friends of the house of Navarre, to shew the king the danger into which he was on the point of plunging himself and his brother in their passage<sup>w</sup>. They were met by the princess of Condé, who laboured to dissuade her husband from going farther; and the principal lords and gentlemen of the Hugonot party used their last efforts to engage the king of Navarre to put himself at their head, offering to furnish him in a short time with twenty thousand men. The princes nevertheless proceeded, but were scarce within the walls of Orleans, before they found just reason to repent trusting to the promises that had been made them <sup>a</sup>. The prince of Condé, after having been very rudely used by the king, was sent to prison, and guards were set upon the king of Navarre <sup>y</sup>. Commissioners were named without delay for the trial of the prince; these were, the president Christopher de Thou, Bartholomew Fayes, and James Viole, counsellors of parliament, Gilbert Bourdin, and the attorney general, and John du Tillet, secretary to the parliament, assisted in their respective offices. The prince appealed to the king in his parliament of Paris, assisted by the peers, as his proper judges; the council declared this appeal void; the commissioners proceeded, and sentenced the prince of Condé to suffer death <sup>z</sup>. Mr. de Thou tells us, this sentence was not signed; but other writers assure us that it was, by all the privy council and knights of orders; only the chancellor and one of the counsellors of parliament desired time, and the count de Sancerre, when it was proposed to him, answered roundly, I shall not sign at all <sup>b</sup>. The next point was to involve the king of Navarre; and, as they had no evidence, the great historian before-mentioned reports, that a scheme was laid by marshal St. André, that the king should send for him, reproach him roughly with being a traitor, and, upon his answering with any vehemence, as it was likely he would, some posted near him for that purpose, on a sign given, were to plunge their daggers in his breast <sup>b</sup>. He was accordingly invited to this fatal interview, in which, though he answered with great spirit, yet it was with so much decency, and with such strong demonstrations of innocence, that, without making the appointed sign, he was dismissed, at which Guise was so provoked, that he was heard to say, in the corner of the room, what a weak and cowardly prince <sup>c</sup>! The historian does not affirm this, but says, he had it from good hands, and from those who committed it to writing at the time; so that there is a very high probability of its being true, more especially if we consider, that it is on all hands agreed, that the Guises, foreseeing the danger of setting him at liberty, after putting his brother to death, earnestly pressed the queen-mother to behead him likewise, without any process at all, alleging, that to free religion and government from danger, by taking off two heads, would be securing the public safety at a very easy price. Such was the spirit of these princes, and the politics of those times!

They are both delivered by the sudden and unexpected death of the king.

In this critical situation of things, when the continuance of the prince's life hung but by a thread, and that too as it were between the sheers, the young king having rejected rudely enough the princess's application for mercy, providence interposed. The king, rising early one morning to hunt, that he might avoid the sight of an execution, a diversity of which were the sole distinctions of his unhappy reign, fainted while they were combing his hair; and, when he came to himself, complained of an intolerable pain of the head. He had a fistula in one of his ears, which his physicians had considered as the symptom of an abscess; and, therefore, they quickly pronounced him in the utmost danger, which gave a new turn to affairs <sup>d</sup>. The duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lorraine, very earnestly pressed the queen-mother to put the king of Navarre, as well as the prince of Condé, to death; to which she answered irresolutely, and with tears. At length, being importuned for a positive answer, she demanded a few hours to consider of it, in which space she consulted her oracle the chancellor, who, laying hold of this opportunity, set the thing in a true light. He told her, that, tho' she was a queen and the mother of kings, she was at the same time a woman and a stranger; that to put the king of Navarre to death without a trial, would be to render herself the execration of France, and at the same time make such a precedent, as, from the moment it was made, she would have the greatest reason to fear. Yet, that this was not more dangerous than to behead the prince of Condé, and leave the king of Navarre alive, who, the moment the king expired, must be set at liberty, and who would then have, not only the Calvinists, but all the nobility of France ready to espouse his interest and his resentment. But, if she took the contrary course, the Guises, having no support but her favour, must receive her commands with submission, at the same time that the princes would adhere to her from gratitude: that the safety of the monarchy depended on a reconciliation of these jarring interests, and, that gaining this absolute ascendancy would put that reconciliation in her power <sup>e</sup>. The queen, who saw the rectitude of this advice, pursued it with steadiness and dignity. She sent for the king of Navarre, and, after affirming that she had his life, as much as his brother's, in her power, she prescribed the terms, upon which they might both be saved, which consisted in his resignation of the regency in her favour, upon the ensuing minority, and a reconciliation with the Guises. The king came readily enough into the first, but shewed great reluctance as to the second; but at length was forced to comply. This reconciliation was made in the chamber of the dying king, who, to facilitate it, took all upon himself, professing, that whatever had a been done was by his orders, and without any instigation of the Guises, who, he affirmed, were constantly interceding for the princes<sup>f</sup>. This was the last action of this unhappy monarch, who expired on the 5th of December, when he wanted somewhat less than two months of eighteen years, after a reign of a year and five months<sup>g</sup>. He was stiled the king without vice, which, as Mezeray well observes, would have been a high character, if it had proceeded less from a want of capacity, than from a want of inclination<sup>h</sup>. At the death of the king his father, the care of his body and his funeral was left to the constable, the queen-mother and the Guises having other things to mind; but the body of this poor prince was so totally abandoned, that if his governors, the Sieurs de la Brosse and de Sansac had not interposed, there had been no care taken of it at all. This extreme ingratitude in the Guises provoked some body to throw a note b upon his coffin, in which were these words, Where then is Tannegui du Chastel? But he was a Frenchman! alluding to that brave man, who, at the hazard of his life, and the expense of his fortune, caused the corpse of Charles the eighth to be magnificently interred, though he knew it would be considered as a crime by Lewis the eleventh<sup>i</sup>. The Hugonots considered his death as a deliverance, and the manner of it as a judgment.

CHARLES, duke of Orleans, who at his baptism received the name of Maximilian, succeeded to the throne by the death of his brother, being between ten and eleven years of age<sup>k</sup>. The constable who, on hearing of the king's illness, set out from Chantilly, was by this time in the neighbourhood of Orleans, to whom the queen-mother wrote in the most obliging terms, intreating him to make haste to resume the functions of his office, and to rest assured that she would do nothing but by his advice. The constable, whatever she might do, took her advice literally; and, as soon as he entered Orleans, sent for the officers of the new guards, told them they were in arms against their country, and that the person of the king was always safe when surrounded by his people; upon which they immediately dispersed. The queen-mother had the chief authority, and the power of regent, but without assuming the title, tho' given her by most historians. The king of Navarre had the title of the king's lieutenant general, and the prince of Condé was removed to La Fere under a guard, till he should be declared innocent<sup>l</sup>. On the 13th of December, the states were opened<sup>m</sup>. The speakers of the nobility and the commons inveighed bitterly against the negligence, luxury, and avarice of the clergy; the orator of the clergy, on the other hand, talked very high, demanded the abolition of the concordat, and the re-establishment of the pragmatic sanction. Some discourse there was of an inquiry into the state of the finances; king Francis the first having left near two millions in his coffers, and the crown being at this time near forty-two millions in debt. But there were so many of the great that would have been interested in the event of this inquiry, and the Guises were so likely to be little affected by it, that it was quickly stopped. Some good laws in respect to the administration of justice, a suspension of all religious persecution, the restitution of the old custom of electing bishops, and a general amnesty for what was passed, being enacted, the states were prorogued to May. The constable, duke of Guise, and the marshal de St. André, entered into a close alliance, and were stiled the TRIUMVIRATE: the queen-mother, upon this, leaned to the side of the king of Navarre and the princes. In the month of March c the prince of Condé was declared innocent by the council, and that declaration was confirmed by the parliament<sup>n</sup>. On Easter-Day the triumvirate communicated together, as a mark of the sincerity of their reconciliation; and on the 15th of May the king was crowned at Rheims by the cardinal of Lorraine<sup>o</sup>. The admiral, who was a sincere protestant, perceiving how well the king of Navarre stood with the queen, and being persuaded they had nothing to fear from the chancellor, presented a new petition in favour of the Hugonots, which was referred to the consideration of the parliament, where the king, the queen, and most of the princes of the blood were personally present<sup>p</sup>; and, after warm debates, it was decided, by the plurality of voices, that all offences in respect to religion should be referred to the ecclesiastical tribunals; all assemblies of the protestants, though without arms, were forbidden upon pain of death, f and all preaching or celebration of the sacraments, contrary to the usage of the church of Rome. Some said that John du Tillet was guilty of a fraud, in declaring the number of voices, and this edict was so little relished in the provinces, that the queen-mother, who seemed now wholly inclined to the reformed, softened it by another edict, dated from St. Germain en Laye<sup>q</sup>. The queen dowager returned to Scotland in the month of August, soon after which the assembly of the states met again at Pontoise, where the clergy, to avert the storm that was rising against them, taxed themselves in a large sum to the king<sup>r</sup>. In the month of September was held the famous colloquy, or conference, at Poissy, between the prelates and the ministers, in which the cardinal of Lorraine and Theodore Beza displayed their eloquence, notwithstanding which,

which, there was little or nothing done, except that the king of Navarre, under pretence that the ministers did not agree well amongst themselves, left the reformed, and joined himself to the triumvirate<sup>a</sup>.

The duke of Guise occasions the first civil war.

THIS threw the queen on the prince of Condé and the admiral, though she laboured all she could to recover the king of Navarre; but the court of Spain, sometimes flattering him with the restitution of his dominions, sometimes offering the island of Sardinia as an equivalent, and the Guises, as a mark of their cordiality and respect, offering their niece, the queen of Scots, provided he would obtain a divorce from the court of Rome, against the queen of Navarre, as an obstinate heretic, he, who had never shewn much constancy before, remained firm where he was<sup>b</sup>. The queen, to satisfy the admiral and the prince of Condé, called a new assembly of the states at St. Germain<sup>c</sup>, where an edict was made that gave liberty of conscience to the Hugonots, till the points in dispute were settled by a general council; this, however, rather increased than abated the troubles, both parties making preparations for a war, and reciprocally consenting to quit the court, as if it had been with a view to make the administration less difficult to the queen, though at the bottom they had the same design. The prince of Condé had treated with the duke of Wurtemberg for succours, in support of the protestant cause; the duke of Guise having an interview with that prince at Saverne, persuaded him, that himself, his brother, and the moderate catholics, were not averse to the Lutheran religion, but that the Hugonots in France were obstinate Calvinists, and equally enemies to both, by which he drew him into a treaty of neutrality<sup>d</sup>. In his return to Paris, passing through the little town of Passy, his followers insulted the Hugonots, who were at their devotions in a barn, proceeding by degrees from words to blows, though it is said that the duke laboured all he could to put an end to the fray, in which he was himself wounded in the face by a stone; there were about sixty of the Hugonots killed, and this gave a beginning to the civil war<sup>e</sup>. The triumvirate, in conjunction with the king of Navarre, prevented the prince of Condé and the admiral in surprising the queen-mother and the king, whom they conducted from Fontainebleau to Paris<sup>f</sup>. The Hugonots surprised Orleans, Bourges, Lyons, Poitiers, Tours, Aungiers, Angoulesme, Rouen, Dieppe, Havre de Grace, and other places; and, having concluded a treaty with queen Elizabeth, put the last-mentioned place into her hands, by way of deposit, in consideration of a succour in men and money<sup>g</sup>.

The battle of Dreux, in which the constable and the prince of Condé are both made prisoners.

ON the other hand, the marshal de St. André marched into Poitou with an army, and recovered Poitiers; and the king of Navarre, with the title of lieutenant-general of the realm, and having under him the constable and the duke of Guise, having first recovered Bourges, towards the close of the month of September he besieged Rouen. On the 15th of October the king of Navarre received a wound in the trenches, of which he died that day month; but this did not hinder the place from being taken by storm and plundered, or his making his entry into it through the breach in a litter<sup>a</sup>. The loss of Rouen obliged the prince of Condé to direct his march towards Normandy, where, on the 19th of December, the two armies engaged near Dreux. That of the prince of Condé consisted of four thousand horse, and eight thousand foot; the admiral commanded the van, the prince was in the center, and Dandelot in the rear. The forces of the triumvirs consisted of three thousand gens d'arms, and thirteen thousand foot; the marshal St. André commanded the first line, the constable the second, and the duke of Guise and his friends, with the flower of the army, formed the third. The constable was so desirous of acquiring the sole honour of the victory, that he charged precipitately, and not being supported in time, either by the first or third line, was defeated, wounded, and taken prisoner. The Hugonots beginning to plunder, the duke of Guise, having rallied the broken troops, charged them with such fury that they were quickly broken, and the prince of Condé wounded and taken; the marshal de St. André, pursuing too far, was surrounded and killed by the son of one Bobigni<sup>b</sup>, whose confiscation he had begged. The admiral retired with the cavalry, and the remains of the prince of Condé's army, in a manner that did him great honour. The triumvirs kept the field, but their loss was by much the greatest<sup>c</sup>.

Siege of Orleans, death of the duke of Guise, and the first peace with the reformed.

The duke of Guise was now in possession of as great authority as ever he had enjoyed in the former reign; for the queen-mother, who had shewn herself partial in favour of the Hugonots, had lost much of her credit and authority, and but for the mildness of the king of Navarre's temper, might have lost her life, having herself overheard the marshal de St. André affirm, in one of their consultations, that things would never go well till she was thrown into the river. But while this struggle for power, which in truth was the great object of the war, continued in France, the concerns of the monarchy suffered not a little. The duke of Savoy recovered<sup>d</sup> a almost all the places that the French still held in Piedmont; and the emperor demanded, and might have regained, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, if he had not suffered himself to be amused by a treaty of marriage. The duke of Guise saw this with chagrin, and therefore resolved to put as speedy an end to the war as possible; and with this view he besieged Orleans, where, on the 9th of February, he was shot in the back<sup>c</sup> by Poltrót de Meré, who, being taken and put to the torture, charged the admiral, the prince of Condé, Dandelot, Soubise, and Theodore Bcza, with having excited him to this action; but he afterwards acquitted the prince, Soubise, and Dandelot. He was carried to Paris, and drawn to pieces by wild horses. The queen sent for the marshal Brisac to continue the siege, but at the same time laboured assiduously to conclude a peace, in order to which she directed a conference to be held between the prince of b Condé and the constable, and, they not agreeing, she herself prescribed the terms. The protestants were to lay down their arms, restore the places which were in their possession, and to renounce their treaty with England: in return, they had a general pardon and liberty of conscience<sup>d</sup>. As the great point aimed at was the recovery of Havre de Grace, war was declared against England; and the prince of Condé, whom the queen had gained by promising to make him lieutenant-general of the kingdom, distinguished himself in this siege against his old allies. The place was surrendered on the 28th of July, by means of a forged letter sent to the earl of Warwick<sup>e</sup>. The king was declared major at thirteen years and a day old by the parliament of Rouen, notwithstanding the opposition given by that of Paris, which was at length forced to comply. The prince of Condé pressing the queen-mother for the performance of her promise, c and the Protestants taking great liberties with her character, which was none of the most regular, she became, out of spite, a most zealous Catholic, who, but a year before, had shewn her approbation of the Protestant doctrine, in a letter to Pope Pius the fourth<sup>f</sup>. The widow A. D. 1563. and children of the duke of Guise demanded justice against the admiral, contrary to the dying commands of the duke, who forgave all that had any concern in his death, and earnestly recommended the extinction of all animosities amongst the great men of the kingdom. The admiral protested his innocence, and the king took the cause into his own hands. On the last day of the year died the marshal de Brisac, one of the bravest men, and one of the best officers in France<sup>g</sup>.

THE queen-mother had now none to oppose or controul her; but the situation of public d affairs was such, that it required a vast capacity to comprehend and to conduct them. The Pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, sent their ambassadors into France, to solicit certain points which they had much at heart. The former was desirous of having the decrees of the council of Trent admitted and recognized, and for this he depended much upon the cardinal of Lorrain: but, upon the review of them by the parliament, it was resolved, that, in respect to doctrine and point of faith, the council should be received, but not with respect to matters of discipline, because these were equally inconsistent with the rights of the Gallican church and the late edict of pacification. The latter, who in this also had the assistance of the former, laboured to engage the crown of France in a league for the utter extirpation of Protestants; but the queen, clearly perceiving that this was designed to revive the troubles in e France, in which both his Catholic majesty and the duke of Savoy had their separate interests at heart, she, in appearance at least, declined it. The negociation with England still subsisted, which had been begun soon after the reduction of Havre de Grace, and at length a peace was concluded, which was equally necessary to both kingdoms<sup>h</sup>. The queen, under pretence of visiting his dominions, carried the king from place to place, and at length into Lorrain, where she proposed to have had an interview with the emperor, which was disappointed chiefly by the intrigues of king Philip. Thence the court went into Burgundy, and afterwards to Lyons, where a citadel was directed to be built. The Catholics were restless, and desirous of having recourse again to arms, through the instigations of the emissaries of Spain and the house of Guise; but the queen affected, for in truth it was but affectation, a spirit of equity and moderation. However, being arrived at Roussillon, a palace belonging to the counts of Tournon, f in Dauphiné, she there published an edict in the king's name, restraining the Protestants from the exercise of their religion, within ten leagues of the court<sup>i</sup>. About this time likewise the date of the year was fixed at the first of January, instead of Easter; and some other things were done, in appearance, for the public good, but which, at the bottom, tended to facilitate the queen's design, which was to conduct the ruin of the Protestants in such a manner, as not to endanger her own authority. She likewise found means to renew the alliance between the crown of France and the Swiss cantons, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Philip the second to prevent it. In appearance also, she entered into a closer correspondence with England.

The queen-mother at the head of affairs, and embarked in the most dangerous projects.

Conference at

THE king spent the winter in Provence and Languedoc, having with him the young duke of Guise, and most of the chiefs of the Catholics, who were apparently in high favour. In the mean time an accident happened at Paris, which was very near reviving the war. The cardinal of Lorraine advanced into the neighbourhood of that city, attended by a considerable body of horse, well armed; the marshal de Montmorency, who was governor of the Isle of France, sent to him to disarm his attendants, of which he took no notice, but entered Paris with this martial equipage, but was met by the marshal with a body of troops, who disarmed his attendants, and killed in his presence one of his pages, who made some resistance. Both sides complained to the court, and, at the same time, made preparations of a warlike nature; but finding that the king would not decide in favour of either party, they were afraid to proceed farther<sup>k</sup>. The court, after having visited Bordeaux, went to Bayonne, where the queen and her son had an interview with her daughter the queen of Spain and the duke of Alva<sup>l</sup>. All possible precautions were taken to disguise and keep secret what passed in these conferences; but even these precautions, and this air of mystery, made it evident, that the queen-mother was not sincere in her professions, but had still an inclination to enter into the league for the destruction of the Protestants, and the event fully justified these conjectures. Immediately after this interview the king went into Bearne, where the queen of Navarre was obliged to restore to the Catholics their churches, and to admit of a mixed magistracy of both communions, tho' the bulk of her subjects were Protestants; and the same method was pursued in other provinces, as the king returned towards Paris<sup>m</sup>.

Her intrigues with the court of Spain end
in a new civil war.

IN the beginning of the ensuing year, the court summoned to Moulins, in the Bourbonnois, the deputies from the several parliaments and other sovereign courts throughout the kingdom, in order to take effectual measures for the re-establishment of justice; and accordingly the famous ordinance, bearing date from thence, was published, consisting of fourscore and six articles<sup>n</sup>. This was the effect of the chancellor's policy, who, finding his councils less regarded in matters of state, applied himself assiduously to those of his own profession, and, bending his whole endeavours to the public good, procured, in these times of confusion, more salutary laws to be made than in any other reign; and as he shewed the uprightness of his heart in contriving, so his comprehensive capacity, and at the same time his exquisite learning and eloquence, are rendered conspicuous to posterity, by the elegant manner in which they are penned. The reconciliation which was attempted here between the Montmorencis and the cardinal of Lorraine, and between the admiral and the house of Guise, had a happy issue in shew, without producing any good effect; for, notwithstanding the outward ceremonies of agreement and forgiveness, all parties retained their secret animosities, and a full resolution of gratifying them the first fair occasion that offered<sup>o</sup>. This spirit of dissimulation went still higher; the king of Spain laboured to possess the court of France with an opinion that the great object of his policy was to extinguish heresy, and that in this his aim was to act in concert with the crown of France, though, at the same time, he laboured in Germany, in Italy, and in Switzerland, to lessen the influence and credit of this crown, and to prevent the success of those negotiations which the queen was carrying on. On the other hand, the queen-mother, who was not altogether ignorant of this, pretended to have a high jealousy of king Philip's proceedings, and spoke her sentiments of them, as it were in confidence, to the prince of Condé and the admiral; but, at the same time, she had quite other things in her mind: and, believing herself able to deal with the king of Spain in his own way, resolved to take in his assistance for the destruction of the Protestants. But as, in all great undertakings, money is the material article, she made a vast reform in the finances; and, contrary to the advice of the most zealous Catholics, disbanded a great part of the troops that had been kept on foot since the late troubles, not more with a view of retrenching expence, than to deceive the prince of Condé and the Hugonots<sup>p</sup>. To pursue these dark politics more effectually, she sent an ecclesiastic to the court of Spain, to let king Philip into her plan, that he might not take umbrage at the advices he received from his ambassador in France, who could not but be alarmed at the countenance given by the queen to the prince of Condé, notwithstanding his open declarations that the measures taken by the Spaniards in Italy were to be suspected; and that an army ought to be raised to watch the motions of the duke of Alva. The constable, having laboured ineffectually to resign his charge to his son the marshal de Montmorency, gave way to a proposition made by the prince of Condé, to resign in his favour, which did not a little embarrass the court. However, the queen soon found an expedient to prevent this scheme from taking effect, which was by prompting her son Henry duke of Anjou to declare himself the prince of Condé's competitor, which he did with such airs of grandeur and superiority, that the prince was not a little mortified<sup>q</sup>. The admiral, and his brother Dandelot, by degrees, penetrated thro'

- a all these mysteries; and gave the prince to understand, that if he was upon ill terms with the king and his brother, he was upon much worse with the queen-mother; who, while she pretended to listen to his apprehensions of the Catholic king's designs, and, in consequence of them, as he imagined, had given orders for the levying of six thousand Swiss, she was in reality preparing to second that monarch's scheme, and would employ those troops in concert with him against the Protestants. The prince of Orange gave him the like intimations; and the king having discovered his resentment that the princes of Germany should interpose in favour of his Protestant subjects, and that their ministers had conferred with the prince, he was at length convinced, that he had been all along the dupe of the queen, and that himself and those of his religion had no other way to secure their safety than by putting themselves
- b without loss of time, in a posture of defence.

THE march of the duke of Alva into the Low Countries seemed to alarm the court extremely, and occasioned the forming of a flying camp in Burgundy, though in truth the queen-mother was preparing to act in concert with him, and the Hugonots were every day more and more curtailed in their privileges, as if it had been designed to provoke them to take arms, and thereby afford the court an opportunity of treating them with the same severity shewn by the duke of Alva to their brethren in the Low Countries. Indeed there want not some who say, that as the duke put to death the counts of Egmont and Horn, for no other crime than their inviolable attachment to the liberties of their country, so the queen-mother was firmly resolved to lay hold of the first opportunity of seizing the prince of Conde and the admiral, confining the former as long as he lived, and bringing the latter to a scaffold. It is at least certain, that the prince and admiral believed themselves in the utmost danger, and thereupon formed the bold design of surprizing the whole royal family at Monceaux in Brie; and, with this view, orders were given privately to the chiefs of the party to assemble as many determined men as they could do with privacy, and to march them with all possible secrecy, at a certain day, to the little town of Rosoy, which was but a small distance from Monceaux, where the court had scarce any troops about them, though the six thousand Swiss, under the command of colonel Psiffer, were at no great distance. This design was conducted with so much address, that, but for an unforeseen accident, it had certainly succeeded. The count of Castelnau had been sent into Flanders to compliment the duke of Alva on the part of the king, and perhaps to concert some measures with him against the Protestants; the count was going to court to report the success of his commission, and, in his passage, fell in upon the road with some of the Hugonots, who were going to their rendezvous, and out of whom he picked their design. When he came to relate this at court, the constable treated it as a dream; but the queen-mother, more easily alarmed, caused such enquiry to be made, as put the fact beyond doubt. The court, upon this hurried away to Meaux, and the Swiss troops having orders to march thither, performed it in the night. On Michaelmas day the prince of Conde, the admiral, and their associates, assembled their forces, and found themselves in a condition of besieging Meaux, to which, if they had marched directly, and had not suffered themselves to be amused by a negotiation, they had done their business; and, as it was, the court was equally afraid of being invested in Meaux, or of marching from thence to Paris without cavalry. The latter was at last resolved, on the faith of colonel Psiffer, who undertook and performed this retreat of ten leagues, through an open country, continually exposed to the enemy's horse, by whom they were harassed all the way, the queen-mother, with the king and the rest of her children, being in the center of the battalion, and exceedingly exposed. The Swiss had a month's pay given them for this service, as if they had gained a battle.

THUS the second civil war was begun; and the prince of Conde, far from being disconcerted by this disappointment, surprized the town of St. Denis, and set fire to twenty-four windmills that were just without the suburbs of Paris. The thing is in itself so strange, or rather incredible, that, if we had not the concurrent testimony of all the writers of those times, it could never gain belief, that, with scarce three thousand men, the prince kept this capital blocked up for near six weeks, and the people of Paris were at length so much distressed, that, by their clamours and reproaches, they wore out the patience of the constable; so that, on the tenth of November, he marched to attack them in the plain of St. Denis. His army consisted of three thousand men at arms and sixteen thousand foot, the prince of Conde had not above twelve hundred foot and fifteen hundred horse; yet he was so far from flying, that he began the action, which lasted about three hours, with the loss of some hundreds on each side, the Catholics keeping the field of battle, and the Hugonots, though they had the greatest loss, had all the honour of the day<sup>y</sup>. The constable, being abandoned by those about him, was mortally wounded by Robert Stuart; and, notwithstanding he was seventy-four years of age, he started from the ground, and, with the point of his sword, struck Stuart in the face, beat out three of his teeth, broke his jaw, and brought him to the ground<sup>z</sup>. His son Danville, and the duke of Aumale, delivered the constable, and carried him to Paris, where he died two days after: the queen caused him to be buried with royal honours; but it was a point much disputed, whether she was better satisfied with the victory she had gained than with the death of this great man<sup>a</sup>. On the 15th of November the prince of Condé and the admiral, with the remains of their forces, marched, into Lorraine, to meet the succours that were coming to them out of Germany, commanded by prince Casimir, the son of the elector Palatine, consisting of four thousand foot and six thousand horse: the queen-mother caused her son the duke of Anjou to be declared the king's lieutenant general, to avoid naming a constable, and sent him, with all the forces that could be assembled, to harass the prince's rear<sup>b</sup>. In the mean time the flame of war spread itself thro' all the provinces, the reformed standing every-where upon their defence, and making themselves masters of all the places they were able; while the Papists, having the royal authority on their side, had recourse both to arms and to justice, destroying indiscriminately, by the forms of justice or by the sword, as many as they were able, to the great satisfaction of the Spaniards, who enjoyed this madness of their neighbour, as appeared clearly by the conduct of the duke of Alva, who, if he had sent, as the constable required, a little before the battle of St. Denis, a body of four or five thousand men, at the back of the Hugonot army, they must have been surrounded, and an end put to the war at once<sup>c</sup>.

The queen consents to a truce, in order to ensnare the heads of the Protestants.

It is commonly believed, that, if it had not been for some ill conduct of the duke of Anjou, or rather of those who commanded the army at the head of which he was, the forces of the prince of Condé and the admiral might have been dispersed, whereas they had the good fortune to join the succours that came to them out of Germany, under the command of prince Casimir, at Pont a Mousson. There happened, upon this occasion, a very singular event; the prince had promised his German succours, a hundred thousand crowns as soon as they joined him, and they insisted upon the money, though there could not be any thing more miserable than the prince's army, who, for the most part, were without arms, without clothes, and without shoes; however, some little money they had amongst them, and they collected the whole, and gave it to these strangers<sup>d</sup>. With these forces the prince traversed a great part of the kingdom, and at length besieged Chartres, in the beginning of February, which was very gallantly defended by Monf. Lignieres, knight of the order; but if the prince had turned the course of the river at last, as he did at first, the place must have surrendered. While the prince was employed in this siege<sup>e</sup>, the negotiations were renewed, and, when the place was on the point of surrendering, the peace was concluded by the prince of Condé, against the advice of the admiral<sup>f</sup>. The conditions were, That the edict of pacification should be renewed, free from all limitations of time, place, or person; that the king should take upon him the payment of prince Casimir and his Germans; and that all places should be restored. Both sides exclaimed against this peace, which neither intended to keep, and which was therefore stiled the feigned or the short peace; and yet they could not avoid making it; for, upon the surrender of Chartres, the king must have quitted Paris, and the queen-mother knew not what the consequences might have been of such a step. On the other hand, the prince saw troops marching in support of the Catholic cause from Germany and Italy, the Protestants, for the present, undone in the Low Countries, and himself in danger hourly of being abandoned or betrayed by the Germans, whom it was not in his power to pay, and who, for that reason, were very desirous of peace, that they might become the creditors of those in better circumstances; and the court were so much aware of this, that they borrowed 100,000 crowns from the republic of Venice, and 80,000 more of the dukes of Florence, Sancerre, and Montauban; several places of Querci, Vivares, Dauphine, and Languedoc, refused to return to their obedience; Rochelle shut their gates against the king's garrison, and became from that time the bulwark of the reformed.

An attempt to seize the P. of Condé and the admiral causes the third civil war.

THE queen-mother began now to form a kind of select council, who were first stiled the cabinet; these were the duke of Anjou, who from his childhood she bred up in arts and intrigues, the chancellor Lewis la Lansac, John de Marvillieres, bishop of Orleans, Sebastien de l'Aubespine, bishop of Limoges, Henry de Mesme, the president Birague, and the secretary de Villeroy. Amongst these, however, there were still some who stood in higher confidence, and whose sentiments she retailed to the rest as her own<sup>g</sup>. The cabinet advised

- a her to cause the forces to be so posted throughout the kingdom, as to keep such places as had not submitted in a manner blocked up, and to have such an eye on the chiefs of the Hugonots, as that they should not be able to break out again, or to surprize any great towns on the sudden ; which advice the queen caused to be punctually carried into execution. But the counsel by which she was chiefly guided came from the cardinal of Lorraine and the president Birague, and it consisted in destroying privately, and under a variety of pretences, as many of the Hugonots as possible, and more especially such as had been most active ; and in laying schemes for surprizing the prince and the admiral, whenever they happened to be in the same place. This fell out at Nojars in Burgundy, where the admiral came to pay the prince a visit, upon which the marshal de Tavannes received orders to block up the place, and to make them
- b both prisoners ; but the troops could not be so suddenly put in motion as to prevent their having intelligence, and they immediately retired, or rather fled with the utmost expedition <sup>a</sup> to Rochelle, leaving an officer and a few horse to cover their rear, who, being beaten, was made prisoner, and sent up to court : an indisputable proof that the prince and admiral had not fled without cause, as the court would have had it believed. The queen was so incensed at this miscarriage, that, perceiving the chancellor less affected than she would have had him, she threw the blame upon him, and, having deprived him of the seals, gave them to the bishop of Orleans, though it afterwards appeared it was the marshal Tavannes himself who caused the prince to be advertised of his danger, as being unwilling to do what he thought would reflect upon his honour <sup>1</sup>. The prince of Condé was no sooner at
- c Rochelle than the whole force of the Protestants resorted thither ; the queen of Navarre particularly, with her son the prince of Bearn, afterwards Henry the fourth, with all the forces of Guienne ; those beyond the Loire were assembled and conducted by Dandelot, in spite of the king's troops, which were much superior to them in all respects ; and queen Elizabeth, forgetting the ill usage she met with from that prince, and respecting only her own interest, and the protection of the Protestant cause, sent him a hundred thousand crowns, a train of artillery, and a great quantity of ammunition, which enabled him to march with his army to Soissons ; and thus the third civil war broke out, within six months after the last peace <sup>b</sup>.

- d THE queen-mother suspended the progress of his arms by a negociation, and promised, <sup>P. of Condé</sup> in order to make him easy under the delay, to give him wherewithal to pay his troops ; but as <sup>slain in the</sup> that would have been advantageous to him, and prejudicial to her own affairs, she avoided <sup>battle of Jar-</sup> it, by the usual expedient of breaking her word. The rigour of the winter being over, the duke of Anjou was in the field with a numerous army, whom the queen employed, tho' a child, that she might direct the troops as absolutely as she did the counsels of her son. This young general had about his person the marshal Tavannes, who had merited the baton by fifty years service, was equally prudent and brave, and withal of so bold a spirit, that he offered queen Catherine de Medicis, in her husband's time, to cut off the nose of Diana de Poitiers. He was the determined enemy of the Protestants, because, having once had a difference with the admiral, he gave him some hard language <sup>1</sup>. This marshal had the queen's
- e secret, and, in effect, commanded her son. Next to him was the marshal de Cosse, the younger brother of the famous marshal de Brisac, a gallant man, a good officer, but given to his bottle and his pleasures. There was also Monf. de Biron, who became afterwards a marshal of France, of whom it is unnecessary to say any more, than that, though a thorough good Protestant by inclination, he was a very good Catholic for the sake of preferment. By their advice the duke of Anjou laboured to engage the prince of Conde, before he was joined by a great corps of German succours that were marching to his relief, under the command of the duke of Deux-Ponts. This he effected on the 13th of March, at the little village of Jarnac, in the province of Angoulesme. This action was neither long nor bloody, there not being above fourteen hundred killed of the Hugonots, who were beat, and not
- f more than two hundred of the victors <sup>m</sup>. The prince of Conde, who had the misfortune to have his leg broke a little before the action began, endeavoured, for that reason, to decline it ; but, being once engaged, behaved, notwithstanding his wound, like a hero, till having received several more, he was taken ; but so weak, through loss of blood, that two gentlemen took him in their arms from his horse, and carried him to a bush, at some distance, where they sat him down ; and soon after the baron de Montesquieu, captain of the guards to the duke of Anjou, riding up to the place where he was, came behind and shot him through the head <sup>n</sup>. This detestable action, though not avowed, yet not being punished by the

In the month of May the duke of Deux Ponts, with his Germans, took la Charite by storm, and passed the Loire: he died soon after, and his forces joined the admiral, who, b having now a formidable army, unluckily undertook the siege of Poitiers °. Henry duke of Guise threw himself into the place, with two thousand brave men, and gained as much reputation by defending it, as his father did by defending Metz. The duke of Anjou, in the beginning of September, besieged Chatelleraud, upon which the admiral raised the siege of Poitiers, burnt part of his baggage, having lost four thousand men, and much diminished his reputation. The parliament, to increase his embarrassment, declared him a rebel, and set a price of fifty thousand crowns on his head, and they did the like with respect to the vidame of Chartres, and the count de Montgomery †. At the close of the month the duke of Anjou gained some advantage at St. Cler, on which the admiral decamped without sound of trumpet. The Germans mutinied a few days after, and compelled him to fight on the c 3d of October, at Moncontour °. The action began about eight in the morning and was over by ten. The French infantry in the Hugonot army behaved ill, and the German horse, being put in some disorder, retired. The admiral lost half his army, most of his baggage, and all his artillery, which was ascribed to the skilful disposition made by Tavannes. The whole force of the Protestants seemed now to be broken, but the spirit of the admiral remained entire. Wounded and defeated, he drew together the remains of his army, retired in good order, and neglected nothing that was practicable to recruit his troops †. (K) This great prince Lewis de Bourbon, who first bore the title of Condé, was the seventh son of Charles duke of Vendosme, and the youngest brother of Francis count d'Enghien, who was suspected to have been murdered with the privy of Catherine de Medicis, when she was only dauphiness (1). We have before described his person, than which nothing could be conceived more remote from his mind, if the character given of him by a great historian be true, that there were few who equalled him in strength, in constancy, in wit, in address, in experience, in courtesy, in eloquence, or in liberality, for he had all these virtues together; and even his enemies allowed, that, taking the whole of his character into view, he was not excelled by any of the great men of that age (2). But he had also (and who has them not?) his follies and his faults. He was thought not very sincere in his religion; he was ambitious; he was too hasty in embracing, and had too great a facility in finding excuses for quitting his party, as appeared from his concluding a treaty with queen Elizabeth, and within less than a year drawing his sword against that general and those troops, who, at his own request, were sent to assist him (3). But his great foible was women. The queen-mother had about her abundance of pretty women who were stiled her syrens, and, with their help, she extracted the secrets, and frequently influenced the conduct of those who were most averse to her. Mrs. Limaël was the syren who charmed the prince of Condé; who, proving with child by him, the queen publicly reprimanded her, and turned her out of the court. But the unfortunate lady, deriving courage from her despair, told her, that however wicked and infamous her behaviour might be, it was the fruits of her advice, the effects of her command, and the transcript of her example (4). The notoriety of this amour broke the heart of his first consort, Eleonora de Roy, eldest daughter of the count de Rouci, one of the worthiest women in France. After her demise there were many ladies who aspired to the honour of sharing his bed, and amongst the rest Margaret de Lufree, the widow of the marshal de St. Andre, who made him a present of the fine castle and estate of Valery, which is still in the family (5). But, notwithstanding this, he married Frances the daughter of the marquis de Rothelin (6). By his first consort he had Henry prince of Condé; Francis, who was the first stiled prince of Conti, and who was always deaf and dumb; Charles cardinal de Bourbon; and several other children, who died young: by his second he had three sons, of whom none survived but Charles, who became afterwards count de Soissons (7). We have mentioned in the text the high dispute that arose between Henry duke of Anjou, the king's brother, and this young prince, from whence the antipathy of the former is thought to have arisen, which occasioned that base assassination that deprived the latter of life, at the age of thirty-nine (8). Some pretend that he caused medals of gold to be struck, in which he assumed the title of Lewis XIII. (9).

- a of the house of Clermont, commanded a garrison of two thousand men : the place was far from being strong, and very indifferently fortified ; but Piles, comprehending clearly that the preservation of the Protestants in France depended on the length of the siege, rejected all propositions, and defended it beyond conception. The king and the queen-mother came thither about the middle of October, that they might have the satisfaction of seeing the place taken by storm, and were afterwards content to hope it would be reduced by famine. The commander made no scruple of declaring that he could not trust to any capitulation, and at length, having nothing to eat, took the desperate resolution of forcing a passage, which was prevented by the interposition of Monf. de Biron, on whose word he accepted honourable terms, on the 2d of December, and then marched out with one hundred horse and eight hundred foot <sup>u</sup>. Rochelle was, all this time, blocked up by sea and land, and, at the close of the year, the Protestant cause in France seemed at the point of being overwhelmed, their forces being, in a manner, quite exhausted, at the same time that they were without any visible resource.

A. D. 1569.

In this perplexed and ruinous situation of their affairs, the sole circumstance in favour of the Protestants, if it deserves attention, was their having a few honest and able persons at the head of their councils, who had nothing in view but the public good, and, if that prospered, had all the satisfaction they desired. The queen of Navarre, instead of listening to the advantageous proposals, which, even now, were made her on the part of queen Catherine de

By an extraordinary turn of affairs they obtain a very advantageous peace.

- Medicis*, gave general answers, to keep the negotiations alive ; and, in the mean time, neglected nothing that might repair the losses, or bring new strength to the cause. Sore, a pirate of Dieppe (for the Protestants were obliged to have recourse to that way of living at the expence of their enemies), forced the blockade by sea, and once more opened the port of Rochelle. Monf. la Noue, one of the bravest and one of the wisest men amongst the Hugonots, undertook to extend their quarters ; and after having taken several places, gained a considerable advantage near Luçon, which left his party more at their ease, and facilitated their receiving recruits. The two young princes of Bearn and Conde undertook a perilous march, with all the horse and foot they could assemble, in order to join the count de Montgomery, who commanded in the territories of the queen of Navarre, which they performed ; and, by plundering the country about Thoulouse, quieted the German cavalry, who were become importunate for money <sup>w</sup>. They had done a great deal more, and would, in all probability, have become masters of Bordeaux, if the famous Montluc had not found means, by cutting down a mill, to break the bridge, which with infinite difficulty they had thrown over the Gironne, which constrained them to make a retreat that was no less difficult than their march, and which they likewise executed with equal ardour and address <sup>x</sup>. But, after all, it became absolutely necessary to have recourse once more to the German princes, and to traverse all France with their small remaining force, in order to join these succours. The admiral undertook this, one of the most difficult enterprizes he had ever attempted, and which he performed with equal abilities and success. The marshal de Cossé, during the indisposition of the duke of Anjou, commanded the king's army, and with it stopped the admiral at Arnai-le-Duc <sup>y</sup> in Burgundy. In the course of these expeditions, the Hugonot army had marched twelve hundred miles, pillaged above fifty, and ransomed a hundred places, traversed seven or eight provinces, passed a multitude of rivers, penetrated forests, and took their route through morasses that were thought impracticable ; and now with four thousand men, of whom there were not above twelve hundred foot, were, in the midst of an enemy's country, to fight an army of ten thousand regular troops, well provided, and who had a good train of artillery, though the Protestants had not a single piece of cannon. The marshal de Cossé is blamed for his behaviour, but it may be without cause. The admiral chose a field of battle upon a hill, on the sides of which there were several deep roads that covered his foot from cannon shot ; and his horse, composed of gentlemen, and commanded by <sup>f</sup> princes, beat those of the marshal, but without pursuing them, that they might not lose the advantage of ground, the only advantage they had <sup>z</sup>. At length they slipped him ; and, being unincumbered with baggage or artillery, made some equivocal motions, that looked as if they intended to block up Paris ; this constrained the marshal to dispose his forces in such a manner, as to cover that great city, and so alarmed the queen, who had all this time kept up a negotiation, in which the Protestants, for the credit of their cause, which at this juncture subsisted entirely upon credit, made very high demands, that she directed her plenipotentiaries to sign, as they did, the third peace, at St. Germain en Laye, on the 8th of August <sup>2</sup>.

Charles IX.

by the suggestion of the queen-mother, affects to give a new turn to his conduct.

THIS peace consisted of forty-six articles, and was as favourable to the Protestants as if they had been victorious, in all the battles in which they had been defeated. The edicts in their favour were confirmed, those against them recalled; they were restored to all their charges, employments, and dignities, and had the following strong places acceded to them for two years; viz. Rochelle, la Charite, Montauban, and Cognac; the first kept the sea open for receiving succours from England, in case of a new war; the second preserved the passage of the Loire; the third was on the frontiers of Languedoc and Querci; and the fourth opened a passage into Angoulmois, where they had a greater strength than in any other province. The peace was hardly signed before both sides manifested a discontent, the Papists with great reason, the Protestants because they could not believe it sincere. The king appeared in another point of light than he had hitherto done. He certainly wanted not talents either for peace or war, though his education, or rather his want of education, had been such as did not qualify him for either. He affected very much to be a king; he was now about twenty; and, though passionate, in which he swore execrably, was commonly esteemed good-natured. He took the peace upon himself, and gave broad hints that he had made it in spite of the queen-mother, the Spaniards, and the Guises: he sent the marshal de Cossé to Rochelle, to settle every thing that was to be done in consequence of the peace; and his instructions were so clear, and his behaviour so honourable in the conduct of this commission, that the admiral, who had no opportunity of knowing him since a child, flattered himself, that things had taken a new turn, since the king undertook to govern himself; and, in all applications made to the court, the decisions were such as seemed to confirm these favourable opinions<sup>a</sup>. The negociation that had been depending nine years for the king's marriage, was at length terminated; and, on the 6th of November, he espoused at Mezieres, Elizabeth of Austria, daughter to the emperor Maximilian, a princess of incomparable virtues, who, in the bloom of youth, had the sagacity of age, and maintained, in the midst of a voluptuous court, a purity of manners that would have done honour to a convent, without any tincture of affectation or austerity<sup>b</sup>. The Spanish faction and the Guises knew not what to think of this sudden change of affairs, and were still more alarmed by the unexpected turn given to an event of their own procuring. Don Sebastian king of Portugal had demanded in marriage the princess Margaret, the king's sister, then about the age of seventeen; which marriage had been traversed by the Spanish minister, in complaisance, as that family understood it, to the house of Guise, but in reality for other reasons. Upon this the king intimated his design of marrying his sister to the prince of Navarre; and upon discovering an amour very far advanced between her and the duke of Guise, he sent for his bastard brother, Henry d'Angoulême, into his bed-chamber, and, shewing him two swords, said with many imprecations "Here is one to kill you, if you don't kill the duke of Guise with the other, before I come from hunting." The duke of Guise being informed of the king's resentment, and knowing the violence of his temper, retired from court, and not long after married a widow<sup>c</sup>.

Seems to take the reins of government into his own hands, and to consult his true interests.

IT was apparent, from the new turn things took, in consequence of this extraordinary change of measure, that the peace and power of France might have been effectually established, if Charles the ninth had kept these royal and national points in view, and had honourably practised to that end those measures which, for the vilest of all purposes, he most basely dissimulated. He likewise shewed such abilities upon this occasion that might have done him credit upon a better; and though it may be suspected, and perhaps proved, that he was entirely directed by the queen-mother, who had now put the seals into the hands of her own creature Birague, and was surrounded by her Italian council, yet if he had done what he pretended he had a mind to do, that is, dismissed all those who had been deep in the late troubles, recalled the chancellor, the Montmorencys, and some of the princes of the blood who were Catholics, the peace of the nation had been secured, and the lustre of the government restored. But this was far from being the case; he counterfeited good qualities which he never possessed; and, while he wore them, produced such a transient scene of prosperity, as must have influenced him, if there had been a spark of goodness in his nature, to have changed his conduct, and to have become the man he seemed; which was so visibly his interest, that even those who had a glimpse of his heart, and who were to be greater gainers thereby than himself, expected it<sup>d</sup>. The regard he shewed to justice in points that came before him in the council, revived the respect due to it throughout the kingdom. His subjects admired, his neighbours courted and revered him; he renewed his treaties with England, with the princes of Germany, and the grand duke (for he began now to be so stiled)

- a of Tuscany. He avoided, with great dexterity, entering into the alliance against the Turks, because it was stiled the holy league, and he thought it might revive the fears of the Protestants. On this occasion he made one of those double-faced compliments which were peculiar to him, to the pope's nuncio: "Assure his holiness, said he, of my obedience; and "ah! that it were in my power to express my sentiments more clearly." He meditated his design continually, and, without disclosing it to any, threw out a multitude of expressions which were taken in one sense at the time, and which, when it was too late, were discerned to be capable of quite another. This shewed he had digested the maxims of his mother's politics thoroughly, and was capable of setting a good grace upon the blackest and most barbarous intention that ever entered the human breast. But we must forbear reflections, and content ourselves with relating events unparallelled in history, and of which, for the honour of humanity, we hope the like will never again disgrace any age or country; we do not say this to injure the French nation, for even the French historians say the same.

- He was informed that the admiral, who was equally sincere in religion and patriotism, was detaching troops to the assistance of the Protestants in the Low Countries, for which he very honestly gave the true reasons, that he was desirous of assisting his brethren to shake off the intolerable yoke they were under, and to employ those busy spirits against the Spaniards, that might otherwise have troubled the quiet of France. The king was not content to let him know that he approved and admired his conduct, but desired that he would send count Lodovic of Nassau to confer with him on certain points of importance, and, that this might be done with the more safety and secrecy, he should come incognito. He caressed count Lodovic in such a manner, entertained him so freely on the project he pretended to have formed of attacking Spain and conquering the Low Countries, and gave him such a mark of his sincerity, in restoring the principality of Orange to his brother, that he entirely gained the count, and sent him back so well satisfied to the admiral, that he removed all his scruples, and made him not only willing, but desirous, of going to court. The king did not fail to invite him, but it was in so easy and natural a way, that he might have excused himself, if he had been disposed. He came, however, in the month of September, to Blois, attended by fifty gentlemen. He was received with equal affection and respect; the king kissed him; called him father; and, when he embraced him, said, "We have you now fast; you must not think of getting from us when you please." He restored him, unasked, the pensions that had been granted in the former reigns; and made him a present besides of one hundred thousand livres. However, when he asked his majesty's leave to go to his house at Chatillon, he very readily granted it; adding, when he mentioned some improvements that were making there, "We know very well how fond you are of gardening," which alluded to the person's finding him in his vineyard, with a pruning knife in his hand, immediately before the expedition of Meaux, when the king was obliged to fly before him to Paris. After a month or five weeks stay, he sent for him back, under pretence that he wanted to consult him about his negotiations with England, and other affairs of importance. It was at this time that he talked so frankly and sensibly on the possibility of his subjects of the two communions living in charity to each other, and in duty to their prince, and the right he had, as sovereign of Flanders, to take the people under his protection, and of the deceitful usage he had met with from the Spaniards, that the admiral was perfectly charmed. He was infinitely more caressed than he had been before; and tho' he received the news of his brother the cardinal's being poisoned in England, yet the concern the king expressed, and the grant he made him of the revenues of his brother's benefices for a year, effaced the suspicions. Indeed the king dissembled so effectually, that the Guises and the furious ecclesiastics looked upon one another with amazement; the latter made no scruple of affirming, that the king was in the highway of becoming a heretic, and the former were not a little afraid, that a monarch, who was so complete a master of fraud and treachery, when he saw how much he had got by them, might turn these arts upon those who taught them.

THE treaty with England went on, to the great satisfaction of the Hugonots; and was at length, after much deliberation, concluded. The queen of Navarre came to the court at Blois, was met by the queen-mother and by the king, who caressed her excessively, called her his great aunt, and professed himself charmed with her politeness and wisdom. At night he asked his mother if he had not acted his part well; to which she returned, "That it was a good thing to set out right; but that things were brought about by patience and perseverance:" to which the king answered, "Let me alone; I'll bring them all into the net <sup>m</sup>." Count Lodovic of Nassau, was, by this time, returned to court, in order to obtain a the performance of the king's promises, who not only made them good, but exceeded them, intimating, that he wanted nothing but the admiral's advice to enter into action against the Spaniards; and it was this that brought him the third time to court <sup>n</sup>. In the beginning of the month of June the queen of Navarre was taken ill, and died on the 10th <sup>o</sup>. It was the current opinion of those times, and many historians speak of it as a thing certain, that she was poisoned by one Rene, an Italian glover, by some perfumed goods which he sold her, by order of the queen-mother. It is, however, most likely, that this suspicion had no foundation. Her body was opened, in which an abscess was formed that must have been mortal; and probably it was from their persuasion of this, that the admiral, the prince of Condé, and the other great lords of the Hugonot party, not only remained at court, but were also b less inclined to listen to the intelligence sent them from all quarters of France, that the court meditated their destruction: which, as it was true, so a little reflection will suffice to shew, that the poisoning of the queen of Navarre at this juncture was inconsistent with their general scheme <sup>p</sup>. Teligny, who was one of the finest young gentlemen in France, and whose merit alone had recommended him to the marriage of the admiral's daughter, was become a kind of declared favourite with the king, who had most effectually deceived him, and made use of him to detain the admiral, who had a great opinion of his sagacity and penetration. A little before the marriage, Langoiran, who had served under him in the war, came to take his leave of the admiral, who asked him why he could leave Paris at that juncture? "Sir," said he, "these people are too fond of us, and I had much rather save myself c "with the fools, than stay here and have my throat cut with those who are wiser <sup>q</sup>." The death of the queen of Navarre caused the marriage of her son to be put off, who, notwithstanding, came to Paris at the time appointed, and was excessively caressed. On the 17th of August he was affianced to the princess Margaret by the cardinal of Bourbon, against the will of the princess, who refused to sign the contract, and who, the next day, would not speak when the marriage was celebrated: but the king her brother, standing behind, forced her to nod her head, which was taken for her consent <sup>r</sup>. This was on the Monday, which, with the Tuesday and Wednesday, was spent in feasting, music, and dancing. On Friday the 22d of August, as the admiral was walking from the court to his lodgings, about eleven in the morning, he received a shot from a window in the street, which carried away d the second finger of his right hand, and wounded him grievously in the left arm. He said immediately, "This is the fruits of my reconciliation with the duke of Guise <sup>s</sup>." After dinner, the king went to make the admiral a visit, and, amongst others, made him this compliment, "You have received the wound, but it is I that suffer;" desiring, at the same time, that he would order his friends to quarter about his house, and promising to prohibit the Catholics from entering that quarter after it was night <sup>t</sup>. This satisfied the admiral of the king's sincerity, and hindered him from complying with the desires of his friends, who would have carried him away, and who were strong enough to have forced a passage out of Paris if they had attempted it.

The massacre of the Protestants resolved, and the execution committed to the D. of Guise.

In the evening the queen-mother held a cabinet council, to fix the execution of that plot c which she had meditated for so many years. The persons were Henry duke of Anjou, afterwards, king of Poland and of France, Gonzagua duke of Nevers, Henry of Angoulesme, grand prior of France, and bastard brother to the king, the marshal de Tavannes, and Albert de Gondi, count de Rhetz; there it was determined to massacre the Protestants in general; and it was with some difficulty that the duke de Nevers and marshal Tavannes got the king of Navarre and the prince of Conde excepted, together <sup>u</sup> with the marshals Montmorenci and Damville, who were at first doomed to slaughter with the rest. The direction of the whole design, when the time of execution arrived, was confided to the duke of Guise, who took with him his uncle the duke of Aumale and the grand prior Henry de Angoulesme. The guards were appointed to be in arms, and the city officers were to dispose the militia to execute the f king's orders, of which the signal was the ringing of a bell near the Louvre <sup>v</sup>. Some say that, when the hour approached, which was that of midnight, the king grew indetermined; that he expressed his horror at the thought of shedding so much blood, that of his subjects, of men who came at his command, upon their confidence in his word, and particularly the admiral, whom he had detained so lately by his caresses: but that the queen-mother reproached him with his cowardice, made a frightful picture of his danger, flattered him with the hopes.

a of ruling without controul, and having once wrung from him an order to give the signal, hastened it, for fear he should alter his mind, which it is also reported he did, when it was too late. These circumstances are not to be depended upon, because many writers visibly labour to excuse the young monarch at the expence of his mother, while others make it singly his act, affirming that, when it was proposed to take off a few of the heads, he cried out *, “ If any are to die, let there not be one left to reproach me with breach of faith.”

THE duke of Guise, and the chevalier d'Angoulême, accompanied by many persons of quality, and a detachment of the Swiss troops of the catholic religion, as soon as the signal was given, attacked the house of the admiral Coligni; who, as soon as he discerned from the noise what the matter was, rose out of bed, and, while they were forcing the doors, addressed himself, in a short pathetic prayer, to God, which was scarce finished, before Besme, the most forward of the assassins, entered the room, and asked if he was Coligni?. To which he answered he was; adding, “ Young man, respect these grey hairs;” to which he answered by thrusting his sword through his body<sup>a</sup>. The duke of Guise and the chevalier, growing impatient below stairs, cried out to know if the business was done; and, being told it was, commanded that the body should be thrown out of the window. As soon as it fell on the ground, the chevalier, or, as some say, the duke of Guise, wiping the blood off the face with his handkerchief, as soon as he knew the face, kicked it with his foot<sup>b</sup>. The body was then abandoned to the fury of the populace, who after a series of cruel and insolent affronts, dragged it to the common gallows, to which it was chained by the feet, the head being cut off, and carried to the queen-mother, who, it is said, caused it to be embalmed and sent to Rome<sup>c</sup>. The king himself went to see it hang upon the gibbet, where, a fire being kindled under it, part was burnt, and the rest scorched. However, the miserable remains were, in the night, taken down, by the command of the marshal duke de Montmorenci, who caused them to be honourably interred at Chantilly<sup>d</sup>. In the very Louvre, the gentlemen belonging to the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé were murdered under the king's eye; two of them, wounded and pursued by the assassins, fled into the bed-chamber of the queen of Navarre, and jumped upon her bed, beseeching her to save their lives; and as she went to ask this favour of the queen-mother, two more, under the like circumstances, rushed into the room, and threw themselves at her feet. The queen-mother came to the windows to enjoy these dreadful scenes; and the king, seeing the Hugonots, who were lodged on the other side of the river, flying, called for his long gun, and fired upon them<sup>e</sup>.

It is not within our province (and we consider it is as a felicity) to pursue the story of this tragical event through all its circumstances, which would require a work of considerable length; we shall only observe that, within the space of three or four days, several thousands were destroyed, by all the variety of cruel deaths that the most unbounded malice could invent. Peter Ramus, professor of philosophy and the mathematics, after being robbed of all he possessed, his belly being first ripped open, was thrown out of a window, the news of which so affrighted Denis Lambin, the king's professor, that, tho' a zealous Catholic, he died of terror<sup>f</sup>. The first two days the king denied it was done by his orders, and threw the whole blame upon the house of Guise; but, on the 28th of August, he went to the parliament, avowed it, was complimented upon it, and directed a process against the admiral, by which his memory was stigmatized as a traitor, and which was much worse, two honest and innocent gentlemen, of respectable characters, were executed as accomplices in a conspiracy against the life of the king, the princes his brothers, the queen-mother, and the king of Navarre, in order to set the crown on the head of the young prince of Condé, which never existed, but by owning of which they might have saved their lives; a proposition they rejected with contempt. They were executed by torch-light, and the king, the queen-mother (with the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé by force), were spectators of this horrid act; and they also assisted at the jubilee proclaimed to thank God for the success of a design that reflects dishonour on the Christian religion<sup>g</sup>, and indelible infamy on all who contrived, executed, or approved it.

ON the eve of St. Bartholomew, orders had been sent to the governors of provinces to fall themselves, and to let loose the people, upon the Protestants; and tho' an edict was published before the end of the week, assuring them of the king's protection, and that he by no means meant to exterminate them because of their religion, yet private orders were sent, of a nature directly contrary; in consequence of which the massacre, or as, in allusion to the Sicilian vespers, it was now stiled the matins of Paris, were repeated in Meaux, Orleans, Troyes,

Angiers, Thoulouse, Rouen, and Lyons, so that, in the space of two months, thirty thousand <sup>a</sup> Protestants were butchered in cold blood, if that expression may be used, in speaking of people influenced by the most detestable passions <sup>f</sup>. La Charite on the Loire, one of the cautionary towns given to the Protestants, was surprized, and the inhabitants abandoned to the rage of their enemies. The other three were more upon their guard, and became thereby sanctuaries to such of their religion as took shelter in them. In some of the provinces, however, the governors gave but little countenance to the barbarities that were exercised; and in others they absolutely refused to execute them at all; alleging, that their swords were at the king's command against his enemies, but not against his subjects <sup>g</sup>. The king of Navarre was easily prevailed upon to abjure the Protestant religion, and to send an edict into his own dominions, forbidding the exercise of it; which, however, was not obeyed. The court had more trouble <sup>b</sup> with the prince of Condé, who shewed great firmness in his religion, though the king, who undertook his conversion, proposed the strongest argument in three words, Mass, Death, or the Bastile <sup>h</sup>. At length they brought his chaplain to abjure, and he persuaded his master to follow his example, as the prince of Conti and the count de Soissons did also. The people of Rochelle began to provide for their own defence; and the count de Montgomery, who made his escape out of Paris on the day of the massacre, went into England to solicit succours. <sup>c</sup> The court sent the famous la Houe, one of the best officers in France, and a zealous Protestant, to persuade the people of Rochelle to submit; but it was by his advice that they disposed every thing in such a manner as enabled them to make a great and glorious resistance; yet he did not betray his trust, but, at the same time that he fortified Rochelle, he advised the people to submit to their sovereign, provided they had a reasonable security given them for the peaceable enjoyment of their properties and their religion <sup>i</sup>.

WHEN it appeared that artifice would do nothing, and that the bloody matins of St. Bartholomew had actually cured the Protestants of their credulity, the court had recourse to force. Biron had orders to invest Rochelle by land, while Strozzi with a fleet, and the baron de la Garde with a squadron of galleys, blocked it up by sea <sup>k</sup>. In the mean time, other places having revolted, three armies were set on foot, the first, under the command of the marshal Damville, was employed to reduce Sommiers; which, after an obstinate resistance of two months, was effected; but it ruined the army, so that it was out of his power to take Nismes. Monsieur Le Chastre, with the second, besieged Sancerre, which, though neither strong nor <sup>d</sup> well fortified, held out eight months; during which time there perished two thousand people in the town through famine; and a father is said to have lived a week upon the body of his deceased daughter. At length the place submitted, but upon tolerable terms <sup>l</sup>. The third, commanded by the marquis de Villars, now made admiral, was sent into Guienne, and reduced the greatest part of that country. But the whole force of France was, in a manner, assembled before Rochelle, the siege of which was commanded by the duke of Anjou, accompanied by his brother the duke of Alençon, the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, the duke of Montpensier, all the princes of the house of Guise, the duke of Nevers, the marshal de Cossé, and the flower of the French nobility. It lasted eight months, during which the besieged sustained nine general and twenty particular assaults, in one of which the duke d'Aumale was slain <sup>m</sup>. The count de Montgomery, with a fleet from England, attempted to succour them, but in vain <sup>n</sup>; notwithstanding which disappointment, and Monsi. La Noue's quitting them, they still defended themselves with the same firmness; disposing all things with such prudence, that they enjoyed a good state of health, and a tolerable subsistence; while the army without was equally exposed to famine and diseases. The duke of Anjou himself had been killed by a musquet ball, if a gentleman, whose name was de Vigne, had not seen the man taking aim, and, pushing the duke aside, received it into his own body <sup>o</sup>. The news arriving that the duke of Anjou was elected king of Poland, notwithstanding he had three formidable rivals, a general attack was made, and this failing, the duke, who had already lost four-and-twenty thousand men, resolved to make an end of the affair by a peace. <sup>f</sup> The measures for this being concerted, the people of Rochelle surrendered, and intreated his highness to enter their town; which, as it had been agreed before-hand, he refused; the edicts of pacification were renewed, and the inhabitants of Rochelle promised to be good subjects for the future <sup>p</sup>. Thus ended the fourth civil war, by a peace which the court did not intend to keep, and to which the Protestants never trusted.

THE miseries of France were daily augmented by new disturbances; the king was grown excessively jealous of his brother the duke of Anjou, who had been always his mother's favourite, and who, by being continually at the head of the army, had at least as much

Henry duke of Anjou elected king of Poland.

- a authority as his brother. The king was therefore extremely well pleased at his election, and desired nothing so much as to see him fairly out of France. On the other hand, the duke of Anjou, who was made a king in a manner against his will, who loved an indolent and luxurious life, the conversation of several young men, whom he stiled his friends, and the rest of the world his flatterers, till, in process of time, they fell upon a worse appellation, and who was also vehemently enamoured of the princess of Condé, could not bear the thoughts of parting, notwithstanding the ambassadors from Poland pressed him every day; and the king told their mother, that the kingdom was not big enough to hold them both<sup>a</sup>. The duke of Guise adhered to the duke of Anjou, and offered to support him if he had been inclined to stay, whether his brother would or not. But, besides this, there was another formidable and dangerous faction, stiled, La Politiques; these were indifferently of both religions, chiefly the more moderate Catholics, such as the Montmorencis, the marshal de Cossé, and Monsieur de Biron. At the head of these was the duke of Alençon, who had a mind to set aside one brother, and perhaps both. The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé had entered a little into his schemes, which went no farther in appearance than redressing the numberless disorders in the state, and excluding foreigners from the council. The Protestants, encouraged by this party, and knowing how little they had to expect either from the king or the duke of Anjou, began to form new demands, and such as they thought might afford them a real security; to procure which, they set on foot a general confederacy, that they might the better know, and the more easily exert, the force of their whole party; and the government was fallen so low, that, in little more than a twelvemonth, it was deliberated whether, yielding to necessity, they should not grant their own terms to those whom they had threatened to exterminate from the face of the earth. The king accompanied his brother towards the frontiers, not out of affection, but for fear he should fix himself, and raise a party in some of the distant provinces<sup>c</sup>. In this journey, however, he was seized with a kind of slow malignant fever, which, from the beginning, had a very dangerous appearance: and with regard to which the queen-mother expressed herself strangely, when she took leave of the king of Poland in Lorraine. “Go,” said she, “my son, enter into possession of your kingdom; but be assured that your stay there shall not be long<sup>d</sup>.” The government was now intirely in her hands, her creature Birague being chancellor, and scarce any but her Italians being intrusted with the secrets of the state; and these in effect were endeavouring to contrive means to pillage the people, and, instead of a regular and legal government, to establish an absolute tyranny, under the direction of an ambitious woman, and her insolent favourites.

- THE courts of France and England continued still to dissemble with each other; in truth, because it was their interest. The queen-mother was afraid that Elizabeth would assist the Hugonots; and Elizabeth was still apprehensive of the Spaniards and the queen of Scots. In the mean time, the Hugonots perceiving, that, though the court had refused to grant their demands, yet they had not courage enough to arrest their deputies, resolved to proceed in their scheme of putting themselves, once for all, in a posture of defence, so as to treat for the future in the quality of a body politic, and not as subjects in arms against their prince. It was with this view that they formed a confederacy, into which, by the advice of Mons. la Noue, the people of Rochelle entered<sup>e</sup>. On this they began to stir in other parts of France, and more especially in Normandy. The court directed three armies to be raised for carrying on this fifth civil war, and, in the mean time, the queen-mother earnestly pressed the treaty of marriage with queen Elizabeth, in favour of her third son the duke of Alençon, which, for the reasons before expressed, Elizabeth seemed to encourage, and even granted that young prince, who affected to be thought no enemy to the Protestants, a safe-conduct to come and visit her in her own dominions; which, though he solicited with warmth, yet, when he had got it, he did not use, being engaged at home in some intrigues of a very extraordinary nature. His friends openly solicited for him the post of lieutenant-general, as his brother had enjoyed it. The king was averse to this demand, and the queen-mother much more so; but it could not well be refused<sup>f</sup>. But, while this was in agitation, the Hugonots in arms in Normandy advanced a small corps of cavalry very near St. Germain, where the court then resided. The design of this was to have carried off the duke of Alençon, who had consented to it; but they came ten days too soon, so that he was not ready<sup>g</sup>. It occasioned, however, a dreadful consternation; and the Catholics, affecting to believe that there was a design of returning the compliment of St. Bartholomew, retired in precipitation out of Paris; the queen-mother and her ladies amongst the rest; and the next day the king himself went to the castle of Bois de Vincennes, causing the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre to be put under a guard, and treating this as a new conspiracy against his person<sup>h</sup>. repairing to court to justify themselves, were arrested and sent to the Bastille; the prince of Condé, and the other brothers of the marshal Montmorency, had shared the same fate, if the prince, who was then in his government of Picardy, had not very wisely retired to Straßburgh, where following once more the example of his chaplain, he declared his reconciliation to the church of Rome to have been forced and insincere, and, at his earnest request, was again admitted into communion with the Protestants at Straßburgh<sup>y</sup>. At court, La Moule, who had betrayed his master the duke of Alençon, and who was a strange compound of superstition and debauchery, lost his head upon a scaffold, as did also the count de Coconas, a Piedmontese, who pretended not to any religion, but had been very active in the business of St. Bartholomew. Tourtai, a man of less consequence, was broke alive upon the wheel<sup>z</sup>. The duke of Alençon made a mean confession, but the king of Navarre behaved with great spirit and resolution, and treated the queen-mother with a degree of freedom that put her very much out of countenance<sup>a</sup>. He ascribed all the troubles of France to her arts, and affirmed she excited them to make herself necessary.

Miserable
death of
Charles IX.

In the mean time the queen-mother, who negled nothing that might facilitate her views in favour of the duke of Anjou, procured her son-in-law the duke of Lorraine to be invested with the title of the king's lieutenant-general; and having, under colour of this new conspiracy, brought most of those who were inclined, or at least, who had it most in their power, to oppose her, into danger, began to act more openly and boldly, and as if the sovereign power had been solely in her hands. The poor king Charles was gradually approaching death, under the most terrible agonies and tortures. He was little master of his own actions; and, though absolute power had been his aim, he was by this time very sensible that he had, in effect, no power at all. To recover it, he projected schemes of reformation; declared frequently and openly that he desired no more than legal authority; that affairs of order and justice should be left intirely to the parliaments; the direction of military affairs to the marshals; and that he would reserve to himself the care only of reforming his court, and relieving his people. Some add, that he expressed a resolution of removing from about him such as had advised the massacre. But it is very difficult to judge of the authorities on which these reports are founded; and, besides, he was so infamous for his dissimulation, that we know not what to think of these declarations, even supposing them to have been made: this is very certain, that his mother made him act a part to the very last. She had procured from him, some time, letters for the governors of provinces, and other officers civil and military, to obey her commands; but, not satisfied with this, a little before he died, she engaged him to give his orders to the chancellor Birague, her creature, to draw and seal a commission to her to be regent of the kingdom<sup>b</sup>. The very morning that he died, he sent for the duke of Alençon, the king of Navarre, the cardinal de Bourbon, the chancellor, the secretary of state, and several other great persons, to whom he declared his brother the king of Poland his heir, and the queen-mother regent till his arrival, and sent his testament to the parliament to the like effect<sup>c</sup>. After having thus performed all that the queen-mother had for him to do, he breathed his last on the 30th of May, which was Whitsunday, in the middle of the fourteenth year of his reign, and towards the close of the twenty-fourth year of his life<sup>d</sup>. As a general rumour had prevailed, from expressions that fell from himself, that his was not a natural disease, his corpse was opened after his demise, and, upon inspection, it is said, there appeared no marks of poison, which refuted the suspicion that had fallen upon the duke of Alençon. Others allege, that he was taken off by one who understood the mysteries of that detestable art so well, as to remove enemies, without leaving grounds of discovery<sup>e</sup>. But the common opinion of those times was, that his end was indeed out of the course of nature, but in consequence of the express judgment of God, for the cruelties he had exercised on his subjects, and blasphemously imputing this to a motive of religion (L).

(L) There are few princes whose memory have been more freely dealt with than that of Charles the ninth. We have been obliged in the text to mention some of his personal qualities; we shall avoid, as much as possible, any repetitions here. In his person he was tall, well made, robust, but stooped a little in his shoulders. He had a pale, or rather livid complexion, a sharp nose, and quick, or rather haggard eyes. He derived from nature great and good qualities, which were improved by his governor Mons. Cipierre, or, as Brantome calls him, Sipierre, and his preceptor Mons. Amiot, so long and so far as they were allowed to manage him. He had an extensive capacity, a very retentive memory, much sagacity, a wonderful penetration, and great solidity in judgment. He spoke easily, pertinently, and with dignity. He loved learning and learned men, more especially poets, and was the patron of the great Ronsard. There is a saying of his, with respect to them, which has been deservedly remembered. "Princes," said he, "ought to deal with poets, as jockeys with their horses, keep them sleek, and in good case, but not let them grow fat." He had a very fine voice, sung well, and wrote verses himself. He also wrote a treatise upon hunting.

THE situation of the kingdom on the demise of Charles the ninth was equally new and strange; the queen-mother was in actual possession of the government, and, at the same time, universally hated, except by her own creatures, whom she had raised from nothing, and whom she supported against all the world. She shewed vast abilities upon this occasion; for though the slightest accident must have thrown all things into confusion, yet she acted with such dignity, so much order, and so great presence of mind, that every thing went on contrary to all probability<sup>f</sup>. The chancellor engaged the parliament to send their compliments of condolence, and, at the same time, to desire that she would take the regency into her hands. She constrained the two princes who were prisoners to write, in conjunction with her, to the provinces, hunting, which has been since published. He had great personal courage, was very sober; for, having once drank a little too much wine, and being guilty of some extravagancies, he never tasted it after. He was also naturally modest, and not much inclined to women (1). Let us now see how a prince, with so many good qualities, came to make so bad a figure. He had two ill qualities that are seldom found united; he was a deep dissembler, and yet passionate to a degree of madness. He loved hunting immoderately; and, from delighting in the blood of beasts, came to spill that of men without concern. He seldom spoke without swearing, a vice which he caught from the count de Rhetz, his mother's instrument in corrupting his manners. He studied mankind early, and knew them well. He was as easily provoked as he was hard to be appeased. He had a violence in his temper which at once shewed itself, and was heightened by his diversions; for, besides his passion for hunting, he was a great lover of tennis, and would also work frequently at the forge, being an excellent gunsmith. His impetuosity appeared even in his dancing, with which he fatigued himself and his whole court. He had one amusement singular, and which spoke his character; he coined false money with his own hands, and was never so well pleased as when he cheated people (2). The debauchery of his, or rather of his mother's court, ruined his morals and his temper. The necessity he was under of managing opposite factions, taught him to disguise his sentiments, and his frequent disappointments inspired him with deep resentments. Hence it is said, and said with truth, that, at the age of twenty, he excelled Tiberius in address, and was not less cruel than Nero (3). After the massacre on the eve of St. Bartholomew, he had a fierceness in his look, and a colour in his cheeks, which he never had before. He slept little, and never sound. He waked frequently in agonies, and had soft music, with the voices of his pages, to compose him again to rest. He dissembled in his last moments, expressing great kindness towards his brother, whom he hated, and much respect to the queen-mother, whom he intended to have sent into Poland, to make a visit to her beloved son: but this was in some measure excusable, since it arose from his tenderness for his consort and daughter, who were to be left in their hands. He espoused Elizabeth of Austria, daughter to the emperor Maximilian the second, whose excellent character has been before mentioned. She passed the latter part of her life at Vienna; but she would never suffer any imposts to be laid on the inhabitants of the places settled upon her in jointure, or any judicial office to be sold (4). She refused Philip the second, who was very desirous of marrying her, and died January 2d, 1592, in the thirty-eighth year of her age. By her he had a daughter, Mary Elizabeth, to whom the queen of England was god-mother. This young princess died before she was six years old, but had so much of her father's spirit, that she took it very ill that her uncle king Henry did not visit her more frequently. The king had also a son by Mary Touchet, who was not the daughter, as many writers report, of an apothecary, but of a gentleman of family, who had a considerable office at Orleans. His son by her was styled Charles de Valois, successively grand prior of France, count of Auvergne, and duke of Angoulême. We shall have occasion to mention this lady and her son more than once hereafter. Besides Mary Touchet, the king had at least two other mistresses that are known. One of them was a young lady of admirable beauty and heroic virtue, who never listened to the king's solicitations, who, notwithstanding, was so far from taking this amiss, that he visited her from esteem, and shewed her the highest marks of respect as long as he lived. Another mistress of his was the wife of Charles de Gondi, Seigneur de la Tour, master of his wardrobe, brother to the count de Rhetz, and to the bishop of Paris. The scandal of that time was, that the queen-mother told this man in confidence, the king had a mind to send him on a journey into the other world, that he might the more freely enjoy his wife; by which la Tour was induced to administer a dose to the king, and followed him in a few weeks after, by the like conveyance (5). Monsieur de Thou says nothing of this story; but he admits that, notwithstanding their public report to the contrary, the physicians who opened his body were convinced, from the mortifications in his stomach and intestines, that he died of a recent poison, having, by the vigour of his youth, and the natural strength of his constitution, got the better of his first disease. In his last agonies, his blood, being dissolved, exuded through all his pores. The chancellor Hospital framed a device for this monarch, which was a shield charged with the arms of France, surrounded with the collar of St. Michael, surmounted by a close crown, and placed between two columns, with this motto, Pietate & Justitia, i. e. "By Piety and Justice." It is strange that the king should cause a medal to be struck on the massacre of the Protestants, with his arms, as before mentioned, on one side, with the date 24 Augusti, 1572, and this inscription, Pietas excitavit Justitiam, that is, "His Piety excited his Justice." On the other he is seated on his throne, with a sword in his right hand, the hand of Justice in his left, with a group of heads under his feet, surrounded by these words, Virtus in Rebelles, i. e. "Courage in suppressing Rebels." It may not be amiss to remark, that a new star being seen soon after that bloody action, occasioned, according to the humour of that time, a great variety of conjectures. But that of Beza, who boldly ventured to foretell that the death of the bloody Herod, by whose order it was committed, was at no great distance, met with much censure at first; but, when it seemed to be verified by the king's fate, it was revered as prophetic (6). At the public dinner after his funeral, the parliament of Paris commanded Amiet, great almoner of France, to say grace to them, as representing the monarchy; but he retired, and hid himself, to avoid it. Something of the same kind happened at the funeral of Lewis the fourteenth (7).

as if they acted intirely in concert. She removed from the Bois de Vincennes to the Louvre, a caused all the passages, except the great gate, to be walled up, and kept her son and her son-in-law not only under a guard, but in an apartment secured with strong grates<sup>a</sup>. The two marshals were still in the Bastile, and the people of Paris, having shewn a malignant joy at their imprisonment, she trusted that fortrefs to the guard of the townsmen, and thereby secured both it and them. She sent an Italian ecclesiastic to Rochelle, to negotiate, or rather to purchase, a truce, while, in the mean time, she hired Swiss and German troops. The Protestants, by her permission, held an assembly at Milhaud, in Rouvergne, where they received letters from marshal Damville and the prince of Condé, in consequence of which they made a league with the former, in quality of governor of Languedoc, and declared the latter their chief protector, and captain-general; but at the same time limited his authority, by assigning him a council<sup>b</sup>. The queen-mother was sufficiently displeased with their proceedings, though she dissembled it; and, on the 26th of June, under pretence of revenging the death of the king her husband, but, in reality, to strike a terror into her enemies of every party, she caused the unfortunate count of Montgomery to be publicly beheaded, after being cruelly tortured, though his life had been promised him when he surrendered<sup>c</sup>. She received letters patent from her son in Poland, which gave her a legal title to the regency; and, having sent the marshal de Rbetz to the frontiers of Champagne, to receive the foreign troops she had caused to be raised, she set out for Lyons, carrying the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre with her, but leaving the two marshals close confined<sup>d</sup>.

Henry III. makes his escape from Poland, and returns through Germany and Italy into France.

HENRY the third, at the time of his accession, was in the twenty-third year of his age. He received the news of it at Cracow in a fortnight, and, from that moment, resolved to make his escape, which, however, he dissembled with great address, and prevented the Poles from taking those violent measures which they first intended, of seizing all the French, and putting them to death without mercy, in case the king left them<sup>e</sup>. He quitted the court, however, in the night, within a week after he had the news, and was followed by Bellevue, the French minister, so briskly, that he joined him in the emperor's territories, where he was overtaken by the lord high chamberlain, to whom he made his excuses, presented him a diamond ring of great value, and intreated him to be kind to the French he had left behind in Poland<sup>f</sup>. He was extremely well received by the emperor Maximilian the second, with whom he staid a week at Vienna, and his imperial majesty behaved towards him in a manner not very common amongst princes; he pointed out to him the errors committed in the reigns of his father and brothers, advised him to regain the confidence of his subjects, to grant the Protestants reasonable terms, and to observe them punctually. He gave him a good escorte, and caused him to be accompanied by his two sons into the territories of the republic of Venice<sup>g</sup>. He was received there with all possible marks of respect; the republic gave him the same advice, and he was so exceedingly pleased with his entertainment, that he called the time he spent there the nine enchanted days ever after<sup>h</sup>. He proceeded from thence to Turin, where he was exceedingly careffed by the duke and duchess of Savoy; but he paid a little too dear for this entertainment, since he was persuaded to part with Pignerol, and two or three other places which he held in Piedmont. There he conferred with marshal Damville, who seemed to stand high in his favour; but, upon the coming of some of the emissaries of the queen-mother, he intended to have seized him, if the duke of Savoy, upon whose faith he came, had not sent him away with a strong escorte. The marshal, however, was so much frightened, that, as he returned into Languedoc, he made a vow that he would never see the king more, except in a picture. About the latter end of August he set out for Lyons, accompanied, as he had been from Venice, by the duke of Savoy, and escorted by a small army, composed of his troops, a circumstance of a very new and extraordinary nature, that a French monarch should stand in need of the protection of the duke of Savoy, in order to pass with safety through part of his own kingdom; and yet, in spite of this precaution, the Protestants, who were in arms, carried off a part of his baggage, which alarmed and incensed him exceedingly. On the sixth of September he arrived safely in the last-mentioned city, having been met at a considerable distance by the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre, and, when he drew near the place, by the queen-mother<sup>i</sup>.

Affects the character of a wise and great prince.

HENRY, at his first return to France, seemed inclined to mind his own affairs, and to live and reign like a king. He received the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre but very coldly, yet heard their excuses and apologies civilly, and at length gave them their liberty. He gave the bâton to the famous Montluc, for the service he had rendered his predecessors, for

- a his age and infirmities disabled him from doing much more<sup>a</sup>. The king made a regular partition of his time, and took every method to make the world believe, that he intended to be a man of business. He was still amorous of the princess of Condé, and spoke to the queen-mother of the means of obtaining a divorce; but, while he flattered himself with these notions, the princess died suddenly at Paris, as the duchess of Savoy had done a little before at Turin<sup>b</sup>. In spite of all the good advice he had received at Vienna and Venice, the king positively determined to continue the war against the Hugonots, and to continue it with vigour. Marshal Damville, upon this, threw off the mask, assembled the states of Languedoc, and informed the world that he had put himself at the head of a confederacy, for restoring vigour to the laws, tranquillity to the state, and driving foreigners out of the court and the kingdom<sup>c</sup>: the king went from Lyons to Avignon, where he first gave a specimen of that strange temper which rendered him contemptible and ridiculous; for, not content with assisting at the solemn processions, he put himself at the head of a band of penitents, and the complaisance of the cardinal of Lorraine, who made one of the number, cost him his life; some say, by the cold he got by marching at midnight with his legs half-bare, though others affirm that he was poisoned: he was certainly a very great man, admired and idolized by the Catholics, abhorred and dreaded by the Hugonots. The queen-mother, according to her custom, spoke of him sometimes as if he had united the two different characters of saint and statesman; at others, as the curse of France, and the real author of so many years troubles<sup>d</sup>; in which, without doubt, she had as large a share as the cardinal.
- b In a very short time, the king broke through all his good resolutions that he ever made. He spent the greatest part of his time with his young favourites, to whom his subjects gave the ignominious name of his minions; and with the ladies, by whose charms and address the queen-mother thought to govern him, as she had others, who managed the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre in the same manner<sup>e</sup>. The time for his coronation being fixed, he was surprised on the road with a discovery which he little expected. Forvagues, one of his brother's favourites, was introduced to him in the night, in the disguise of a peasant, and, throwing himself at his feet, declared there was a conspiracy against his life. Henry was amazed, but his mother made light of it. However, he sent one of his pages, whose name was Barat, properly instructed, to the place of rendezvous of the conspirators, who, at his return, reported that no less than two hundred determined men were embarked in this cruel design<sup>f</sup>. The king sent for the duke of Alençon, and threatened him, but, on his falling upon his knees, and confessing all, he was pardoned; those who embarked in this bloody attempt quitted the kingdom in a body<sup>g</sup>. On the 13th of February the king was crowned at Rheims, by the cardinal of Guise, but in such confusion, that the Te Deum was forgot. He complained, when the crown was set upon his head, that it hurt him, and it had like to have fallen. The next day he espoused Louisa, daughter to the count de Vaudemont, of the house of Lorraine<sup>h</sup>. The war with the Protestants went on with indifferent success; but Montbrun, who had surprised the king's baggage, being made prisoner in an action, lost his head by the sentence of the parliament of Grenoble. His party replaced him by the famous Monsieur de Lesdiguières<sup>i</sup>. In consequence of a negociation that had been set on foot, the confederates, by their deputies, presented a remonstrance, consisting of ninety-two articles, in which they demanded an assembly of the states, a reduction of the taxes to what they were in the reign of Lewis the twelfth, the punishment of atheists, blasphemers, and magicians, and the total suppression of those infamous debauches, which could not fail to bring the heavy judgments of God upon the nation. The king was exceedingly provoked, and dismissed the deputies with a rough answer<sup>j</sup>. The new method was practised to quiet marshal Damville, that is, he was poisoned, but had the good fortune to recover. However, on the rumour of his death, the queen-mother extorted an order for Souvrai, one of the king's favourites, to dispatch the marshals Montmorency and Coffe. Souvrai was the only man of probity the king had about him. He made no scruple of accepting the order, that he might delay the execution. As soon as it was known that Damville was alive, the queen-mother caused it to be superseded; and Souvrai persuaded the king that the only way to make the marshals forget what was past, was to set them at liberty, which was accordingly done<sup>k</sup>. In the month of August, the king was seized with a dreadful pain in the head, which produced an ulcer in his ear; he made no doubt but that he was poisoned, and it was upon this occasion that he sent for the king of Navarre into his bed-chamber, conjured him to dispatch that villain, meaning his brother, and thereby secure the crown to himself. Henry of Navarre consoled him in the most tender manner, but at the same time told him, he would not purchase all the crowns upon earth by so a detestable an action<sup>c</sup>. The king recovered not long after; but the duke of Alençon found his situation so uneasy, that, upon the 15th of September, deceiving those who were appointed to keep their eyes on him, he retired to Dreux, where he was presently surrounded by many of the nobility. A body of Germans entered the kingdom soon after, who were attacked and defeated by the duke of Guise, who in this battle received a wound in the face, from whence he had the surname of Balafre<sup>d</sup>. The queen-mother, notwithstanding this success, was very desirous of bringing about a peace, in which she had the assistance of marshal Montmorency; but the Protestants were so suspicious of her, and even of the duke of Alençon, that all she could obtain was a truce for six months; and even this upon hard terms, the king agreeing to pay a fresh body of German troops, whom the prince of Condé had hired, allowing the duke of Alençon guards, and promising to disband his own troops; and the following six places were given as cautionary towns to the Protestants, Angoulême, Niort, Saumur, Bourges, La Charité, and Mesfieres; but because the governors of Angoulême and Bourges absolutely refused to evacuate those places, the confederates were content with St. John de Angeli and Coignac. This truce, negotiated by the queen-mother in person, was proclaimed on the 23d of December<sup>e</sup>.

A. D. 1575.
The war ended
by a peace with the Protestants.

FROM the time the duke of Alençon had quitted the court, the king, and even the queen-mother, was firmly persuaded, that the king of Navarre had no connections with him, and were only in pain about the prince of Condé, who refused to accept the truce. In the beginning of the month of February they had the mortification to find themselves mistaken; the king of Navarre, under the pretence of hunting, withdrew, and took his precautions so well, that he arrived safely in his government of Guienne, where he presently declared that he had been forced to abjure his religion, and that, in his heart, he never had any other than the reformed, in which he was brought up<sup>f</sup>. This alarmed the court exceedingly; more especially when they understood that the prince of Condé had joined the Germans, and that the duke of Alençon, having put himself at the head of that army, found it consist of thirty-five thousand men. The duke of Mayenne, in the room of his brother the duke of Guise, who was not yet recovered, commanded that of the crown, which consisted but of eighteen thousand men. The queen-mother, according to her old system, negotiated on all sides, and at length, with the help of the marshal de Montmorency, concluded a peace about the middle of May, the terms of which were digested into the famous edict of pacification, which consisted of no less than sixty-three articles<sup>g</sup>. By these liberty of conscience, and the public exercise of their religion, were granted to the reformed, without any other restriction than that they should not preach within two leagues of Paris, or any other place where the court was: party-chambers were erected in every parliament, to consist of equal numbers of Catholics and Protestants, before whom all suits were to be tried; the judgments against the admiral, and in general all who had fallen by the sword of war or of justice, were reversed; eight cautionary places were given to the Protestants; and as in general, so in particular, every body was contented to the full of his demands, except the king of Navarre. This edict, that seemed to promise, at least a temporary calm, produced greater mischiefs than hitherto had fallen upon France.

Beginning of the league by the Guisan
faction.

THE Guises took this opportunity to introduce a measure that had been long before concerted in favour of his father by his uncle the cardinal of Lorraine, and this was the famous Catholic league, which was first signed by James d'Humieres in Picardy, soon after by the count de Lude, governor of Poitou, and, in a very short space of time, by all the angry Catholics in the kingdom<sup>h</sup>. The king was mentioned in it with respect; but he could not help seeing that it struck at the very root of his authority; for as his Protestant subjects had already their chiefs, so the Catholics were, for the future, to depend upon the chief of the league; and were, by the very words of it, to execute whatever he commanded, for the good of the cause, against any, without exception of persons. The king, to avoid the effects of this, by the advice of his council, declared himself head of the league, notwithstanding it derogated from what he had done, and was directly calculated to annul the edict of pacification<sup>i</sup>. Besides, the Pope and the king of Spain were its protectors; so that nothing could be more unworthy of him, as a monarch, than the part he was obliged to take. To speak the truth, he was already but one king amongst many, and some of them pretty considerable; his brother had the countries of Anjou, Tourain, and Berri, with an additional pension of one hundred thousand crowns. The prince of Condé was to have his government of Picardy, and the strong fortress of Peronne; till he was put in possession of this he seized Brouage, and re-

- a maintained in arms. The king of Navarre kept his own territories in Guienne. Marshal Damville acted as sovereign in Languedoc: and, what grated the French most of all, prince Cosmire was to have Chateau Thierri erected into a principality, a company of one hundred men at arms, a numerous body of German cavalry, which he was to furnish, a pension of twelve thousand crowns, besides seven hundred thousand in ready money; and, till all this could be given him, he lived at free quarters in the bishoprick of Langres, where he destroyed the country without mercy<sup>k</sup>. In the beginning of November the states met at Blois, where the king made them a very good speech, in which lay his talent, and his chancellor Birague a very bad one. Before the close of the year they cancelled the edict of pacification, and sent their deputies to the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, and marshal Damville, to invite them to the assembly, but without effect; as for the duke of Anjou, he was reconciled to the court already, and, it was strongly suspected, did nothing but by his mother's advice, all the time he seemed to be against it<sup>l</sup>. A. D. 1576.

- THE year opened with the states absolute declaration against any toleration or indulgence to the Protestants, the king's avowing himself the head of the holy league, as they affected to call it, sending it into the provinces, with his recommendation, to be subscribed, and, at the same time, renewing the war against the Hugonots, and all with a view of procuring money, which, at their close, the states positively refused. The duke of Anjou at the head of the army, having under him the duke of Guise and the duke of Aumale, took some places, and particularly La Charite, and, upon the whole, the Catholics had the advantage in most parts of the kingdom. This was chiefly owing to the misunderstanding that subsisted amongst their chiefs. The people of Rochelle were jealous of the prince of Condé; the king of Navarre did not act with vigour; marshal Damville laboured to keep his own principality, and was even suspected of some understanding with the court, which put the Protestants upon seizing Montpellier, and some other places in his government. Very happily for them, the like feuds ran as high, or higher, at court, where the king was excessively jealous of the duke of Anjou, and at the same time more afraid of the duke of Guise<sup>m</sup>. The duke of Montpensier, more than half a malcontent, took this opportunity to propose a peace, which was preceded by a truce, in the month of September. At length it was concluded in the succeeding month, and signed by the king at Poitiers, and by the king of Navarre at Bergerac<sup>n</sup>. By this treaty the edict of pacification was again revived, with some restrictions, at which the warmer Hugonots were highly provoked; but the prince of Condé, who understood their affairs, and his own situation better, was so extremely pleased with it, that he caused it to be proclaimed by torch-light at St. John de Angeli, for fear of any accident that might happen by deferring it till next morning<sup>o</sup>. All this time the luxury of the court continued, and, if possible, increased; of which it may not be amiss to give two instances: the first was that of the Italian comedians<sup>p</sup>, who, till then, had never been in France. Their buffooneries were mixed with such indecencies, that, notwithstanding they produced the king's letters patent, the parliament forbade them to exhibit their performances under severe penalties; but the king, tho' otherwise a very mutable prince, was so delighted with them, that he, by repeated letters of jussion, forced the parliament to give way. The other, the behaviour of Monf. Villequiere, one of Henry's favourites, who finding, by a letter of his wife's, that she was with child by another man, who had poisoned his wife, and solicited her to poison him, stabbed her and her maid at her toilet, in the king's palace, and in a room not far from his, notwithstanding which he had his pardon as soon as he asked it; which occasioned a report that, though free enough of her favours to others, she had refused them to the king<sup>q</sup>. A. D. 1577.

- ANIMOSITY still subsisted between the Papists and Protestants, and frequent enterprizes were made by each party, notwithstanding the peace. The disturbances at court rose higher than ever; the bravoos of the duke of Guise were continually quarrelling with, and sometimes killing the king's minions, to whom, as he was prodigal while living, he caused them, when dead, to be interred with all the pomp of princes, but he durst not revenge them<sup>r</sup>. The duke of Anjou had his favourites likewise, in whose disputes with the minions he took such a share, that at length he retired again from court, which raised an apprehension of fresh disturbances. The queen-mother interposed; and, to save France, she directed her views to England and Flanders, though he did not behave to her either with the tenderness of a son, or the respect due to her as a queen<sup>s</sup>. She made afterwards a tour to Nerac, where the king of Navarre kept his court, under colour of carrying her daughter back to her husband, but, in reality, with an intention to gain that prince if possible, or at least to adjust disputes, so as to prevent a new war<sup>t</sup>. In order to which she carried with her some of her fyrens, and continued there many months; but it is reported that the queen of Navarre made such an impression on the heart of a grave magistrate, who had the ear of her mother, that turned the stream of a advantage in favour of the king her husband. The marshal de Bellegarde, who, at his return from Poland, stood high in the king's favour, yet held it but for a little time, had seized the marquisate of Saluces, and held it in spite of the court, being supported by the duke of Savoy <sup>a</sup> and the king of Spain; and the queen-mother knew no better way to gain him, than by confirming him in the government which he had usurped. In the absence of his mother the king continued his indolent luxurious course of life; and, studying nothing so much as how to pillage his people, he sent at once twenty-two edicts burdeaux, that is, according to our manner of speaking, money-bills, to his senate, of which the parliament thought fit to register only two; but the king forced them afterwards to give their sanction to some of the rest that were the least oppressive. The chancellor Birague being honoured with a cap from Rome, the king gave the seals to Chiverny, who was the creature of his predecessor. As miserable as France was at this time, the Low Countries were still more so, having no less than four or five A. D. 1578. princes who aspired to the government, each at the head of armies; and, to increase those miseries, the Catholics called in the duke of Anjou, who, as it might be expected from his turbulent temper, accepted their invitation, and thereby augmented that confusion he came to suppress <sup>w</sup>.

The court again resolves
on war.

ON the first day of the new year the king executed a design which he had long had in his mind, and which was the most worthy of his whole reign. The order of St. Michael had been long declining in credit (as all orders do on being bestowed on very unworthy persons), was at length fallen so low, that the ensigns of it were called, in derision, collars for all beasts. Without suppressing this the king erected that of the Holy Ghost <sup>x</sup>, limiting the number to one hundred, and uniting the mastership in perpetuity to the crown of France. His view in this, for the statutes of the order were drawn with great skill and care, was to attach a considerable number of the nobility closely to his person, to detach some of those who had entered into the league, it being provided, by the institution of the order, that no knight should accept salary, pension, or honour, from any other prince than the king; and, lastly, to draw back some of the Hugonot nobility to the old religion, none but Catholics being capable of this new order. In the mean time, through the address, as we observed, of the queen of Navarre, not out of love either to her husband, or his religion, but out of hatred to the king her brother, the conferences at Nerac ended entirely to the advantage of the Protestants, towards the close of the month of February, three new places being granted them in Guienne, which they were to hold till the month of August, and eleven in Languedoc, which they were to retain till the month of October <sup>y</sup>. The queen-mother continued her tour into the remoter provinces, having a particular desire to confer with marshal Bellegarde, who was closely united with Lesdiguieres and the duke of Savoy, and, as it was suspected, to the king of Spain. The marshal made some difficulty of passing the mountains; but the queen having prevailed upon the duke of Savoy to accompany him, he could not refuse. She received his excuses very graciously, promised him all that he could desire, and sent him away perfectly satisfied; but some thought the queen's earnestness about this interview was sufficiently explained by his death, which happened six days after his return into his government, which, however, was given to his son; and because he was a youth, Negarette de la Valette, afterwards duke of Epernon, was appointed to assist him. She likewise cajoled the marshal Damville, known henceforward by the title of Montmorency, his elder brother dying, not without suspicion of poison, as in these times great men seldom died a natural death. At her return to the court, the queen found a new set of favourites, but the king in his old disposition. The duke of Anjou passed the seas in August, to pay his addresses to queen Elizabeth, whom his minister Mons. Siniere had strongly preposessed in his favour, in which he stood very high himself, by means of some bold truths he had told her of some of her ministers <sup>a</sup>. The queen treated the duke in such a manner, that she sent him away thoroughly persuaded the possession of the Low Countries would procure him her person and her crown. After taking so much pains to make peace, the queen-mother, towards the close of the year, relapsed into a desire of making war; at least, so it seemed to all France, by marshal Montmorency's demanding from the king of Navarre cautionary towns, which he did in a peremptory strain, and which the king, with equal firmness, refused to deliver. He had already taken his measures with the prince of Condé and Lesdiguieres; the former, at the close of November, surprised La Fere in Picardy, and immediately after went in person into Germany, to negotiate a supply of troops from the Protestant princes <sup>b</sup>.

a of his conduct as a soldier, they concluded that he had been too hasty in having again recourse to arms. They had some colour, though no reason, for this; for out of sixty places, in which the king, the prince of Condé, and Lesdiguières, had intelligence, they were not able to surprise above three, and the Hugonots, judging by the event, censured a conduct which they did not comprehend. The king of Navarre was extremely hurt by the manifest tokens of coldness he received, which bordered nearly upon contempt. He proposed in his council of war the surprising Cabors the capital of Querci, a place strongly situated, well fortified, with a numerous garrison commanded by Verins, esteemed one of the ablest, as well as one of the bravest officers in France. His council unanimously dissuaded him from attempting a thing which, for the reasons they assigned, seemed to be impossible. He answered calmly, that, b supported by men so brave as he knew them to be, there was nothing impossible. It happened, the night he made his attack, there was a most dreadful storm. He forced the gate of the bridge next the country by a petard, the first time that it had been practised in France, and, having cut in pieces the guard on the bridge, forced the gate of the city in the same manner, the thunder hindering the inhabitants from distinguishing the report of the petard<sup>c</sup>. Verins, however, made an obstinate defence, disputing the ground inch by inch; so that it was five whole days before he was beat out of the place, the king being at the head of the foot, who forced the last and strongest intrenchment in person<sup>d</sup>. This event had a great effect; it gained him a place of very great consequence, and it established his character with respect to firmness and conduct; but it was followed by a great disappointment: he had quarrelled with the admiral Villars, who was the king's lieutenant in Guienne, and the queen-mother, at his own request, had bestowed that post on marshal Biron, who was the king's friend; but he soon gave him to understand, that he had no notion of friendship, when it came in competition with his duty; so that he was able to make no progress on that side<sup>e</sup>.

In the mean time, the crown army, commanded by marshal Matignon, laid siege to La Fère, where the army was, in every respect, so well accommodated, that it was stiled the velvet siege. It was gallantly defended for six weeks, and surrendered, at the end of August, upon honourable terms. Some other actions passed of little importance; but the deputies from the states of the Low Countries having made an offer of their government to the duke of Anjou, he offered the king his brother his mediation for terminating the civil war, which the d king, who was now reconciled to him, readily accepted; and promised, in case he succeeded, to give him all the assistance possible, as well in regard to his marriage as his establishment. The duke had a conference on this subject with the king of Navarre, at the castle of Flex, on the Dordonne, in Perigord; where, after consulting the deputies of the Protestants, the terms proposed by the king were esteemed so moderate, that the treaty was very quickly concluded, by which the edict of Poitiers, as explained by the articles at Nerac, was confirmed, and the cautionary towns left in the hands of the Protestants for six years<sup>f</sup>. The prince of Condé vehemently opposed this peace, on account of a treaty which he had made with the elector Palatine, in order to have brought a new army of Germans into the kingdom, to whom he had promised cautionary towns, till they should be paid the vast sums that he had offered e them. The Protestants could by no means digest the putting any of their strong places into the hands of foreigners; on the other hand, the preventing this irruption was the chief motive that determined the king to peace: so that both parties having an equal dislike to this measure, the king of Navarre, with the full content of the Hugonot deputies, ratified the peace towards the close of November, as the king likewise did a month afterwards, and caused it to be also ratified by the parliament of Paris<sup>g</sup>. This placed the king of Navarre in a more conspicuous light than ever; and at the same time his consort merited no less, since it was by her skill and intrigues that her brother's affairs in the Low Countries had been brought into so good a condition, which however had, in all probability, never happened, if Don John of Austria's death had not fallen out so opportunely for their designs, which death, though imputed by many to poison, was not laid to their charge. f

IMMEDIATELY after the conclusion of the peace, the monarch of Navarre acquainted the king, that tho' in appearance he was compelled by necessity to make it, yet, in reality, it was otherwise, since the king of Spain had offered him money and troops sufficient to conquer Guienne, and importuned him to accept them still. He also assured the court that he would take no share in the rash enterprize of the prince of Condé, who still persisted in refusing the peace; and he kept his promise so punctually, that the duke of Mayenne easily obliged Lesdiguières, and the rest of the malecontents, to accept the pacification<sup>h</sup>. This behaviour was equally pleasing to the king and to the duke of Anjou, who now thought themselves sure of carrying their point in England, insomuch that a most splendid embassy, at the head of which was the prince Dauphin of Auvergne, son to the duke of Montpensier, was sent into England to demand the queen in marriage for the duke of Anjou <sup>a</sup>. They had a public audience in April, with all possible marks of grace and favour. The two great points of the marriage and the league seemed to be absolutely settled, in consequence of which the warm Protestants in England declaimed most vehemently against this scheme for bringing back popery, while in France the friends of the league insinuated, that both the treaty and the marriage were proofs that the king and his brother both had too great an inclination to heresy, notwithstanding the continual efforts made by the former of these princes, that he was not only a zealous Catholic, but a downright bigot <sup>k</sup>. The prince of Parma, who succeeded Don John of Austria in the government of the Low Countries for the crown of Spain, laid siege to Cambray, to the relief of which the duke of Anjou marched with a superior army, and having disengaged the place about the middle of August, removed the Spanish governor, who had sacrificed every thing for his service, and gave the command to John de Balagny, the son of Montluc bishop of Valence, which occasioned much discontent <sup>l</sup>; so that, finding his enterprize become daily more and more difficult, he resolved to pass over into England, in order to remove, by his presence, the obstacles raised to the alliance between the two crowns against Spain, which the king, his brother, insisted should be preceded by the marriage; whereas queen Elizabeth alleged the necessity of the treaty's being signed to satisfy her people on the conclusion of the marriage.

In the month of November the duke arrived at the English court, where he was received with all imaginable testimonies of affection and esteem <sup>m</sup>. The French historians say, that the queen went so far as to sign a contract of marriage with him, and to receive his, at the same time that she presented him with a ring, assuring him, that from this time she should consider herself as espoused <sup>n</sup>. Our writers mention the ring <sup>o</sup>, but are silent as to the contract; however, it is on all hands agreed, that she presently revoked all she had done, but without breaking off the treaty of marriage, which she pretended only to defer. It may, however, be very justly suspected, that the whole of this was a contrivance, to which very few, if any, were privy. Her affairs were then in a very critical situation; she knew very well the temper and genius of those with whom she treated; she knew it was her interest to over-reach them; and she believed that, all things considered, they would not be very willing, perhaps not very able, to resent it, when they found themselves over-reached. If the duke of Anjou was disappointed in this journey in the essential point, he found, at least, his account in it, from many collateral circumstances. The very reputation of it did him great credit. The queen gave it all the countenance in the Low Countries that he could desire; she furnished him with some troops; she supplied him at once with one hundred thousand crowns; she made a shew of detaining him at her court against his will, that his returning unmarried might be no prejudice to his affairs; she made him great presents, and she caused him to be honourably accompanied, and even by some of the first nobility of her kingdom <sup>p</sup>. Her conduct embarrassed all the politicians of her times, and has given at least as much trouble to the historians, who have attempted to explain it ever since. Bodin, chancellor to the duke, took the liberty of telling her one day, while his master remained at her court, that he was writing the characters of the most eminent persons of the age, and was desirous to know how he should do justice to her's; "In this particular, Mr. Bodin, replied she frankly, Do you know what the world will think of your memoirs, if you attempt to give any account of this business in them; trust me, they will be of opinion that the materials were communicated by a liar, and that they were put together by a fool <sup>q</sup>." This is a very singular circumstance, and we leave the reader to make his own reflections. The most penetrating of the French historians suspect, that the queen had chiefly in view the preventing the duke of Anjou from espousing a daughter of Spain, which would have been by no means acceptable, either to her or to the prince of Orange, who still suspected the influence of Spanish counsels at the French court.

A. D. 1581.

At the return of the duke of Anjou into the Low Countries, the highest honours were paid him, as well out of respect to the queen of England, as of his own high birth, and the great service he had rendered the states <sup>r</sup>. To keep him steady in his enterprize, which was, in some measure, contrary to his temper, he was, in the month of March, solemnly installed at Antwerp marquis of the Holy Roman empire, and duke of Brabant <sup>s</sup>. Yet this solemnity, appointed to do him honour, occasioned his receiving an open affront. The prince of Orange being wounded in the face by Jaureguay, the servant of a broken banker, the populace, who strongly suspected the duke of Anjou, rose immediately in consequence of this accident, a and disarmed all the French in their quarters. The prince took care, notwithstanding his wound, to restore the public tranquillity in a few hours; but the duke could not so soon forget it. He went afterwards to Ghent, and was there saluted earl of Flanders; but, with abundance of fine titles, he had little authority, the states reserving that, as was very natural, since they were fighting for freedom, and not for a change of masters<sup>1</sup>. It was not easy, however, for their new duke to digest this; and besides, there were those about him who would not suffer him to remain quiet, even if he had been so inclined: they followed him with a design of making their fortunes; and it was necessary to this that he should have it in his power; for accomplishing of which they pointed out the means, and he was forward enough in undertaking to carry them into execution. But while he was meditating great things, a plot, thro' the sagacity and vigilance of the prince of Orange, was discovered against both their lives, and that of the king, the duke's brother. One Salsedo, the son of a Spaniard, who had raised a regiment at his own expence for the duke's service, was at the head of this design, in which one Francis Bafa, an Italian, and a banker, were also embarked. Bafa, in hopes of mercy, made some important discoveries; but soon after dispatched himself in a fit of despair<sup>2</sup>. Salsedo talked of strange things, in hopes of being transferred to Paris, and having at least a chance to be rescued by the way. When he came there he made great discoveries, after being tortured, in the king's own hearing; but he denied them all before his death, being torn in pieces by four horses<sup>3</sup>. All that was published, was, that he had laid a scheme for betraying Calais and Dunkirk into the hands of the duke of Parma, and for destroying the prince of Orange and the duke of Anjou; but it is generally believed that he laid open the conspiracy of the Guises, which struck the king and the court with the greatest terror<sup>4</sup>. This year Strozzi, whom the queen-mother had sent with the fleet to the Azores islands, in support of Don Antonio's claim to the crown of Portugal, to which she herself had formed some pretensions, part of his squadron was taken, and those on board it treated with great severity by the Spaniards, under colour of their coming to assist the rebels<sup>5</sup>. As to the domestic affairs of France, the king seemed to be wholly occupied in aggrandizing his two great favourites, the dukes of Joyeuse and Epernon. Towards the close of the year the Gregorian calendar was introduced, by striking out the days between the 15th and 25th of December. The alliance was also renewed between the crown and the cantons of Switzerland, which was indeed an affair of consequence<sup>6</sup>.

A. D. 1532.

THE next year opened with a very strange scene. Tho' the crown of France pretended to take no share in the war in the Low Countries, yet it was a thing of notoriety that the king permitted his brother to levy troops in his territories, and the queen-mother and the queen of England furnished him with money to pay them. If Philip dissembled the knowlege of this, it was because his affairs were not in such a condition as would permit him to revenge them; but he had his intrigues, and it was not long before the effects of them made them clearly known. The duke of Anjou, after having maturely deliberated on the complaints made by his creatures, and the project proposed by them for their relief, resolved to make use of the French troops to surprize the towns where they were in garrison, and to begin with Antwerp himself. This enterprize, formed in the month of January, proved abortive, thro' the skill and courage of the prince of Orange; so that, after losing a great many brave men in the attack, and many more in a precipitate retreat, he was obliged to abandon the place he thought to surprize, and to retire to Dunkirk<sup>7</sup>. He entered next into a private negociation with the Spaniards, in which he offered to deliver up to them all the places he held, in case they would furnish him with money to pay his troops, and give him a small equivalent in the neighbourhood of Cambray. The duke of Parma, however, being slow in his proceedings, and the prince of Orange gaining intelligence of them, he, with his usual prudence, interposed, and, by accepting the king's mediation, disappointed the Spaniards, and procured them upon easier terms for the states<sup>8</sup>. The duke, finding that all his hopes in the Low Countries were lost, and his character blasted by the last ill-judged and ill-conducted event, retired full of chagrin into France, to the no small satisfaction both of the Spaniards and the states. Part of his forces, commanded by marshal Biron, being beaten by the duke of Parma, the small garrison he had in Dunkirk were obliged to surrender that important place, which augmented the general distaste, that was but already too great against that unhappy prince. His conduct, wild and extravagant as it was, altered the sentiments of the king, who, no longer jealous of the duke of Anjou, treated him with contempt<sup>9</sup>. Yet his own behaviour was not a degree better; for if the duke had wasted his revenue, and involved himself in immense debts by these strange expeditions, the king was precisely in the same situation; and, after having exhausted his own treasures, and harrassed his people to the last degree, he was scarce in a condition to defray the expences of his household. He had married the duke de

Joyeuse to the sister of his queen ; and, some say, had taken a strange resolution of dividing a his dominions between him and the duke of Epernon<sup>d</sup>. On some project of this kind, it is said, he sent the former of these dukes to Rome ; and the queen of Navarre being suspected of having a hand in the stripping a courier of his letters, with a view to discover this secret, he turned her out of his court, where she came to make her mother a visit, with all possible marks of ignominy, and sent her under a guard to her husband, who, after such usage, refused to receive her, till he was compelled to it by marshal Matignon, at the head of a considerable army<sup>e</sup>. The queen-mother had now lost her power, which was divided between the minions and the Guises, whom she hated alike, but caballed with them both ; while the king of Spain laboured to excite a new civil war, sometimes by making vast offers to the king of Navarre, sometimes by proposals which he made with the marshal de Montmorency, b with whom he actually concluded a treaty, by discovering which to the duke of Guise, he induced him to accept of his offers.

A. D. 1583. If we may credit some historians there was a kind of policy even in Henry's conduct, who, fearing the Protestants and hating the Guises, endeavoured, by elevating his minions, and bestowing no employments or favours but by their recommendation, to create a new power, or rather faction, in his dominions, entirely attached to himself. But assuredly, if this had been his real intention, he would have either saved himself, or have advised them to save ; whereas, in feasts, masques, funerals, processions, and donations<sup>f</sup>, he wasted more millions than his predecessors had done in their wars, and had raised them by more acts of violence and extortion. Whereas, if he had taken the advice of honest men, and there wanted not such even in his reign, moderated his own expences, and shewn a true regard for justice and the ease of his people, he might have established such a strength as would have effectually awed the Hugonots and the Guises, more especially if his coffers had been full. A monarch, who is not poor, and who studies the interest of his subjects, is always safe. But Henry, who believed himself, from the perusal of Italian authors, and listening to Italian counsels, the most refined politician of that age, while he affected the state of an eastern emperor, and affected to shew himself rarely to the people, was suspected of incapacity ; shutting himself up with his young minions, gave too much countenance to the most infamous suggestions, and his endeavours to stifle these, by extravagant acts of a counterfeit devotion, afforded his enemies an opportunity to represent him as an atheist, and a prince of no religion<sup>g</sup>. At all events his refined policy, instead of supporting, ruined him, by irritating both the factions that were already formed, but more especially that of the Guises, who finding that they were abhorred by the king, who laboured by every method possible to curtail their power and lessen their influence, began to revive those intrigues<sup>h</sup>, for which their family had been ever decried from their very first entrance into France ; and, with a view of aggrandizing themselves, caballed with Monsieur the king's brother, and presumptive heir, who, since the ruin which he had brought on his own affairs in the Low Countries, had removed from place to place, like one disturbed and distracted in his mind, ashamed of what he had already done, and not knowing what to do next. In this disposition the Guises found him ; and, ravished with the hopes of being again trusted and placed at the head of a puissant faction, he threw himself at once into their hands, and seemed for a little while to be the creature of their will. But, from the natural inconstancy of his temper, or it may be from some better motive, he repaired, during the season of Lent, to his brother's court, where he was little expected, and falling upon his knees, told the king all that he knew, which procured him a very kind reception ; and, in all appearance, the brothers were then cordially and entirely reconciled<sup>i</sup>. The duke, at his departure, returned to Chateau-Thierry, where he quickly fell into a very bad state of health, and, growing daily worse and worse, the queen, his mother, went to visit him, and finding him past hopes of recovery, carried away the most valuable of his effects<sup>k</sup>. He died on the 10th of June, of a slow consumptive fever, attended with a cough, which occasioned a violent straining, so that by bursting a vein in his lungs, he was choaked with his own blood<sup>l</sup>. An opinion prevailed however in France, and elsewhere, that he was poisoned ; and the attempt made upon queen Elizabeth by Dr. Parry, and the barbarous assassination of the prince of Orange in the same year, gave more credit to this report than perhaps it deserved<sup>m</sup>.

THE death of Monsieur, whatever his character or disposition might be, was justly esteemed a very great misfortune to the nation, and the source of those troubles that followed, and of which he refused to be the author. It will be necessary to shew how this affair stood with respect to the house of Guise, what precautions were taken by the king against their designs, and how, notwithstanding these, they found the means of raising a civil war, and being abet-

a ted therein by some of the greatest families in France. We cannot propose to enter into an exact detail, since the nature of our work requires only a representation, as succinct and sincere as possible. In the first great assembly held not far from Nancy, in the house of the Sieur de Bassompierre, were present, the duke of Lorraine, the dukes of Guise, Mayenne, the cardinal of Guise, several of their great confidants, and some agents from the court of Spain: they deliberated there on the means of engaging the people to take up arms; drew up a long state, as they might easily do, of the errors in government, and grievances with which the nation was oppressed; charged these upon the minions and their creatures in the first place, and in the next on the king's incapacity, from whom there was never any thing better to be expected. There was nothing said at this time of the fear of a heretic successor, because b the duke of Anjou was living, and they were in hopes of having him for their head; they were also silent as to religion, that they might not compel the Protestants to attach themselves unanimously to Henry, and that they might obtain the assistance of duke Casimir, who having more than once before rifled France, had no dislike to a new enterprize, provided it was not against the Protestants or the king of Navarre. The discovery first, and afterwards the death of the duke of Anjou, disconcerted a little, but did not discourage or dissipate the conspirators, who thought their affairs mended, since they had now the popular pretence of standing in fear of a heretic successor. What gave them most trouble was, to find a prince whom they might set at their head. The queen-mother had certainly views of altering the succession in favour of her grandson, the prince of Lorraine, and the duke, his father, c was for having him declared chief; but the duke of Guise, who intended to be the head, The Guise faction resolve to support Charles, cardinal of Bourbon, as presumptive heir to the crown. in effect, preferred his own interests to those of his house; and therefore supported Charles, cardinal of Bourbon, an old weak man, who had for many years entertained a notion of his right to the crown, grounded on this pretence, that as it passed to the branch of Bourbon by descent, he was one degree nearer than his nephew; and, besides, had shewn himself, perhaps from this motive, not only a warm and active, but a zealous, and even a furious Papist<sup>n</sup>.

THE king was not uninformed of all these consultations and contrivances, and it is even said that he talked very roundly to the cardinal upon the subject. But he thought it necessary to go farther; he had married his favourite the duke de Joyeuse into the house of d Lorraine; and, therefore, he made choice of the duke of Epernon to execute a commission of importance to the king of Navarre, which consisted in acquainting him with the designs of the Guises, to give him the strongest assurances of his own kind intentions, and at the same time to exhort him to return to the Catholic church, as the most effectual means of securing his succession. The duke discharged his trust with great fidelity, and urged all the arguments that could be drawn from prudence and policy, but without success. The king of Navarre, however, gave him a very gracious reception, testified a great sense of the king's goodness and high confidence in his justice, but excused himself as to the point of religion, but with temper and moderation<sup>o</sup>. Plessis-Mornay, who stood very high in this prince's favour, thought to render him a great service in making his sentiments on this e subject public, which he expressed in his own manner, ascribing to his master great zeal for the Protestant religion, which cured indeed the Protestant ministers of their apprehensions of the duke of Epernon's visit, but at the same time afforded the Guises an opportunity of decrying both princes, Henry of Navarre as an obstinate heretic, and Henry of France as a favourer of heresy<sup>p</sup>. At his return the duke of Epernon formed a design of securing the duke of Guise, who thereupon retired into Champagne, fully determined to have recourse to arms, the rather, because the king of Navarre had reconciled the marshal de Montmorency to his master, at the very time he was on the point of attacking him in his government<sup>q</sup>. The king, as if he had resumed his understanding, in the month of November published an edict, forbidding all leagues and associations under pain of high treason, f cancelled sixty-six edicts that had been verified in parliament for imposing taxes, reduced the tailles seven hundred thousand livres, shewed himself in public, and did many things to render himself popular<sup>r</sup>. On the other hand, the Guises entered into a treaty with Spain, by which they undertook to acknowledge the cardinal of Bourbon for king, on the demise of Henry the third, to cause the council of Trent to be received, and to restore Cambray to his Catholic majesty, upon condition that he furnished fifty thousand crowns, or, as some say, pistoles a month, for carrying on the war against the Hugonots. This treaty, which was negotiated with great secrecy A. D. 1584. at Joinville, was concluded the very last day of this year<sup>s</sup>.

It was of great consequence to the Guises and their faction to have the approbation of the pope, to whom they sent father Claude Mathieu so often, that he acquired the name of the courier of Rome. The answers he brought were not so full as they expected. The pontif approved taking up arms in support of the Catholic cause : but condemned any attempt upon the person of the king<sup>1</sup>. The states of the Low Countries, finding their affairs growing daily worse and worse, offered their sovereignty to Henry the third, without restriction or reserve, which he thought fit to decline<sup>2</sup> : but, because he had admitted the deputies into his presence, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Spanish ambassador to prevent it, the emissaries of the Catholic king forced the duke of Guise and his party to declare before they had assembled a proper strength. All they could do was to carry the cardinal of Bourbon to Peronne ; and being there in safety, they published a manifesto in his name, as first prince of the blood, and presumptive heir of the crown, in which they made a most dreadful picture of the state of public affairs ; and, by a mixture of truth and falsehood, exposed the king's conduct in such a manner as was most likely to render him both odious and contemptible to his subjects<sup>3</sup>. The duke of Guise took the field with between four and five thousand men, with which he surprized Verdun, but failed in a design upon Metz, thro' the care of the duke of Epernon<sup>4</sup>. An attempt was made upon Bordeaux, which was rendered abortive by marshal Matignon, who secured that city for the king. Marseilles was seized by the league, but recovered next day by the royalists, who ventured to try, condemn, and execute the principal conspirators. This was supported by an arret of the parliament of Aix, which declared all who took up arms without the king's authority disturbers of the public peace, notwithstanding which, the city and citadel of Lyons was surprized by the faction<sup>5</sup>. If the king had followed the advice of marshal d'Aumont, had put himself in arms, and shewn a spirit worthy of a monarch, he might easily have dispersed the forces of the league, and obliged the duke of Guise to quit the kingdom. But the queen-mother had, in a great measure, regained her influence, as appeared by the king's publishing a feeble apology for his own conduct, at the close of which he invited his subjects, now in arms, to return to their duty, promising them pardon, and, which was more extraordinary, favour<sup>6</sup>. She went afterwards to Rheims, to meet the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Bourbon, received from them an insolent memorial, in which they demanded that the king should oblige the Protestants to restore the cautionary towns they held, renounce the protection at Geneva, give them a multitude of strong places, money to pay their troops, and annul all the edicts that had been given in favour of the Protestants. In the beginning of July a peace was concluded upon these terms ; and on the eighteenth of the same month an edict was published to confirm it<sup>7</sup>. A deputation soon after was sent, at the desire of the leaguers, to invite the king of Navarre to return to the Catholic church. The intention of Henry the third was to gain time, whereas the Guises aimed at rendering that prince more and more odious, and consequently more irreconcilable to the Papists. Marshal Montmorency declared himself head of a third party, composed of such as should remain firm to the constitution in church and state<sup>8</sup>.

THE edict, which gave the royal sanction to the peace, was dated from Nemours ; and when the king of Navarre first read it, it threw him into so great a consternation, that leaning his head upon his arm for some time, buried in thought, he found afterwards that the mustachio on that side of his lip was turned white, a circumstance which the historian, who records it, affirms he received from the mouth of the king himself<sup>9</sup>. How much soever it affected his mind, it did not in the least abate his courage, or hinder his acting with equal prudence and spirit upon every occasion. As for the unfortunate Henry the third, he went to Paris to demand a kind of benevolence from his subjects for carrying on a war, which, in his heart, he disapproved. His capital was, properly speaking no longer his ; a burgher, whose name was Rocheblon, had framed a scheme of a particular league in that city ; and, that he might keep up a correspondence amongst his party, and know the strength of it the better, he fixed an intercourse with sixteen persons in the different parts of Paris, which expedient was so highly approved by the duke of Guise, that, in a little time, they assumed the title of, the council of sixteen ; became formidable to the king and kingdom ; and, so long as history lasts, their memories will be odious to the sober and rational part of mankind<sup>10</sup>. By these new rulers, or, at least, by those under their influence, a considerable sum was raised for the service of the Holy league, for suppressing heresy, hypocrisy, and tyranny ; the first was levelled against the king of Navarre, and the two last against Henry the third. Sixtus the fifth, who by this time was raised to the pontifical throne on the demise of Gregory the thirteenth, disapproved his predecessor's conduct, who had countenanced the league, and struck out one more extraordinary of his own. He pitied the cardinal of Bourbon as a weak, honest, infatuated man, and treated his associates as they

- a deserved: he foresaw and foretold all the mischiefs that afterwards happened; and, as if he meant to fulfil his own prophecy, he gave the duke of Nevers a bull, by which he excommunicated such as took up arms against the king; and in the beginning of September published another, by which he not only excommunicated the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, but in the most haughty manner, and with the most contemptuous language, declared them fallen from their dignities, and incapable of any kind of succession<sup>e</sup>. This bull made a prodigious noise, but was far from having all the effect that it was supposed it must produce. The wiser and better sort of Catholics, more especially such as were versed in the history and the laws of their country, looked upon this in a proper light, and as a most unbounded stretch of papal authority, which induced numbers to repair to marshal Montmorency, as the Protestants every where resorted to the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, and Mr. de Lesdiguières<sup>f</sup>. It was indeed time; for, on the fifteenth of October, the king, by an edict, commanded all his subjects to return to the old religion in fourteen days, on pain of forfeiting their goods and chattels, which was rigorously<sup>g</sup> executed. The king of Navarre made reprisals in his dominions, published his appeal from the pope's bull to the peers of France, in what regarded the state; to a general council in reference to religion, to which he summoned the pope, on pain of being taken for Anti-Christ; and this appeal he caused to be posted up in the most public places of Rome. The war began now on all sides, with no considerable advantage to either party, except that the prince of Condé miscarried in an attempt to relieve Angiers, was forced to disperse his troops, and, with some difficulty, made his escape into England<sup>h</sup>.

The king of Navarre excommunicated by the pope; and a schism commenced against the Protestants.

- As soon as the season would permit, the king had five armies in the field, the generals of which commanded according to their own notions, and with different views; the duke of Mayenne, with the most numerous, acted in Guienne, with the sincerest intention of extirpating the Hugonots, and, if possible, destroying the king of Navarre. Marshal Matignon commanded another in the neighbourhood of Bordeaux; his design was to serve his master, and he apprehended that the best way to do this was to spill as little of his subjects blood as possible. He went, when invited, to the assistance of the duke of Mayenne, but they quickly quarrelled to such a degree, that neither of them did much; and the former, by affecting to hunt the king of Navarre, who had not the force requisite to oppose a royal army, ruined his own. Once indeed, through the king's imprudence in visiting a mistress, he was very near becoming master of his person, but, either by a brisk march, or through the connivance of one of the duke's officers, the king made his escape<sup>i</sup>; the duke de Epemon commanded the third in Provence and Dauphine, where he acted solely for the king's service, and kept both the Protestants and the leaguers in<sup>k</sup> awe; the duke of Guise was with a small army in Champagne and Burgundy, with which he did more than all the rest; Foyense ruined a good corps of troops he had, in reducing several small fortresses not worth taking, by which the king was convinced that he had deserted his service to make his court to the league. The duke of Mayenne returned from the army, making loud complaints that he was ill supplied, that his projects were rejected, and that his troops were dissipated for want of pay. The king upon this went to the parliament, and held his court of justice in the month of June, where he forced them to register twenty-six oppressive edicts; but at the same time caused the people to be informed, that the money was not for his service, or the edicts of his contrivance; but that they were indebted for the necessity, and for the means of supplying it to the league<sup>l</sup>: the prince of Condé, having received a powerful supply from the queen of England, carried on the war in Xaintonge with vigour and success; the king of Navarre went thither, and to please the Rochellers, exposed himself very much in an enterprize, which, if he had thoroughly considered, would not certainly have appeared worthy of the pains he took, and the hazard he ran. It was against Brouage, not with an intent of becoming master of it, but in order to spoil the port, which interfered with the commerce of Rockelle, which he accomplished<sup>m</sup>.
- f The prince of Condé gained another great advantage by his marrying a princess of the house of la Trimouille, by which he gained the duke, her brother, tho' their father had been the head of the league in Poitou, to the Protestant religion, and to the support of that cause in which he was embarked<sup>n</sup>. Marshal Biron was sent to restore affairs on this side, which he did very effectually, for the Protestants suffered him to take several places where he had cantoned his troops, and kept the leaguers at a distance. An accident happened about this time at Aix, which deserves notice. The chevalier d'Angoulesme, grand prior of France, had long hated Altoviti, an Italian gentleman in the king's service, and seeing him in a house over-against that in which he was, crossed the way, ran up, and, with many injurious expressions, ran him through the body. Altoviti, finding himself mortally wounded, drew his dagger, closed with him, and struck him into the belly ; of these wounds they both died in a few <sup>a</sup> hours. The chevalier was of the council that contrived, and was himself one of the busiest actors in the bloody scene of St. Bartholomew <sup>o</sup> : the king gave the government of France to the duke of Epernon, and the post of grand prior to his nephew, the natural son of Charles the ninth <sup>p</sup>.

THE powers of the north, and the chief of the German princes of the Protestant religion, in consequence of the king of Navarre's solicitations, who, at the breaking out of the war, had sent Pardaillan to solicit assistance, sent a solemn embassy to intreat the king to restore his Protestant subjects to his favour, and to leave them in possession of the liberties that had been formerly granted them by the edicts of pacification. The king delayed their audience as long as he could, and sent them away at last with a rough answer, importing, that as he did not meddle with their religious differences, he knew not what pretence they had to interfere between him and his subjects <sup>q</sup>. This was done to gratify the league. In the mean time the king, who foresaw that this would bring new troubles upon his subjects, employed his mother, who had a passion for negociating, to treat with the king of Navarre. She carried with her the duke of Nevers and marshal Biron, to assist her with their counsels ; and she also had in her train abundance of young beauties, who did not serve her so effectually as in times <sup>r</sup> past. The king of Navarre had a due sense of the importance of this conjuncture, and the prince of Condé was lately married. She had no power to grant a toleration ; they would not so much as hear of a peace without ; so that the conferences ended in a truce for a few months <sup>s</sup>. On this occasion the baron de Rosni, the king of Navarre's minister, coming to court, Henry <sup>c</sup> the third told him, he would consent to his master's taking twenty thousand Swiss into his pay, provided that, at a proper time, he would suffer them to pass into his service against the league <sup>t</sup>. The marshal de Montmorency continued supreme in Languedoc, at the head of the politiques. His situation was the most extraordinary that perhaps the world ever saw ; the king understood and approved his conduct, though, in appearance, a revolt. He was highly considered by the king of Navarre, who depended upon him, in case of the king's death : he drew immense subsidies from the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy, had great regards paid him at Rome, because he stiled the Protestants heretics, at the same time that he made no scruple of treating the leaguers like rebels <sup>u</sup>.

THE troubles of the queen of Scots were finished in the beginning of this year by a violent <sup>d</sup> death on a scaffold. Her being descended by the mother's side from the house of Guise was the source of all her misfortunes. The king sent over Bellievre to solicit for her, which he did at least in public ; but the adherence to the league in those days, and some private memoirs since, have insinuated, that the king and his mother were not displeased with her death ; and perhaps, hinted to queen Elizabeth, that it was the only way to enjoy peace <sup>w</sup>. The duke of Mayenne, under colour of chagrin, remained at Paris, where, in conjunction with the sixteen, he took every measure to render the king odious, and to impute to him solely the miseries the nation endured : at length he went so far as to concert with them the means of drawing him thither, securing his person, and sending him prisoner to the duke of Guise, all which the king discovered and disappointed, but did not think it prudent to punish, being <sup>e</sup> content to tell the duke of Mayenne, who found it necessary to shift his quarters when he came to take his leave, that he did ill to abandon the good leaguers of Paris <sup>x</sup>. The army of the protestant league, under the nominal command of duke Casimir, was assembling in Alsace, and though it is no where said to have been above twenty thousand men, he struck the whole kingdom of France with terror. The king took the best measures he could to render this invasion fruitless, while the emissaries of the league constantly gave out that they were invited by him, and that he acted in concert with them <sup>y</sup>. The duke of Guise, who had an interview with him at Meaux, uttered all the suspicions, and all the scurrilities of his party to his face ; which the king supported and answered with great patience <sup>z</sup>. At length he determined to form three armies ; the command of the first he gave to the duke of Guise, the second to the duke of Epernon, the third he reserved for himself ; and these were so disposed, that the duke of Guise was to act in conjunction with the troops of the duke of Lorraine ; the duke of Epernon was to prevent their taking any strong places in their march ; the king, with the best army of the three, undertook to hinder their passing the Loire <sup>a</sup>.

ALTHOUGH he brought them upon himself, and was therefore the less to be pitied, yet the king's circumstances at this time were very hard. If the protestant army passed the Loire, and joined the king of Navarre, he was afraid of lying at the mercy of the Hugonots ;

- a on the other hand, if they were beaten and destroyed, he was in no less danger from the league. In so critical a situation, his behaviour shewed how much he had been to blame; ever since the crown had been placed upon his head. He took his measures in his cabinet with much prudence, he acted in the field with spirit, he managed every incident with great dexterity, and extricated himself from these embarrassments, better than even his best friends expected. Besides the armies, the destination of which we have already mentioned, the king formed another, under the marshal Joyeuse, which was to act against the king of Navarre, in order to prevent his marching to join his allies <sup>b</sup>. At the beginning of August the Germans passed the Rhine, wasted Lorraine with an army of thirty-five thousand men, for it was grown to this by the addition of the Swiss, the French troops, and those of the duke of Bouillon.
- b The duke de Joyeuse, who was superior in number to the army of the king of Navarre, surrounded by a multitude of nobility, who thought that nothing could resist them, and that no punishment was too great for those that did, marched directly towards the king, who had under him the prince of Condé and the count of Soissons. On the 20th of October the two armies engaged at Coutras, where the king gained a complete victory; the duke de Joyeuse, with four hundred gentlemen, being slain upon the spot, with near five thousand private men. This was the first victory the protestants ever gained, and it was solely attributed to the king of Navarre, who commanded like a great general, and fought like a gallant soldier <sup>c</sup>. But he made no use of this important victory; for, instead of marching to meet his allies, he dispersed his troops, and went to visit his mistress, for which a great writer could find no other excuse, than suggesting it was the last fault he committed of that kind <sup>d</sup>. It was however fatal to his confederates, who, after two disastrous disputes with the duke of Guise, finding it impossible to pass the king's army, began to listen to the proposals that were made them. In November the Swiss accepted four hundred thousand crowns, and retired; and in December the German horse made a treaty of the like kind <sup>e</sup>. The leaguers of Paris magnified the duke of Guise's success, which, in reality, was due to the king's precaution. The use they made of his exaggerated reputation, was to procure from a secret assembly of the young doctors of the Sorbonne, a resolution, that princes, who behaved otherwise than they ought, might be removed from the government, as a tutor, who is suspected, may by the civil law be deprived of the administration of his pupil's effects. The king being informed of this, sent for them to the Louvre, where he reprimanded them severely, and threatened to leave them to the justice of his parliament; but impunity encouraged them more than any sense of shame could disturb them from this public reproof <sup>f</sup>.

Resolution of the Sorbonne, with respect to bad princes A.D. 1587.

- WE come now to that important year in which the troubles of France came to their first crisis. The death of the duke of Bouillon, who left an only daughter under the tutelage of the king of Navarre and other princes of the blood, but under the immediate care of the famous Mr. de la Noue, attracted the attention of the house of Lorraine, who, from the vicinity and importance of her estates, were determined to annex them to their own <sup>g</sup>. This occasioned their drawing the duke of Guise and his principal partizans, where they consulted of that enterprize, as well as of the affairs of France. In respect to the latter, they determined on an insolent memorial, consisting of eleven articles, in which they prescribed to the king, upon what terms they were content to leave him that title. In the first place, he was to declare himself openly for the league; next, he was to receive the council of Trent; he was also to establish the inquisition in all the great cities in France; no quarter was to be given to any heretic prisoner, unless he renounced his religion; the king was to remove all his own friends, and to replace them by those in whom they could confide. The rest were of the same nature or worse <sup>h</sup>. The king could not help shewing some emotion at reading them, but quickly recovered himself, and promised to consider them <sup>i</sup>. The duke of Guise came to Soissons, and from thence transmitted his instructions to the sixteen, who, by his orders, provided arms and every thing necessary for a general revolt; to facilitate which, he sent many officers and gentlemen, on whose courage he could depend, to disperse themselves through the city. The king had a faithful spy, whose name was Poulain, from whom he received exact intelligence of every step they took, and of every place in which they met. He might have seized the whole sixteen at once, and intended it, but suffered himself to be dissuaded from it by the queen-mother and Villequier, who betrayed him <sup>k</sup>. He did worse; for he sent for the president de Neuilly, who was one of the sixteen, reprimanded him for his seditious practices, and threatened to put him and his associates to death, which rendered them in a manner desperate <sup>l</sup>. But the king thought he sufficiently provided for his safety, by forbidding the duke of Guise to come to Paris. His sister, the duchess of Moutpensier,<sup>a</sup> laid a scheme for seizing the king as he went to take the air, and sending him to Soissons, which had certainly taken effect, if Poulain had not given the king notice of it, a few hours before it was put in execution<sup>m</sup>.

On the 9th of May the duke of Guise, contrary to the king's express command, came to Paris, and desired the queen-mother to introduce him to the king. The king consented to it the next day, with a full intention to have had him stabbed in his presence, from which he was dissuaded by his mother and Villequier<sup>n</sup>. As the duke went to the Louvre, he was attended by persons of all ranks, who cried aloud, "Long live the duke of Guise, the defender of the church, the protector of the Catholic religion, and the Saviour of Paris." He returned safe from this audience: but he read so much of the king's disposition in his eyes, that he was sufficiently sensible of his danger<sup>o</sup>. The same day the king ordered all strangers to depart Paris; but finding he was not obeyed, he ordered four thousand Swiss, and two thousand French infantry to enter the city next morning, which they did; but, not having orders to fire, the scholars of the university and the populace quickly barricaded the streets, and, by taking themselves to arms, obliged a great part of the guards to submit, and, in a manner, blocked the king up in the Louvre<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Guise amused the queen-mother all the time, who went to his lodging on foot to persuade him to withdraw, till he understood in what posture things were; and then he told her roundly, that he would not abandon the good people of Paris to the king and his evil counsellors. This happened on the 12th of May, filed from thence, by the French, the day of the barricades<sup>q</sup>. The next morning the queen-mother came to the duke again to make propositions of peace, and entertained him till a person came and whispered him that the king had made his escape, upon which he cried out, "Madam, you have amused and undone me!" The king, at the time he quitted Paris, which he did with great difficulty and danger, said, with an air of indignation, looking back upon it, I will never enter those walls again, but thro' a breach. In the height of this confusion, the duke of Guise sent a person of distinction to the English minister, Sir Edward Stafford, to offer him a safe-guard. Sir Edward received the person very politely; told him, if he had been there in a private capacity, he should have accepted the duke's offer with gratitude and thanks; but in the character of the queen's ambassador in the capital of the French dominions, he would accept of no safe-guard, but from the king. He added, that he would make a true report to his mistress of what his eyes had seen; for which behaviour he is highly and justly commended by the French writers<sup>r</sup>. The duke, to shew his great power, soon restored the tranquility of Paris, and, to maintain it, changed all the magistrates whom he suspected, seized the Bastile, and disposed of every thing at pleasure.

THE king retired first to Chartres, taking no sleep in his passage, but in his boots; from thence he published a manifesto, to inform his subjects of what had passed at Paris, which was followed by manifestoes on the part of the Guises, on which several great towns and provinces declared, some on one side, and some on the other<sup>s</sup>. The queen-mother followed the king to Chartres, attended by the deputies from Paris, who came to demand pardon for what had passed; the parliament also sent a deputation, and were well received by the king, who told them at their departure, that he was content to pardon the people of Paris; but that they would do well to change their conduct, and not oblige him to withdraw his presence, his courts of justice, and other marks of favour, with which his predecessors had honoured them, and to which they owed that affluence they had so much<sup>t</sup> abused. The parliament did their duty in this respect with so much dignity and spirit, that it made a very strong impression on the Parisians, which the duke of Guise perceiving, resolved to finish the treaty of peace without<sup>u</sup> delay. The king was gone to Rouen, where the accommodation was quickly concluded, in ten articles, that differed little from the eleven which had been before sent him from Nancy; the last of them contained a general amnesty for what was<sup>v</sup> passed. The appearance of the grand Spanish armada on the coast of Bretagne contributed not a little to influence the king's resolutions. On the 18th of June, the edict of pacification was published, and a general assembly of the states called to meet in the September following at Blois<sup>w</sup>. On the 4th of July appeared a new edict for the re-union of all the king's subjects to the Catholic religion; and the king having now, in all probability, taken his final determination, tho' some think he was ever governed by events, and took no measure but expedients, changed his conduct entirely, received into high favour the chiefs of the league. He made no scruple of declaring the cardinal of Bourbon first prince of the blood, constituted the duke of Guise

- a lieutenant-general of his armies throughout the kingdom, with powers little, if at all, inferior to those of the constable <sup>2</sup>. What gave still greater satisfaction was, his taking the government of Normandy from the duke of Epernon, and giving it to the duke of Montpensier, the former being at the same time dismissed the court <sup>a</sup>. From Rouen the king went back again to Chartres, without taking Paris in his way, tho' he was extremely pressed to it. The duke of Guise followed him to Chartres <sup>b</sup>, and was received with such high marks of favour, that people in general looked upon the reconciliation as sincere, more especially as the king spoke of nothing but the security of the Catholic religion, and the conversion or extermination of his Protestant subjects. The queen-mother was remarkably kind to the duke of Guise, which was supposed to proceed from her desire of transferring the crown to her grandson the marquis of Pontamousson. But, from whatever it proceeded, the duke of Guise seemed to be entirely satisfied, and received from her so many and so strong marks of confidence, that he relied upon her entirely <sup>c</sup>.

- At this time it is very difficult to form a just notion of the state of France, where, from the number of governors and want of obedience, there was, in effect, thro' the greatest part of the realm, no government at all. The king himself was of so mutable, so irresolute a temper, so much in the hands of his mother and her creatures, or they took upon them to use his name and authority with so little ceremony, tho' without his knowledge, that they made him act, at least in appearance, against his own interest, and for the destruction of his best friends. It was under some delusion of this sort, that the queen-mother and Villeroy, who hated the duke of Epernon, sent the king's orders to the chief magistrate of Angoulême, to drive out the duke de Epernon, who had seized that place for his service. In consequence of this command, however obtained, a bold attempt was made to murder the duke, which he prevented by his intrepid behaviour, and afterwards defended the castle with a few of his domestics, where they were thirty hours without food, 'till he was relieved <sup>d</sup>. His brother, the duke de la Valette, seeing what turn things were like to take, made a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Lesdiguières, as if they had been sovereigns <sup>e</sup>. The marshal de Montmorency was really so in his government, where he levied money and troops as he thought fit, and by doing strict justice, and living in a princely manner upon his own fortune, he maintained the public tranquillity and every thing in exact order <sup>f</sup>. The duke of Savoy, after offering his assistance to the king, the duke de Guise, and Mr. de Lesdiguières, provided he might have the marquisate of Saluces for his pains, finding his offers rejected on every side, made himself master of the best part of that country, and amongst the rest, of the strong fortress of Carmagnoles <sup>g</sup>, in which were four hundred pieces of cannon, with military stores sufficient to have enabled the king to reduce his rebellious subjects, if they had been properly employed. As for Paris, it was entirely devoted to the duke of Guise, who put it under the direction of the sixteen <sup>h</sup>, supported by an infinite number of his friends, that is, of such as were desirous of rising at any rate; for, in conjunctures like this, such as have nothing to lose are in the fairest way of making their fortunes. The king, stript of his friends, surrounded by his enemies, without force, and without allies, had occasion enough, though little opportunity, to contemplate his ruined condition, and that labyrinth of difficulties into which his indolence and his luxury had brought him. He gathered, however, courage (a sure proof he had parts) from the prospect of danger.

- On the first of September the king arrived at Blois, where the first step he took was very extraordinary, which was sending orders to the chancellor Chiverni, Bellievre, sur-intendant of the finances, Brulart, Villeroy, and Pinart, secretary of state, to retire to their houses, and meddle no farther with public affairs <sup>i</sup>. The seals were given to Montholon, an advocate of Paris, a zealous Catholic, a man of honour, but very inexpert in affairs of state <sup>k</sup>. From this time the queen-mother lost the confidence of her son, he was ashamed of the concessions he had made, he was provoked by the pope's letter (Sixtus the fifth was now on the papal throne) to the duke of Guise, and the cardinal de Bourbon, in which he stiled them Maccabees; and he was well informed of the true design of the league, which was to thrust him into a convent, and to place the duke of Guise, or some other prince of the house of Lorraine, upon the throne. He likewise knew that the queen-mother was embarked or at least not unacquainted with these projects, in hopes of having the government under the name of the young prince Henry of Lorraine, her grandson <sup>l</sup>. The meeting of the states was very full, the clergy were represented by one hundred thirty-four deputies, amongst which were four archbishops, and twenty-one bishops; they chose for their speakers the cardinals of Bourbon and de Guise ; those of the nobility were one hundred and eighty, their speakers were the count de Brisac, and the baron de Magnac ; the deputies of the third estate were one hundred ninety-one, and at their head was La Chapelle Marteau, provost of the merchants at Paris, all of them zealous leaguers, which sufficiently shewed the complexion of the <sup>m</sup> assembly.

Opens the assembly of the states with a bold speech.

THE king opened the states on the 16th of October, with a very wise and weighty speech, which he delivered with much grace and dignity ; he professed himself a zealous Catholic, assured them of his willingness to contribute to the utmost of his power to secure and to promote the established religion, and advised the making it a fundamental law, that none but Catholics should be capable of the succession : he added, that, in his judgment, as all leagues and alliances with foreign princes, under pretence of religion, were needless, so in their nature and consequences, when without the consent of the sovereign, they were acts of high treason : “ I know, said he, that some great men have given their countenance to things of this kind ; but, from my accustomed clemency, I am willing to overlook what is past <sup>n</sup>.” The duke of Guise and the cardinal changed colour at these words, and they obliged the king to soften his harangue before it was printed. He was likewise compelled to swear to the edict of re-union, and to confirm his reconciliation with the duke of Guise, by receiving with him, at the same altar, the same host <sup>o</sup>. Notwithstanding this, he quickly discerned that his own safety and the duke’s views were utterly incompatible. He discovered, though he made a shew of the contrary, that the duke held secret intelligence with the duke of Savoy ; he found that he had a superior interest in the states, who pressed to have the king of Navarre, by name, declared incapable of the succession ; he perceived that they were bent upon limiting his authority ; and some of the princes of the house of Lorraine declared to him privately, that they disapproved the duke of Guise’s conduct and designs. But what moved him most was, an insolent speech of the duchess dowager of Montpensier, sister to the duke, who, shewing a pair of gold scissors which she wore at her girdle, said, the best use she could make of them was, to clip the hair of a prince unworthy to sit on the French throne, in order to qualify him for a monastery, while a worthier person mounted it in his stead, capable of repairing the losses which religion and the state had suffered through the cowardice of his predecessor <sup>p</sup>. He determined, therefore, to rid himself of the duke, some way or other.

Concerts with a few faithful friends the means for carrying his design into execution.

In this sad perplexity he summoned a council of his friends, and a better picture of his condition cannot be given than the naming them. They were no more than marshal D’Aumont, Nicholas d’Angennes, Sieur de Rambouillet, and Beauvas Nangis. These were all he could trust with his distress ; and to them he explained the apprehensions he was under from the duke of Guise, and the new project that prince had formed of forcing him, by means of the states, to make him constable <sup>q</sup>. They desired a day to consider of it, and by the king’s command, at their next meeting, Lewis d’Angennes, the brother of Nicholas, was present. Marshal D’Aumont advised the arresting the princes of the house of Lorraine, and forming their process. All the rest were clear that this was impossible. The king himself said, the stag would be too strong for the toils. It was then resolved to put him to death ; and the king would have confided the execution to Crillon, who commanded his guards ; but he answered, “ That his rank and services rendered him unfit to be hangman ;” adding, “ I will draw my sword fairly upon the duke ; and if he does not kill me, I will kill him, as becomes your majesty’s servant <sup>r</sup>.” The king did not take this at all amiss ; he then addressed himself to Loignac, the first gentleman of his bed-chamber, who accepted it without difficulty. The king had about him a guard of Gascons, recommended by the duke de Epemon, which, from their number, were stiled the forty-five <sup>s</sup>, all determined men, who hated the duke of Guise personally, because, under colour of saving, he was for dismissing them. Out of these the king chose nine for the execution. He was also forced to intrust his secret with Ornano Bonnivet, La Grange-Montigni, and D’Entraques, to whom he gave his orders. Larchant, who commanded the company of guards on duty, was directed to summon the duke to council, in the evening of the 22d of December ; and after he had delivered his message from the king, that the council was to be held early the next morning, that all pressing affairs might be dispatched before Christmas, he pressed him, as from himself, for the pay of his men, who, he said, were so distressed, that they were on the point of disbanding. The duke giving him fair words, he desired leave to communicate them to his troop, and that he might be permitted to put a petition into his hand as he went to council in the morning, which the duke readily granted <sup>t</sup>. All these previous steps could not be taken without creating some jealousy, and, if the duke did not escape his fate, it was not for want of warning. That very day he had a note put under his plate at dinner, in which were these words, Beware, they are about to do you an ill turn. The duke, when he read it, took his pencil and wrote, They dare not ;

a folded it up, and threw it under the table". He had himself some apprehensions, but he thought he was too far advanced to go back. Besides, the archbishop of Lyons, who had in view a hat from Rome by his interest, prevailed upon him to let the two armies of the league be commanded by the dukes of Mayenne and Nevers, and to execute his own office of great master of the household, with all the authority of the old mayors of the palace; and for that reason, to keep always close to the person of the king.

ON the twenty-third of December, early in the morning, the king having his four friends in his cabinet, ordered Loignac to introduce the nine guards, and to bring as many poniards; he then made a discourse on the business in hand, and concluded it with these words, "It is an execution of justice, which I command you to make on the greatest criminal in my kingdom, whom all laws human and divine permit me to punish; but, not having the ordinary methods of justice in my power, I authorize you to do it, by the right inherent to my royal authority." He then disposed them in the passage which led from his chamber to his cabinet, into which he retired with the four persons before mentioned". The council assembled early, consisting of the cardinals of Vendosme and Gondi, the marshals D'Aumont and Rhetz, the sieurs Rambouillet and d'O. The cardinal of Guise, and the archbishop of Lyons, came afterwards; last of all came the duke, who found, at the door of his apartment, as he came out, the guards disposed in two lines; and before he had time to reflect, Larchant presented the petition, which accounted so well for their appearance, that he went on without suspicion". When he had ascended the stairs, leaving all his equipage below, he came into the anti-chamber, where the council sat; he found himself faint, and sent to the king's valet de chambre for some plumbs, and a handkerchief, to wipe his eyes, which watered". About eight o'clock the secretary of state came to inform him, the king desired to speak to him in his cabinet. He went through the gallery that led into the chamber, the door of which, as usual, was shut after him. He then turned to the left, and as he lifted up the tapestry that hung before the passage that led to the cabinet, he received six poniards at once into his breast, on which he cried out, My God, have mercy upon me", fetching so deep a groan, that it was heard into the anti-chamber. The cardinal of Guise and the archbishop of Lyons rose and ran to the gallery, where the guards presented their halberts. They were immediately arrested by the marshals D'Aumont and Rhetz, and conducted to a room in the upper part of the castle". The lords and great men being admitted into the anti-chamber, the king presently entered it, and addressing himself to the cardinal of Vendosme, said, "I am now a monarch, and by what has been executed by my orders, those who, under the specious pretence of religion, shall hereafter trouble the state, may learn what they have to expect." He then went to the queen-mother's apartment, who occupied the first floor of the castle, and entering her chamber, for she was indisposed, he said, "I am now a king, madam, and have no companion, the duke of Guise is dead." She, without approving or blaming the action, contented herself with asking him if he had considered well what consequences might attend it. "I have, madam," replied he, "and have given proper orders." "I hope so," returned the queen, "and that it may prove to your advantage". This agrees with what most writers affirm, that she was totally unacquainted with the king's design; and yet this is a matter very far from being certain (M).

(M) The French historians in general, and even most of their private memoirs, agree, that the death of the duke of Guise, and the measures requisite to bring it about, were entirely without the queen-mother's concurrence and consent. But, however, there is a very curious and distinct relation of this affair, penned by one who is on all hands allowed to have had as large a share in the king's confidence as any who were about him. This was his physician Miron, whose relation is yet extant, in a work little regarded, and yet not easy to be found (1). He is very distinct and precise in every thing that he says, and, in particular, tells us, with respect to that of which we are speaking, that on the 10th of November the queen-mother, having received letters from the duchess of Aumale, she sent to the king to desire that he would come to her, or at least send somebody that he could trust; upon which the king sent the author of this relation to his mother, from whom he received this message: "Tell the king, my son, that I desire he will take the trouble to come down into my cabinet, because I have something to say to him, which regards his life, his honour, and his dignity." He delivered his message accordingly to Henry, who presently called one of his favourites, and went with him and his physician down to the queen's apartment. Soon after they entered, the king and his mother went together into a large window, while the two persons the king brought with him retired to the other end of the cabinet; they heard, therefore, nothing of what passed; but, at parting, the queen said aloud, "My son, in this case dispatch is necessary, you have lost too much time already; but give your orders now in such a manner, that you may not be deceived again as you were at the barricades

(1) This curious piece, from the MSS. of Messieurs Du Puy, is printed in the Histoire generale des Cardinaux, par Aubery, Paris, 1649, 4to. tom. v. p. 551.

Many of his confederates arrested, and his brother the cardinal put to death.

IN obedience to the king's orders, they arrested in the castle the dukes of Elbauf and Nemours, the cardinal de Bourbon, the prince de Joinville, and Anne d'Et, the former the son, the latter the mother of the duke of Guise, and also of the duke of Nemours. Francis du Pleffis de Richelieu, grand provost, with his archers, seized the president de Neuilli, Chappelle-Marteau, Compan, and Cotteblanche, deputies from the city of Paris; together with Vincent le Roi, lieutenant-general of Amiens. Urbain de Laval Bois-Dauphin, and the count de Brisac, both of whom became afterwards marshals of France, were confined in their own houses; Pericard, secretary to the duke of Guise, was seized with all his papers<sup>c</sup>. The next day the cardinal de Guise was brought from the place of his confinement by a serjeant and three of the guards, to be examined; but, in going through a dark passage, by the orders of du Guast, who was captain of the guards, they dispatched him with their halberds<sup>d</sup>. He was more violent than his brother, and, amongst other insolent speeches, had given out, that he would hold the king's head between his knees, till the tonsure was performed at the capuchins<sup>e</sup>. The bodies of both the brothers were burnt to ashes, and those scattered by the winds, to prevent their faction from abusing them as relicks. The king endeavoured also to seize the dukes de Mercœur and Mayenne; but they had so good intelligence, that they made their escape, as the duke of Nemours did soon after. On the first news of the duke's death at Paris, the people were extremely surprized; but, as soon as they were informed that Orleans and some other places had declared in favour of the league, they began to recover their spirits, took all the precautions possible for the security of the place, and throwing off all respect to the king, stiled him openly, tyrant, apostate, hangman, traitor, and whatever else their brutal malice could suggest; breaking his statues, tearing his pictures, and demolishing his arms in every public place where they had been fixed during his reign<sup>f</sup>.

A. D. 1588.

THE queen-mother, sick as she was, caused herself to be carried to the place where the cardinal de Bourbon was confined, who no sooner saw her, than he cried out, Madam, this is one of your contrivances, and by your arts we have been all brought here to have our throats cut. The queen answered, with one of those execrations which were then common, that she was entirely ignorant of the matter<sup>g</sup>. This conversation made so strong an impression on her mind, that it is supposed to have hastened her death, which happened on the 5th of January,

"of Paris." The king being thus, in this writer's opinion, confirmed in the project he had formed of delivering himself from the duke, went about it in a very extraordinary manner. He seemed to give himself more up than ever to devotion, and as a proof of it, ordered cells or little apartments to be prepared over his own for certain capuchin friars, became every day more indolent and inattentive to his affairs, dropping from time to time hints, that he would devolve the weight of the government upon the queen-mother and the duke of Guise, in order to occupy himself entirely in matters of religion. This had precisely the effect he intended, for the cardinal of Guise and the archbishop of Lyons, looked upon him as a poor thoughtless doating creature, intent only on qualifying himself for a monastery, into which they intended to thrust him. This had two consequences. It afforded him the means of taking all his measures without suspicion, and prompted them to such open acts of insolence, as best served to justify the action for which he was preparing. These cells, instead of capuchins, were intended for his guard of forty-five at the critical juncture, when he should stand in need of their service. He prosecuted this plan coolly and steadily, to the very last. He caused a journal of the week to be settled, and signed in council on the preceding Saturday. On the Monday the king was to do so and so, on the Tuesday so, on the Friday, which was the day the duke was killed, he was to go to our lady of Clery, to perform his devotions. This strange behaviour, at so critical a season, equally amazed the faction who sought his ruin, and his friends who thought the king absolutely infatuated. But it was the pretence of this journey that furnished him with the means of making the last preparations for the tragedy without suspicion. On the Thursday the duke of Guise pushed the provocations he had given the king farther than he had ever done, by complaining of his causeless jealousies and suspicions; and insinuating peremptorily on resigning his high office of lieutenant-general, notwithstanding all the condescension the king could employ in order to prevail upon him to keep it. The duke knew that things were at a crisis, and thought there was but one step more to take, which some say was to seize his master's person, and to carry him to Paris, in order to dispose of him there as he thought fit (2). At least, this is conceived to be that plot of which the king was apprised by the queen-mother. On the other hand, this monarch took the resignation as flowing from a contempt of his authority, being persuaded that the duke intended to receive either the same post, or the office of constable from the states, as disdaining to hold it from the favour or so much as with the content of the king (3). This kept him steady to his resolution, and it was under colour of making a tour to the church of our lady of Clery, that the council was appointed so early in the morning, and the preparations for it served to cover that stir, which the execution of the king's dark design necessarily required (4). If we believe the physician's relation, the queen-mother was the principal author of the duke's death; and yet from a concurrence of circumstances, it seems highly probable that he did not acquaint her with the steps taken to accomplish it, and that she was really very much surprized at the event.

- a in the 70th year of her <sup>h</sup> age (F). The king now flattered himself that affairs would go better in the states; and, to facilitate this, he carried his prisoners to the castle of Amboise, the command of which he gave to du Guast, who by his order had caused the cardinal de Guise to be murdered. He was prevailed upon, however, to release the count de Brisac, and to send all the deputies from Paris, except Chapelle Marteau, together with Vincent le Roi, to that capital, in hopes that, according to their promise, they would endeavour to calm the minds of the people; and contented himself with taking their oaths, that, if they did not succeed, they would return <sup>i</sup>. But in a very little time he found all his expectations vain; the deputies began to retire without his leave from Blois; so that, to save appearances, he was forced to prorogue the states; many of the great cities declared for the league, which was
- b now publicly countenanced by the pope and the king of Spain. But what troubled him most, and gave the greatest wound to his reputation, was the conduct of du Guast, who began to treat with the leaguers for the ransom of his prisoners; and had the assurance, when the king on this intelligence demanded them, to drive a bargain with the king himself, who was forced to give him thirty thousand crowns in ready money for the cardinal de Bourbon, the duke of Elbeuf, and the young duke of Guise <sup>k</sup>. As for the archbishop of Lyons and Chapelle Marteau, he kept them to make his market of elsewhere, and sold them afterwards to the leaguers <sup>l</sup>. If, instead of following the timid counsels of marshal de Rhetz, the king had listened to the advice of marshal D'Aumont and the Sieur de Rambouillet, who advised

(F) This great queen Katherine, the dowager of Henry the second, the mother of Francis the second, Charles the ninth, and Henry the third, kings of France, was born at Florence, April the 13th, 1519 (1). In her person she was rather comely than handsome, more especially in the latter part of her life, when she grew coarse and fat. It is allowed by all parties that she had great natural talents, which were improved by education and exercise; a great capacity, deep penetration, lively wit, and a deep judgment. But what she principally excelled in were the arts of a court; easy, affable, and engaging; magnificent to the highest degree, but without regarding expence; liberal even to profusion; majestic in her deportment, having a great presence of mind, and a wonderful fertility in expedients, even when surrounded with dangers. But her ambition was without bounds, without pity, without natural affection. She thought herself alone born to command, and that obedience was the portion of all the world beside. She created parties, that she might preserve her own power by balancing them; and, to effect this, she sacrificed all principles of religion, and all pretensions to integrity. She sometimes flattered, but oftener persecuted the Protestants. She sided with the house of Guise against the princes, then with the princes against the house of Guise. She was not content with being the mother, but would be also the mistress, that is, the sovereign of kings. She neglected the education of her children in their nonage; she suffered them to be misled in their youth, that she might govern them all their days. It was by this conduct that she became insupportable to Charles the ninth, and suspected by Henry the third. In order to judge of her true character, we ought to consider her favourites and her court. The former were men of intrigue, who discovered their parts in a multitude of inventions for fleecing and impoverishing the people. Abandoned in their manners, violent in their actions, and blindly devoted to her pleasure. As to the ladies who composed the latter, their characters are sufficiently distinguished in history, at the same time that they disgrace it. In short, the age of Katherine de Medicis, for so we may stile the space of upwards of thirty years, in which her genius and example gave the law in France, was a mixture of impurities of every kind. Much of superstition, more of atheism, and, what is its constant companion, an extravagant propensity to magic, splendour without dignity, a policy so refined, as to sap the foundations of government, an affectation of absolute power, that ended in total anarchy, and such a spirit of dissipation as left industry without hope, and almost effaced all sentiments of probity. After a long life spent in luxury, she died, in appearance, of the gout, rendered mortal by a distraction of mind, and an incapacity of bearing that contempt which she saw coming upon her (2). In her last moments she was attended by the king, who expressed that tenderness which was really in his nature, and would have appeared upon other occasions, if she had not corrupted it (3). By her testament the grand duchess of Tuscany and the count d'Auvergne were her heirs (4); but they did not reap any great benefit from thence, since she died eight hundred thousand crowns in debt. She affected to govern to the last, and seemed much fitter for it on her death-bed than through her whole life. I leave you, said she to the king, my last advice; and I intreat that these dying words may be imprinted in your memory, for the good of your state. Love the princes of your blood, and have them always about you; and more especially the king of Navarre. I have found them always faithful to the crown; and they alone have any interest in the succession of the kingdom. Remember also, that, if you would restore that peace which is so necessary to France, you must begin with granting liberty of conscience to your subjects, having observed, that, amongst the Germans, and other sovereign princes of my time, there have been none who, by mere force of arms, have been able to extinguish the troubles excited in their countries on the score of religion (5). Her death was no sooner known at Paris, than the people publicly declared, that if they brought her body thither, in order to inter it in the new tomb which she had built for herself and her husband at St. Denis, they would never suffer it, but either cast it into the common sewer, or into the river (6). The reason of this bitterness was, the persuasion they had that the death of the duke and cardinal de Guise was the effect of her counsel. At Blois she was no sooner dead than she was forgotten; and the king, contrary to his custom, caused her remains to be silently interred; but, more than twenty years after, they were removed to that chapel which she had founded at St. Dennis, and rest there with those of her family (7).

him to recall the army of the duke of Nevers, and to march directly to Paris<sup>m</sup>, he had a probably put an end to the civil war at the very beginning; but the humour of temporizing, which was always fatal to him, prevailed, and gave rise to those troubles which subsisted for so many years, and reduced the monarchy of France to the very brink of ruin, after bringing him by an untimely death to his grave.

In the mean time the leaguers at Paris were reducing rebellion into a system. Seventy doctors of the Sorbonne took upon them to decide that the people were released from their oath to Henry of Valois, and by another decree they were forbid to mention the king in their public prayers; they likewise pronounced it lawful to levy money, and to take up arms<sup>n</sup>. The sixteen, who were, in effect, tribunes of the people, had declared the duke of Aumale governor of Paris, and, in concert with him Buffi le Clerc, a factious attorney, to whom the duke of Guise committed the charge of the Bastile, understanding that the parliament were assembled with intent to send a solemn deputation to the king, went thither, attended by a guard, and carried fifty presidents and counsellors in their robes publicly through the streets, exposed to all the insults of the populace, to his fortress, where he confined them<sup>o</sup>. They then formed a new parliament, at the head of which they placed the president Brissson by force; the Sieur Mole was made attorney general, and threatened with death if he did not accept it. This new parliament, thus constituted, declared the promise made by the deputies to return to Blois, though made upon oath, to be null and void, and also took an oath themselves never to depart from the league, and to revenge the death of the duke and cardinal of Guise. On the arrival of the duke of Mayenne, the council of union, which was composed of forty c members, and which his first care was to get enlarged, declared him lieutenant general of the state royal and crown of France, an unknown and unintelligible title, but with which they gave him almost sovereign power; and indeed they would have complimented him with the title of king, but that he prudently refused it<sup>p</sup>. Rouen and a great part of Normandy declared for the league, Lyons and Toulouse did the same, and the whole province of Bretagne followed their example; Bourges, Marseilles, Aix, Arles, and Toulon, did the like; marshal Matignon preserved Bordeaux, and marshal d'Aumont recovered Angiers; but the provinces of Mayenne and Auvergne embraced the league<sup>q</sup>. The Spanish ambassador repaired to Paris; a sufficient indication what side his master was inclined to take. The Pope was inclined the same way; for the league had, in cardinal Pelleverè, an active and able agent at Rome, where d the king was also well served by the marquis Pisani. In all provinces troops were raising for the king and for the league; and though religion was the pretence, yet interest or resentment were the real motives. There was all this time an open war with the Protestants, but it was carried on very faintly, the league having no opportunity of attacking them; and the king, and the nobility who adhered to him, having no inclination, though, to save appearances, and to lessen the influence of the rebels, they declared publicly, and in strong terms, against heresy and heretics, with whom they were privately treating, and without whose assistance there was nothing more evident than that the king must be undone, and the constitution overthrown<sup>r</sup>.

THE distress of princes is the great criterion of zeal and duty. Henry saw himself, at Blois, e abandoned by almost all those whom his favour had raised to greatness, decried by the clergy whom he had encouraged, and abhorred by the bigots, to whom, during his whole reign, he had been paying court. In this consisted his good fortune; it made room for those who ought to have been always about him. Except the old doating cardinal of Bourbon, who was in prison, and whom the league (worthy of such a king) stiled Charles the tenth, all the princes of his blood repaired to him, not to receive places and preferments, but to sacrifice their lives and fortunes for his service; the cardinal de Lenoncourt, the marshal duke de Montmorency, the duke d'Espèron, the duke of Nevers, and other persons of great quality, resorted with what forces they could collect; by their advice he removed to Tours, and, by his edict of the fourth of March, transferred thither the parliament and chamber of accounts from f Paris<sup>s</sup>. He had negotiated with the duke of Mayenne, and, out of a desire of peace, and to shew his steady affection to the church of Rome, had offered him and the family of Lorraine the government of one third of the kingdom; but their hopes of possessing the whole were so strong, that they rejected these offers<sup>t</sup>. The king of Navarre, on the contrary, published a declaration, by which he offered himself and his forces for his majesty's service, without any stipulation. Diana de Angoulême, natural daughter to king Henry the second, negotiated the reconciliation between them, which was perfected in an interview towards the end of April. Some had suggested to the king of Navarre, that he might meet the same fate with the duke of Guise: to satisfy them, he took some precautions at the first meeting, but went the next

- a morning to confer with the king, attended only by a page, which produced a thorough reconciliation<sup>u</sup>. While the king of Navarre was assembling his troops, the duke of Mayenne was very near seizing the king. A detachment of horse was within a hundred yards of him: a miller gave him notice of his danger; it was with difficulty he recovered the suburbs of Tours, which were gallantly defended by Crillon, with part of the regiment of guards; but both the place and his person had been taken, if the troops of the king of Navarre had not relieved it on the seventh of May<sup>w</sup>. The Pope, by his bull, excommunicated the king, for the death of the cardinal de Guise, the imprisonment of the cardinal de Bourbon, and his reconciliation with the king of Navarre. This prince, seeing the king extremely affected with the thunder of the Vatican, said, “Sire, let us march with our forces to Paris; if we are b “victorious, we shall be easily absolved<sup>x</sup>.” The duke of Aumale, with the militia of that capital, besieged Senlis, which had been surprised by the king. La Noue and the duke of Longueville, with a handful of men, beat Aumale, and relieved it, which encouraged the two kings to prosecute their enterprize. In their march they recovered several places, some of which surrendered, and some were taken by storm; amongst the latter was Estampes, for defending of which the baron de St. Germain lost his head<sup>y</sup>. Nicholas de Harlay, Seigneur de Sancy, whom the king had sent to raise troops in Switzerland without money, by the sale of his own jewels and lands, accomplished his commission, and brought ten thousand Swiss foot, two thousand Lansquenets, and fifteen hundred Reitres, to Conflans, where they joined the army of the two kings. The compliment Henry made to this gentleman was very remarkable; after embracing him he said, “In recompensing this service, I shall never be able to c “reach your deserts; but I will endeavour to exceed your expectations<sup>z</sup>.” Their forces were now between thirty and forty thousand men, with whom, on the last of July, they invested Paris, the king fixing his quarters at St. Cloud, and the king of Navarre at Meudon<sup>a</sup>.

- On the approach of the royal army to Paris, the council of union had recalled the duke of Mayenne from Alençon, which he had reduced to defend them. He made the best disposition for this purpose that was possible, and took post himself, with four thousand men, in the suburb of St. Honore, fully resolved, in case things came to extremity, to open himself a passage, or perish in the attempt. It is generally believed that this capital could not have
d held out long. The king would very soon have prevented any kind of supplies from entering the place; and when once the inhabitants were distressed, as there were numbers of royalists in the place, the duke of Mayenne and the inveterate leaguers would have found themselves in a manner between two fires. But their danger and their deliverance came together. A Jacobin friar, whose name was James Clement, a native of the village of Sorbonne, near Sens, an ignorant half-witted creature, about twenty-five years of age, distracted with the enthusiastic sermons that were every day thundered from the pulpits, and prompted by better heads, and perhaps wicked hearts, than his own, was fixed upon as a proper instrument for dissipating the royal army by dispatching the king. To facilitate this enterprize, a passport was procured, under false pretences, from the count de Brienne, one of the king's generals, then a e prisoner, and a letter forged from president Harlay, who was in the Bastille. With these implements he set out from Paris the very day the king came to St. Cloud, and falling in upon the road with the attorney general, Mr. La Guesle, and his brother, who were going to the king's quarters, and telling them that he was going with very important intelligence, one of the gentlemen took him up behind him, and carried him to St. Cloud<sup>b</sup>. As it was too late for him that night to see the king, he supped with the attorney general's servants, with whom he was remarkably lively and merry, and slept so soundly, that they were forced to awake him in the morning<sup>c</sup>. When he was introduced to the king by La Guesle, he spoke to him with great readiness, presented his letters, and, while he was reading them, drew a knife he had concealed in his sleeve, and thrust it into his belly<sup>d</sup>. The king drew it out himself, and gave f him one, or, as some say, two wounds in the face, on which La Guesle struck him on the stomach with the pomel of his sword, which stunned him; and two of the king's guards dispatched him as he lay on the floor, very imprudently<sup>e</sup> (G). At first the king's wound was not

(G) We have given in the text as clear and as distinct an account of this barbarous assassination, as we could collect from the best historians. The attorney general, La Guesle, gave himself a full and circumstantial narrative of this melancholy affair, from the time of his meeting with James Clement, to that of his death.

Some have asserted that La Guesle run him through the body; but he positively asserts the contrary; and that, the assassin remaining upon his knees, after the king had wounded him in the face, himself, through fear of his having other weapons, struck him with the hilt of his sword in the stomach, and, when he fell, threw not thought mortal, at least so it was given out; but his swooning frequently quickly discovered his danger. The king of Navarre repaired immediately to the king's quarters as soon as he was informed of what had happened. There are different accounts of their conversation, and perhaps equally ill-founded; but it is generally agreed, that the king embraced him tenderly, called him his dear brother, declared him his successor, and exhorted the nobility who were present to acknowledge and support him. The king died the next morning, which was the second of August, about four o'clock, in the 39th year of his age, and in the 16th of his reign<sup>f</sup> (H).

him at a distance from the king (1). At that time there was not the least doubt that James Clement was the assassin. There was a pompous account of his martyrdom published at Paris, and his order were so far from being ashamed either of the action or of him who did it, that one of his brethren published another account, in which his attempting it was ascribed to a revelation from heaven (2), which was fatal to the prior of his order, who being taken about six months after, suffered death, as an accomplice or encourager of the fact. He denied it, however, when tortured; and, at his death, declaring himself perfectly innocent, and professing that he detested the action. Nay, in the letter of La Guesle before-mentioned, it is said, that Clement was told at his supper, the night before, that six of his order had made a vow to kill the king, to which he answered modestly and mildly, that there were good and bad of all sorts, monks as well as others. His knife was also remarked, being new, having a long blade, and a black handle; and somebody said to him, observing that he used it very briskly at supper, you would have sooner forgot your breviary than your knife; to which he answered frankly, there is my knife, and here is my breviary (3). But, notwithstanding all this, some doubts have been raised whether James Clement killed the king or not. It is suggested, that, while the king was intent on reading the letter he presented him, some person near him stabbed him in the belly, and that the monk was first stunned, and then dispatched, to prevent a discovery of the truth. Others insinuate that the monk was sent out of the world before the king; and that another person dressed in his cloaths committed this bloody fact. But there are no proofs of this; only it is affirmed, that a footman of the count de Auvergne affirmed, upon his death-bed, that it was not a Jacobin who killed the king; and that madam d'Entragues, the daughter of the count, frequently asserted the same thing (4). It seems, indeed, tolerably proved, that this James Clement had formerly professed himself loyal, and had been employed by the king's party to carry letters from Blois, and from Tours to Paris, which accounts for his being trusted upon this occasion, but does not at all acquit him of the murder. On the contrary, it appears clearly, that the leaguers were fully persuaded that it was done by his hand, since they ordered their creatures to celebrate him as a martyr, exhibited his picture, with a glory round his head as a saint, and rewarded his mother and some of his relations (5). There is also a trifling circumstance that seems to put it out of dispute. He was seen a little before his departure mending his shoes with packthread; and, as he was looked upon to be a kind of a half-witted fellow, those who saw him thus employed jested with him, and told him his work would not last long; to which he answered, that it would last as long as he had occasion for it; from which it is evident that he expected to perish in this undertaking (6). The source of these different reports was the imprudence of killing him upon the spot, which, however, La Guesle says, he endeavoured all he could to prevent, and the flinging his body out of the window without examining it; upon which the provost Richlieu, by order of Henry the fourth, caused it to be torn by four horses, and then burnt (7). But the great obscurity lies with respect to the contrivers of this fact, of whom the best authors speak very cautiously and darkly, and even those, who in other things seem to have been best informed, acknowledge, that with respect to this, they could say nothing with certainty; that it was hid under impenetrable clouds, and must be referred to divine justice. It is, however, allowed, that common fame threw it upon the duke of Mayenne, and the duchess of Montpensier his sister. The former disclaimed it in the strongest manner, but the duchess avowed it; and there want not some who assert that she bribed that profligate monk to commit that detestable action, by granting him the greatest favour in her power; and, besides other provocations, it is reported that being disappointed in a love intrigue with the king was one of the principal causes of her rage and resentment. It is certain that she and her mother drove about the streets in the most indecent manner, publishing the news to the populace, and then went to the church of the Cordeliers, where the duchess of Ne-mours, mounted on the steps of the altar, for a long time reviled the deceased king in the most abusive manner (8). They likewise distributed green scarfs to their friends, instead of the black ones which they had worn from the time of the death of the duke of Guise. But if this behaviour was inexcusable, even in women, much more so was that of the Pope Sixtus the fifth, who, in a full consistory, was not ashamed to magnify the holy zeal of this bloody villain, and to extol his courage and piety beyond those of Eleazar (9) and Judith. An action in itself abominable, and fraught with superstition and ignorance.

(H) This unfortunate prince, Henry the third, was born on Saturday, September the 20th, 1551, and consequently not upon Whitsunday, as is commonly reported (10). At his baptism he received the name of Alexander Edward; his sponsors were Edward the sixth, king of England, Anthony du Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, and the princess of Navarre, the duke's consort. His name was changed to Henry at his confirmation. While duke of Anjou, he was active, ambitious, and full of generous ardour; but afterwards his nature was quite changed, some say, after the short stay he made at Venice; but, in reality, this change happened after the massacre at St. Bartholomew (11). He had naturally a compassionate temper, and sincerely believed the principles of the Christian religion; so that from this time his mind became disordered, insomuch that he studied sometimes to forget his apprehensions in debauches, and at others to appease his conscience by acts of superstitious devotion (12). The only excuse

The Reign of Henry IV. surnamed the Great, king of France and Navarre, founder of the branch of Bourbon, at present in possession of the throne.

HENRY, king of Navarre, was in the thirty-sixth year of his age, when, by the death of his predecessor, he was called to the throne, in right of his descent<sup>a</sup> (A). He saw, however, very few, except the Hugonots, who shewed any great zeal for his service, and resolved, therefore, to make use of those few as soon, and to as much purpose as he could. Amongst that can be made for him is his youth, to which, perhaps, we may add, his being under the influence of his mother. After his return from Poland, he became indolent and capricious; but, with these new faults, he retained one old one, his obstinacy; for though he frequently changed his opinions, it proceeded not from compliance, but mutability. It may be, that the Catholic and the Hugonot writers have exaggerated his debauches; for he was equally hated by both. But, beyond all doubt, after the accident he met with at Venice, and the death of the princess of Condé, his vices took an unnatural turn, of which this is the clearest proof. The great historian, monsieur D'Aubigne, being taken prisoner by monsieur de St. Luc, who had been one of the king's minions, he told him frankly, that, not being able to endure the sight of those excesses into which the king sometimes fell, he concerted with the marshal de Rhetz and the duke de Joyeuse, men, though not of the most scrupulous consciences, yet sufficiently disgusted, as well as himself, the means of frightening the king from them. With this view, by the help of an iron pipe conveyed through a hole into the king's chamber, St. Luc spoke as if he had been an angel sent to admonish him, at which this poor prince was so terrified, that he was very near losing his senses; upon which the duke of Joyeuse told him the truth; and this incensed him so violently against St. Luc, that he was constrained to abandon the court, and to retire into his government, where he afterwards declared for the league (13). The king waked sometimes in such terrors, that he rose and hid himself under his bed; and, whenever it thundered, he took shelter in the vaults under the Louvre. There might be something constitutional in this, for it was observed, that in extreme cold weather the king had fits of another kind, during which it was highly dangerous to provoke him. Some say the duke of Guise was apprized of this, and lost his life for not paying a sufficient attention to this caution. However that may be, the king had but one relapse before his death, which discovered itself in his negotiation with the duke of Mayenne; for after that he resumed his martial spirit, and became what he was when duke of Anjou (14). In the defence of Tours, monsieur de Thou assures us, that he gave his orders like a great captain, and shewed all the intrepidity in danger, of the most gallant soldier (15). He was a kind husband to Louisa of Lorraine, who, after his decease, retired from Moulins, and spent the remainder of her days in acts of piety, dying about twelve years after the king. His behaviour, after he received the wound of which he died, was equally pious and brave, according to the certificate of the princes, great lords, and others, who were about him, and who met to draw up and sign that paper the very next day (16). The malice borne to this prince is almost beyond example; for after his body was embalmed, his entrails being put up in a coffer, while the great lords of the army were assembled in council, this coffer was pierced in several places with daggers, so that the grease ran through (17). It is from hence argued, that there were some about him very capable of doing what is ascribed to the monk. His intestines were after this privately interred near the altar, in the church of St. Cloud, where an inscription has been since put up by one of his faithful servants, and his body deposited at St. Cornille in Compeigne, whither it was attended by the duke of Espernon, and remained there till the year 1610, when it was removed to St. Denis (18).

(A) In this note we propose to shew, as succinctly as possible, the descent of Henry the fourth, and consequently his title to the crown of France (1). Robert the sixth, son of St. Lewis, was born A. D. 1256, and had the county of Clermont by his father's gift. He received the honour of knighthood at Paris, in 1279, at a tournament, where he received so many blows on the head as disturbed his senses ever after. He espoused, notwithstanding, Beatrix, the only daughter of John of Burgundy, and Agnes, heiress of Bourbon, by whom he had many children. He deceased in 1318. His eldest son Lewis exchanged the county of Clermont with Charles the Fair, who, in 1327, erected the barony of Bourbon into a duchy and peerage in his favour. He espoused Mary, daughter to the count of Hainault, by whom he had a numerous progeny; amongst whom were Peter, who succeeded him, and James, from whom descended the count de la Marche. He deceased in 1342. Peter, the first duke of Bourbon, had the charge of grand-chamberlain conferred upon him by Philip de Valois. He married Isabella, daughter to Charles of France, count of Valois, and had by her one son and seven daughters. He was slain fighting valiantly by the side of king John in the battle of Poitiers, 1356. Lewis the second was one of the richest princes of his time. He was in his youth one of the hostages for king John in England, paid a ransom of one hundred thousand franks, and spent forty thousand more during his residence at London. He had some share in the government in the reign of Charles the sixth, and was esteemed the worthiest man of his time. He married Anne, the daughter of the count of Clermont, in Auvergne, and died in 1410. His son John styled himself duke of Bourbon and Auvergne, count de Forez, Clermont, and Montpensier, lord of Beaujeu and Dombes, peer and chamberlain of France. He commanded the van-guard at the battle of Agincourt, and was there made prisoner, and continued so nineteen years. From his younger son Lewis descended the counts of Montpensier. He died in 1434. Charles duke of Bourbon, who followed the fortunes of Charles the seventh, and who by Agnes, daughter of John duke of Burgundy, had six sons and five daughters. John the eldest succeeded his father; Philip died young; Charles became cardinal archbishop of Lyons; Peter had the lordship of Beaujeu; Lewis was bishop of Liege; and James knight of the

proclaimed
king by the army.

Amongst these, the marshal de Biron was one of the first; the king sent him to prevail upon the Swiss to take an oath of fidelity, and to remain in the army, believing, that if this precedent was set, it would be very quickly followed. His endeavours and his hopes were anticipated; their colonel, general Sanci, without so much as going to make his court to the king, had disposed the Swiss to do all that he desired, which was a thing of infinite consequence<sup>b</sup>. There was, however, a great cabal amongst the Catholics, at the head of which were the Sieurs, d'O, Manou, d'Entragues, Chateau, Vieux, Dampierre, Marechal de Camp, who retired to consult with the duke of Longueville, being unwilling to acknowledge Henry, and yet more unwilling to join in the league. After much deliberation they came to the king in a body; and the Sieur d'O declared, in their names, that they did not pretend to question his title, but expected and desired that he should become a Catholic. Henry changed countenance several times while he was speaking, and seemed more embarrassed than at any time of his life. He told them he was amazed that any other thoughts should enter their minds, than revenging the death of their slaughtered sovereign, which intirely took up his. He told them, that to follow their advice was the worst step he could take; that the change of religion to a man who had any was not the work of an instant; and that he was determined to consider this point with the attention it deserved<sup>c</sup>. At this instant Givry entered, and, by a brisk unpremeditated speech, did more than all the argument and eloquence in the world could have done: "Sire, said he, the flower of your brave nobility have resolved to put off their mourning for the late king till they have revenged him, in order to which they only wait your commands; you are the king of all the brave men in the army, and none think of abandoning you but the poltroons." Marshal Biron Sanci, a crowd of young nobility, all the colonels of the Swiss, came immediately and took the oath of fidelity<sup>d</sup>. This had a great effect upon the Catholic lords, who retired, drew up some propositions, mild in their nature, and modestly expressed, which the king signed on the fourth of August, and then they likewise took the oath<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Espernon, under pretence that the marshal Biron and d'Aumont had signed before him, refused to concur, and marched off with his troops, which had a very bad effect<sup>f</sup>. In the mean time the leaguers gave incredible testimonies of joy for the death of the late king; but the duke of Mayenne acted with great dignity and discretion. He rejected the proposal of those who were for proclaiming himself king, as he likewise did a motion that was made to offer the crown to Philip the second; he contented himself with publishing a manifesto in his own name, and that of the council of the union, exhorting the inhabitants of the cities and towns to renew the oath they had taken to live and die in the golden fleece. Of the daughters, Mary married John duke of Calabria; Isabella, who became the wife to Charles, the last duke of Burgundy, and was by him the mother of Mary, who conveyed that rich inheritance to the house of Austria; Katherine became the consort of Adolph of Flanders, duke of Guelders; Joan married the son of the prince of Orange, and Margaret espoused Philip count of Bresse, afterwards duke of Savoy, by whom she had the princess Louisa, the mother of Francis the first. Duke Charles died in 1456. John, the second, surnamed the Good, to his other titles added that of constable of France. He had three wives, but left no children by any of them; he died in 1488. His brother Peter, lord of Beaujeu, succeeded him. He married Anne of France, eldest daughter to Lewis the eleventh, and was twice regent of the kingdom; he died in 1503, leaving an only daughter, Susannah, duchess of Bourbon, who espoused Charles de Montpensier, constable of France, and, in her right, duke of Bourbon. He was killed before Rome in 1527, and in him extinguished the house of Montpensier. That of la Marche being likewise extinct, the vast estates of this family descended to Charles de Bourbon, count of Vendosme, who married Frances, daughter to Rene duke of Alençon, and the widow of the duke of Longueville, by whom he had Anthony; Francis, count of Enguien, killed by a trunk that was thrown upon his head; Charles, cardinal of Bourbon, flattered by the leaguers with the title of Charles the tenth; John duke of Enguien, killed in the battle of St. Quintin; and Lewis, from whom are descended the princes of Condi and Conti. He had also six daughters, of whom Mar- garet became the wife of Francis of Cleves, duke of Nevers, and the rest either died young, or became nuns: he died in 1538. Anthony de Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, espoused Joan of Albret, sole daughter and heiress of Henry the first, king of Navarre, by whom he had Henry king of France and Navarre, and Katherine who espoused Henry of Lorraine, duke of Bar, when she was near forty years of age (2). As we have given the history of this prince amongst the kings of Navarre, and have also spoken largely of him in the last section, it is not necessary that we should say any thing further of him here. But, however, to render this point yet more clear, it may not be amiss to set this monarch's descent in another point of view, by tracing him in a direct line from St. Louis (3). Robert, count of Clermont, son to that monarch, was the father of Lewis the first, duke of Bourbon; Lewis was the father of James, count of la Marche, who was the father of John, also count of la Marche; John was the father of Lewis, count of Vendosme; Lewis was the father of John, who was also count of Vendosme; John was the father of Francis, who bore the same title; and Francis the father of Charles, duke of Vendosme, who was the father of Anthony king of Navarre, who was the father of Henry the fourth; he stood therefore in the tenth descent from St. Louis; so that the great historian had reason to say (4), that if religion had not stood in the way, there could have been very little doubt made of the right of the king of Navarre; and yet he stood related but in the twenty-second degree to his predecessor (5), otherwise than by marriage.

- a Catholic religion, and to acknowledge for their king the cardinal of Bourbon<sup>g</sup>, the king of Navarre being a heretic. He preserved by this step the protection of Spain and Savoy and secured the sovereign power in his own hands, on behalf of a captive prince; and at the same time left a door open, through which he might with decency retire, when either compelled by necessity, or invited by a favourable opportunity.

As his army began sensibly to diminish, the king found it necessary to raise the siege of Paris, and to march with the forces he had left into Normandy. He took several small places by the way; but, in all probability, would have found it difficult to have reduced either Dieppe or Eu. The former of these was of infinite consequence to him, as it opened a communication with England, the only power in Europe from which he could hope assistance. He raises the siege of Paris, and secures Dieppe and Caen in Normandy.

- b The commander de Chattes had a good garrison in it, with which he marched out, and met the king: "Sire, said he, there is not a soldier in the town, you may send what governor and what garrison into it you please; as to myself and my troops, we pretend to no other title than being your majesty's faithful subjects<sup>b</sup>." This was of great consequence; and a relation of the commander's secured in like manner the town and citadel of Caen. In the mean time the zealous Parisians, upon the duke of Mayenne's suggestion, that the king's forces were dwindled to nothing in Normandy, and that, if followed thither by a good army, he must be presently undone, furnished that prince with men and money in abundance, and, having drawn great succours from Lorraine, marched directly into Normandy, with near thirty thousand men. As the king's forces were not quite seven thousand, the duke proposed either to retake Dieppe, or to besiege the king in it; and he might have done which he pleased, if he had acted vigorously<sup>c</sup>. His caution gave the king time to intrench behind the river, and under the cannon of the castle of Arques, where the duke attacked him on the 21st of September. The leaguers had the advantage at the beginning by an action of the greatest treachery; their Lansquenets, perceiving that their countrymen defended the king's intrenchments, pretended to desert; but, as soon as they were helped over, attacked the king's troops, and one of their officers made a bold attempt upon his person. At length, however, the duke of Mayenne was beaten, with the loss of six hundred men<sup>k</sup>. The principal causes of his misfortune were the rawness of his troops, and the presence of the marquis du Pont, eldest son of the duke of Lorraine, for whom the queen-mother had such kind intentions, and who, if he had obtained it, would have declared himself king<sup>l</sup>. Is attacked by the duke of Mayenne, who is repulsed.
- d Soon after this victory, Henry had the acceptable news that the Swiss cantons and the republic of Venice had acknowledged him for king of France; he received likewise four thousand foot from England<sup>m</sup>. About the middle of October he made a quick march to Paris, and quartered his troops in sight of it on the last of that month. This strangely alarmed the inhabitants, who had let their windows that looked on the street of St. Anthony, to those who promised themselves the pleasure of seeing the Bearnois led in triumph, and had just received an authentic account of his being totally defeated at Arques, with twenty of the royal standards supposed to be taken, but really made for that purpose<sup>n</sup>. On the first of November the king insulted three of the suburbs, in which the leaguers lost thirteen hundred men, fourteen ensigns, and thirty pieces of cannon. He marches immediately to Paris.
- e If the king's artillery could have been brought up in time, or if the duke of Mayenne had not entered with his army, the place had been carried by storm. The people hanged two or three of their own townsmen who were royalists, and the king, in return, hanged up one of the sixteen, who was prisoner of war<sup>o</sup>. On the 21st of November the king made his public entry into Tours, and the same day the duke of Mayenne proclaimed Charles the tenth with great solemnity<sup>p</sup>. The sixteen, and most of the furious clergy, were for declaring the king of Spain, notwithstanding, protector of the league; the duke engaged them to defer it to the arrival of the Pope's legate; and, upon finding him in the Spanish interest, he proposed declaring the Pope their protector, with which the clergy joined; the legate was forced to approve, and the sixteen to submit. He then declared, that as he governed by the royal authority (though the king was close prisoner in Fontenai-le-Comte in Poitou), he would appoint a privy council, and dissolve that of the union, which had the air of a republic. This was a great blow to the sixteen; and, to strengthen himself still farther, he took the seals from Montbazon, who, since the late king's death, had refused to act, and gave them to the archbishop of Lyons<sup>q</sup>. Some of the great cities, and some of the parliaments, declared for the king, some for the league, some affected to remain neuter. Under this pretence marshal Matignon held Bordeaux, by which he did the king more service than if he had declared for him<sup>r</sup>. Different towns declare for the king and the cardinal de Bourbon.
- f The duke of Espernon, though he affected a kind of independence, and had a better army than the king's, acted with spirit and success against the league, though he made no steps to be reconciled to the king, for fear he should borrow his money<sup>s</sup>. The duke of Savoy demanding from the parliament of Grenoble the title of king of France, and being denied that, <sup>a</sup> would have accepted the kingdom of Arles; but La Valette, Espernon's elder brother, prevented his getting either the title or the dominions, sacrificing his troops, his money, and at length his life, in the king's service <sup>1</sup>.

The king defeats the Duc de Mayenne
at Yvry.

THE duke of Mayenne made himself master of Pontoise, and afterwards besieged Meulan, to the relief of which the king marched in person with a small force. The duke retired; but, as soon as the king was gone, he besieged the place a second time, though without effect. The king relieved it a second time, and the duke, to avoid a battle, retired <sup>2</sup>. The king, who had now a superiority, besieged Dreux; but the prince of Parma having sent count Egmont with a potent succour of the best troops in his army, the duke of Mayenne marched with upwards of sixteen thousand men to relieve the place. In his passage the king met him <sup>b</sup> at Yvry with his forces, which were not above twelve thousand men; the duke had no intention to engage, but he could not avoid it. The battle was fought on the 14th of March: the king's speech is worth inserting: "Children," said he to his soldiers, "if you should at any time lose sight of your colours, look about for this," pointing to the white feather in his hat, "you'll find it in the way to victory and honour. God is with us <sup>3</sup>." He exposed himself extremely, was present when the count of Egmont was killed, and his Walloon horse broke; the duke of Mayenne was intirely routed, lost his baggage, his artillery (they were but four pieces), and, indeed, every thing he had to lose <sup>4</sup>. At the close of the engagement there was a great square column of Swiss troops, to whom some French infantry joined themselves, and, though surrounded by the king's troops, remained firm. Henry sent them a kind mes- <sup>c</sup> sage, that he should be sorry to put so many brave men to the sword, and that their safety depended upon themselves; upon which they threw down their arms, and entered into his service <sup>5</sup>. There was about two thousand five hundred killed; but the loss of the leaguers, one way or other, was equal to that of the king's whole army. Marshal Biron, who commanded the reserve, never fought at all, and yet he was the great author of the victory; for he presented his troops so opportunely wherever the enemy began to press, that he obliged them to retire in confusion. After the victory he made the king a compliment, that shewed he was as great a courtier as a captain: "Sire, said he, you acted the part of marshal Biron to day, and acted it well; while I, for my part, performed that of the king <sup>6</sup>." The duke of Mayenne, who had ben totally lost if he had not persuaded the people of Mante that the king <sup>d</sup> was killed, and thereby obtained a passage over the Seine, endeavoured to retard the motion of the victorious army by a negociation; and the king was content to be amused, because he could not move for want of money; however, by the eighth of May, he completely blocked up Paris <sup>7</sup>.

cardinal de Bourbon.

ON the same day, or, as some say, the next, died the cardinal de Bourbon, in his prison, of a retention of urine, at the age of sixty-seven <sup>8</sup>. He was very sensible that his royalty was a farce; and, after the death of Henry the third, made use of the phrase, the king my nephew, indefinitely, but would never call him king of Navarre. The leaguers continued to coin their money with his effigies for five years after, and procured a decree of the Sorbonne, fortified by an arret of their parliament, against the title of Henry de Bourbon <sup>e</sup>. The duke de Nemours was governor of Paris, and discharged that office with great capacity. The legate formed a regiment of ecclesiastics, consisting of thirteen hundred men, and had his secretary killed by his side at his first review. The inhabitants suffered prodigiously by famine; and, notwithstanding their solemn oaths to the contrary, were at last forced to treat <sup>9</sup>. The king might certainly have been master of his capital, if he had refused a passage to the old men, women, and children, whom the duke of Nemours turned out. He was reproached for his ill-timed tenderness by some of his officers, and by his only ally <sup>f</sup>; but the king was one of those princes who had rather bear all the reproaches in the world than those of his own heart.

The king is obliged to raise the blockade of Paris.

At last the prince of Parma, in obedience to his Catholic majesty's orders, and contrary to his own sense of things, marched to the relief of Paris, and conducted his design so well (as he <sup>f</sup> was, without doubt, one of the greatest officers of that age), that, at the close of the month of August, the king was constrained to raise his blockade, when the place was on the very point of falling into his hands <sup>10</sup>. He met, besides this, with several other mortifications; the duke of Savoy took Frejus and Antibes, and was received in triumph at Aix, under the title of protector of Provence <sup>11</sup>. This turn of fortune induced some to quit the king's party, and go over to the league, while others pretended discontent on the score of religion; but the worst of all was the want of money, sometimes to such a degree, that the king was forced to go, under colour of a visit, to other people's quarters, for want of a dinner at his own <sup>12</sup>.

- a Another misfortune was, the death of Pope Sixtus the fifth, at a time when he was on the point of breaking with the Spaniards, and making an attempt on the kingdom of Naples. He was succeeded by Urban the seventh, who sat but a little time, and then made room for Gregory the fourteenth, a subject of the king of Spain, and the most determined enemy the king ever had. Before the close of the year, the king made an attempt, by surprize, on Paris, and had succeeded, but that a Jesuit, a lawyer, and a bookfeller, being upon duty, over-heard the troops that were about to scale the wall, shot the first person who entered, after he had mounted the ladder, and, by giving the alarm, obliged the king's forces to desist<sup>i</sup>. A. D. 1590.
- b As the taking of Paris was his great view, the king was not to be discouraged. On the 20th of January he sent several waggons laden with corn, attended by sixty determined officers, in the disguise of peasants, to seize the gate of St. Honore, not knowing that the leaguers had caused it to be walled up; so that, though admirably conducted, this design, stiled in French journée des farines, also miscarried<sup>k</sup>. The Pope, being intirely in the hands of the Spanish. The pope declares him a heretic relapsed.
- c faction, declared Henry a heretic relapsed, a persecutor of the church, and as such excommunicated, fallen from his dignities, and even from his patrimonial estates, requiring all ecclesiastics to quit his party, on pain of losing their dignities and benefices, and laics also, under the highest penalties; which produced a great deal of confusion<sup>l</sup>. However, the king, having received a considerable sum of money, and a great quantity of ammunition from the queen of England<sup>m</sup>, recovered several places in Normandy. By the advice of the chancellor Chiverny, to whom he had restored the seals, he besieged Chartres, and took it with great difficulty. Not long after, a place of consequence being surprized in Normandy, the bishop of Evreux, a violent leaguer, was taken prisoner. There was found upon him a treatise he had written to justify the murder of Henry the third, and to prove the lawfulness of treating his successor in the same way. Upon his refusing to retract these treasonable and atheistical opinions, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment<sup>n</sup>. The parliament of Chalons declared all the Pope's bulls and rescripts against both kings null, abusive, and seditious, ordered them to be burnt by the hand of the hangman, and offered a reward for apprehending the Pope's nuncio<sup>o</sup>. On the 4th of July, the king published an edict at Mante, by which he revoked those extorted from his predecessor by the leaguers, and established liberty of conscience throughout his dominions<sup>p</sup>. In the month of August he took Nojon in the sight of the duke of Mayenne, and received the acceptable news that the viscount de Turenne had procured a levy of sixteen thousand men for his service in Germany. He publishes an edict at Mante, establishing liberty of conscience throughout his dominions.
- d While he was employed in recruiting and augmenting his army, he was informed of the escape of the young duke of Guise from the castle of Tours; on which all he said was, "The more enemies we have, the more pains we must take, and the more honour it will be to beat them<sup>q</sup>." It was not long before he heard of another competitor, never thought of by himself or any body else, which was Charles cardinal of Bourbon, son to Lewis prince of Condé, who pretended that he was the nearest Catholic of the house of Bourbon. As for the sixteen, who had now recovered their power in Paris, they were for the duke of Guise, under the protection of the crown of Spain. The king was quickly apprized of this; and being so fortunate as to seize their agent with their instructions, he sent them to the duke of Mayenne, that he might see to what sort of people he was become the tool<sup>r</sup>. He likewise consented that the duke should send the president Jeanin into Spain, to discover the true sentiments of Philip the second. He knew the president to be a very honest man, and he made no doubt of his being disgusted at the Spanish court. He was not mistaken; for the president found Philip the second so secure of being master of France, that, in speaking to him, he always said, my town of Paris, Orleans, Rouen, &c.<sup>s</sup>. He likewise heard of a queen of France, and a new king too, in her right. This was the Infanta, to whom, in the opinion of her father, the crown belonged, as the nearest relation of the late king, and he was content to give both her and it to the archduke Ernest. The king, having assembled an army of thirty-five thousand men, formed the siege of Rouen. While he was thus employed, the sixteen caused a citizen of Paris to be proceeded against before their parliament, for writing a letter to a fe- Outrages committed by the council of sixteen at Paris.
- e lation of his in the king's service; but as there was nothing in it regarding public affairs, he was acquitted. Upon this Bussi, Louchart, le Normand, and Anroux, four of the most furious of the sixteen, seized the first president Brissson, and the counsellors Archer and Tardif, condemned and hanged them in prison<sup>t</sup>, on the 15th of November. The duke of Mayenne, being informed of this, returned out of Picardy with a small corps of horse, held an assembly in the town-house, where he reprimanded those who had been most busy in the affair, and, by way of adjusting matters, invited the sixteen to supper, where, while they were very merry, he posted guards in proper places, and, after they were returned to their own houses, took four of them out of their beds, and hanged them in his hall <sup>a</sup>. Buffi le Clerc saved his life by delivering up the Bastile; but the soldiers plundered him of his wealth, and himself, retiring to Brussels, lived there for many years, in all the wretchedness of poverty and infamy <sup>w</sup>. Henry, who, with the assistance of a great body of English troops, under the command of the earl of Essex <sup>x</sup>, was on the very point of taking Rouen, found himself obliged to raise the siege, by the arrival of the prince of Parma with a Spanish army, who in this, as in the relief of Paris, performed what he came to do, and then marched back again to the Low Countries, without suffering Henry to force him to a battle <sup>y</sup>. This was one of the greatest disappointments the king ever met with. However, he was in some measure consoled by the death of Pope Gregory the fourteenth, who gave a monthly subsidy to the leaguers, and actually sent a body of troops to their assistance, though they proved of little service. His successor also, Innocent <sup>b</sup> the ninth, who trod in his steps, soon followed him into another world; and the duke of Savoy was soundly beaten by la Valette, notwithstanding he had added Marseilles to the places he had purloined from the crown of France <sup>z</sup>. The king had likewise the satisfaction of knowing that his own party in Paris was increasing every day, and was at least equal to the Spanish faction, and to that of the duke of Mayenne, who favoured them rather than the other.

THE new republic of Holland sent, in the beginning of the year, a fleet of forty-five sail, with a succour of three thousand men on board, which was very acceptable to the king <sup>a</sup>, who began to be more and more perplexed with the siege of Rouen. He had before it a much better army than he had ever commanded, falling very little, if at all, short of forty thousand men; <sup>c</sup> but the place was very gallantly defended by Andrew Brancas du Villars, one of the bravest men, and by some esteemed the best officer, in the service of the league <sup>b</sup>. The army of the dukes, that is, of Parma and Mayenne, did not consist of above twenty-four thousand men, had a long march to make, and through a country that would have embarrassed any other commander than the duke of Parma. He marched continually in order of battle, his cavalry in the center, his infantry on the wings, with a thousand waggons in three lines on each flank, his artillery in the rear. Himself, in an open carriage, unarmed, and at his ease, as if it had been no more than a journey of pleasure, received intelligence, and gave his orders without emotion <sup>e</sup>. The king, not being able to credit the news he heard, and being desirous to see with his own eyes how these succours were conducted, advanced with a great corps of horse towards the confederates, leaving marshal Biron to command the siege. At Aumale he fell in with their van-guard, attacked and defeated some of the advanced corps, but quickly found himself obliged to make as quick a retreat as possible. It is allowed that he shewed great vivacity in this attack, much intrepidity in the time of greatest danger, and great conduct in retiring, wounded as he was in the reins <sup>d</sup>. But it is said the prudence of the duke of Nevers, who foresaw his danger, and advanced with a good body of troops to favour his retreat, prevented his being killed or made prisoner. His address was commended by the duke of Parma; his whole conduct severely censured by marshal Biron, who asked him, when he intended to act like a king, instead of a captain of light-horse? The dukes took Neufchatel; and, during the king's absence, Villars made a sally, with so much spirit and success, that he scarce thought he stood in need of succours <sup>e</sup>. The duke of Parma, after having thrown relief into Rouen, in the beginning of March, separated his army, as if he had thought all over; but the king, having put his affairs in better order, pressed Rouen so warmly, that Villars sent to inform the dukes, that, unless he was effectually succoured, he would surrender in a week. The duke of Parma suddenly assembled his forces, and appeared before the king's quarters the 20th of April. Henry, apprehending that his whole army might be destroyed, in case he was attacked by the dukes and the garrison at the same time, raised the siege, after it had continued five months <sup>f</sup>. The duke of Parma would then have given battle; but the duke of Mayenne, who had been always beat, doubted of that measure, till it was too late. The confederates then besieged Caudebec, where the duke of Parma had his arm shattered <sup>g</sup>. In the end, however, the place was taken. By this time the king had received such reinforcements, that he began to press the dukes in his turn; and marshal Biron having carried one of their quarters, his son demanded six thousand horse and foot, affirming that, with so small a force, he would undertake to ruin their whole army; to which his father answered, "I believe you may; but then the war will be at an end, and we shall be sent to plant cabbage at Biron <sup>h</sup>." The king, notwithstanding, took such measures, that the duke of

- a Parma was intirely blocked up, having the king's army on every side, and the Seine a league broad at his back. In this situation the duke of Parma, in half a day, caused two forts to be erected on the opposite banks of the river; and, in a dark night, having assembled a great number of boats, which he covered in haste with planks and beams, he passed first his artillery, then his baggage and army, so that, by the time the king was well apprized of his scheme, the army was on the other side, and their retreat so well covered by the fort and redoubts, that the royal army were little more than spectators<sup>1</sup>. The duke of Parma was so well pleased with this escape, that he is said to have sent a trumpet, to ask king Henry what he thought of that retreat? The king was so much out of humour, that he could not help saying, he had no skill in retreats; and that, in his opinion, the best retreat in the world was little better than a flight<sup>2</sup>. The dukes continued their march with such expedition, that in four days they reached Charenton, above Paris, from whence the duke of Parma returned, at his leisure, to the Low Countries, and took Espernai in his passage<sup>3</sup>. In the mean time both parties negotiated in private, the king being desirous to conclude a treaty with the duke of Mayenne<sup>4</sup>, and the Spaniards not averse to sell a peace, upon high terms, to the king, to whom they offered to quit the party of the league, provided he would abandon to the crown of Spain the duchies of Burgundy and Bretagne.

- THINGS went but indifferently for the king elsewhere; the princes of Conti and Dombes besieged Craons, on the frontiers of Anjou, to the relief of which the duke of Mercoeur marched with all his forces, and had the good fortune to defeat their army totally<sup>5</sup>. This revived the hopes of the league; upon which the king sent marshal d'Aumont to command in Bretagne, and the prince of Dombes, now become duke of Montpensier, by the death of his father, into Normandy, where the king, having retaken Caudebec, and fortified the village of Quillebeuf, which the duke of Mayenne besieged in vain, kept Rouen still blocked up<sup>6</sup>. The king resolved next to recover Espernai, which he compassed with little difficulty; but the old marshal de Biron, going to view the place, lost his head by a cannon-ball<sup>7</sup>. Brantome is displeased at his being stiled the greatest officer in France, because, in his opinion, he was the first officer in Europe. His master owed him certainly great obligations, and yet it is believed he was not much regretted; for, finding he was not to be governor of Rouen, he suffered the siege to miscarry, and had prevented his son from ruining the army of the duke of Parma.
- d He was a man of letters, very polite, and had a vast capacity; but he had two great defects, he loved wine, and he loved money. The leaguers commonly said that they could have him at any time, if they had money enough to make the purchase. After the taking of Espernai, the king dismissed the German troops, under the command of the prince of Anhalt, gave them all the money he was able, and strong assurances of having the rest of what was due to them; they were conducted back into their own country by the viscount de Turenne, now become duke of Bouillon, by the marriage of the heiress of the family of la Marck, which he owed to the king's favour, guided by his interest<sup>8</sup>. It was of great consequence to have the principalities of Bouillon and Sedan in the hands of a friend; the sons of the two dukes of Lorraine and Nevers had pretended to that princess; the former was the king's declared enemy, and his competitor, and he had not an intire confidence in the other. He was assiduous, therefore, to procure that heiress for the viscount de Turenne; and, soon after his marriage, he declared him marshal of France<sup>9</sup>. At his return from conducting the German troops, he paid the king for his bâton by relieving Beaumont, where he defeated the marshal of Lorraine, killed him, with seven hundred men, and took all his baggage and artillery; the king made him a present of the latter, reserving one piece only, to put him in mind of the service<sup>10</sup>. In Languedoc the duke de Joyeuse, who commanded for the league, was intirely defeated by Themmes, who killed two thousand men, took all the baggage and artillery, with twenty-two ensigns, and the duke himself was drowned in his flight<sup>11</sup>. The duke of Savoy was beat by Lefdiguieres, who followed him over the mountains, and made excursions to the very gates of Turin<sup>12</sup>. The duke of Espernon, become governor of Provence by the death of his brother la Valette, recovered Antibes, and the Spaniards were baffled in an enterprize of theirs upon Bayonne<sup>13</sup>.

WE are now arrived at that point of time when things came absolutely to a crisis, in respect as well to the league as the king. With regard to the latter, the Catholics of his party gave him clearly to understand, that, though hitherto they had shewn so much complaisance as to take in good part his apologies on the head of religion, it was absolutely necessary that he should now explain himself directly, which the king took in good part; and though he did not immediately comply with their request, yet he gave them reason to be content, by a candid explanation of the motives which had induced him to act so indecisively, in a point of such importance. On the other hand, the duke of Parma, supporting the bigotted Catholics, had compelled the duke of Mayenne to come into a measure which hitherto he had assiduously avoided; and this was calling a general assembly of the states, in order to elect a king. The Spaniards were desirous that they should meet either at Soissons or at Rheims, because nearer to the frontiers of the Low Countries, and consequently more convenient for the duke of Parma, who, on the part of his master, was to assist at this assembly: but though the duke of Mayenne, who had hitherto resisted all attempts of this sort, found himself under the necessity of submitting, yet he remained firm as to the place, and would have it at Paris; for knowing well that, under colour of supporting the resolutions taken by the states, the duke was preparing to bring an army with him, he was very apprehensive of his seizing either of those places. He carried his point so far; but it is highly probable he would have found it difficult, if not impossible, to have preserved his influence, if that prince had actually come a third time into France; but while he was assembling his forces at Arras, death put an end to his fatigues<sup>x</sup>, and, so far as they regarded him, to the perplexities of the duke of Mayenne, whom, as he most feared, of consequence he most hated.

Death of the duke of Parma.

The duke of Mayenne assembles the states at Paris, and rejects the proposition of the Spanish faction.

As perplexed a situation as this was, and it is scarce possible to conceive one more so, the duke of Mayenne was much better qualified to extricate himself out of it, than to contend with his enemies in the field, though he did not want courage; but the caution, so fatal to him in the latter, was very favourable to him in the former. The edict he published for calling the states was dated on the 5th of January, penned with great elegance and gravity, as well as with the utmost art and circumspection. In it he justified his own conduct, defended the title of Charles the tenth, reproached Henry of Navarre with his obstinate adherence to heresy, but in a manner that did not please the violent leaguers, or much displease the king; appointing the 17th of the same month for their meeting, and inviting the Catholics in general to assist in settling the kingdom<sup>y</sup>. The cardinal legate likewise published a kind of mandate, filled with bitterness and passion, and which plainly expressed the intent of this meeting, of those he called the states, though the duke had carefully declined it, to be to proceed to the election of a king<sup>z</sup>. The states did not meet till the 26th of January, when the duke opened the assembly with a round and florid speech, in which he laid open the distress of the kingdom, and the necessity of having a king capable of restoring order. The first session was spent in the usual ceremonies. In the second they came to the point. The cardinal legate moved, that, in the first place, the states should bind themselves by an oath never to admit of a reconciliation with the king of Navarre, even if he embraced the Catholic religion. He was seconded by the whole Spanish faction<sup>a</sup>. The duke, who knew the importance of the debate, spoke vehemently and plainly against it, with the applause of the greatest part of the assembly. The archbishop of Lyons, with great dexterity, defeated the legate at his own weapons, by shewing that, if they came to such a resolution, they should bind the hands of the Pope, which it was indecent to attempt, and not in their power to effect<sup>b</sup>. Before the next session a trumpet from the king brought a paper<sup>c</sup>, intitled, “Propositions of the princes, prelates, officers of the crown, &c.” addressed to the count de Belin, in quality of governor of Paris, demanding a conference, to be managed by deputies on both sides, in some place between Paris and St. Denis. The Spanish faction were for stifling this paper, yet the duke of Mayenne sent it to the states, but advised them to defer deliberating upon it, till his return from his journey to meet the duke of Feria, whom the king of Spain had sent to make his propositions to the states.

He quarrels with the duke of Feria, but afterwards acquiesces under the offers made him.

THE two dukes met and quarrelled at Soissons. The duke of Feria was for repealing the Salique law at once, and, that done, to declare the Infanta queen of France. The duke of Mayenne told him that it was impossible, and that he could not persuade the deputies to come into any such propositions, more especially considering the Spanish army under count Mansfield consisted but of five thousand men, and their pecuniary supplies were in the same proportion. The duke of Feria urged, that, when the thing was done, the king would march fifty thousand foot and ten thousand horse in support of his daughter's title, and would set open the flood-gates of his treasuries in favour of her adherents. The duke of Mayenne replied, that kingdoms were to be conquered by armies, or to be bought with money, and that to offer only promises was doing nothing. Feria told him haughtily, that he was better instructed as to the temper of the deputies, and that they would do it without him. Mayenne, more haughtily, replied, that all the world could not do it without him; but that, in eight days, he could reconcile all the different interests in the kingdom, and then drive the Spaniards, and all their adherents, out of a France<sup>h</sup>. The Spanish ministers soon taught the duke of Feria another language, and, by their assistance, all things were reconciled. The duke of Mayenne was offered, in case he procured the election of the Infanta, the duchy of Burgundy in sovereignty, the government of Picardy for life, the title and authority of lieutenant-general of the kingdom under the new queen, the payment of all his debts, twenty-five thousand crowns in hard money, security for two hundred thousand more, and the absolute command of the Spanish troops<sup>i</sup>. He seemed to acquiesce, and the two dukes, as good friends, having taken the city of Noyon, returned together to Paris.

ALL imaginable respect was paid to the duke of Feria, on his appearance in the assembly. But he quickly found that his own influence was much inferior to what he expected, and that of the duke of Mayenne much stronger than he could have imagined; and of this the most convincing proof appeared in the resolution taken to consent to the conferences proposed on the part of the Catholics in the king's service<sup>k</sup>. They were opened accordingly on the 29th of April, at Surenne, the archbishop of Bourges<sup>l</sup> being at the head of the king's commissioners, as the archbishop of Lyons was of those of the league<sup>m</sup>. While these conferences continued, the king thought himself at liberty to form the siege of Dreux<sup>n</sup>, and while he was thus employed, the duke of Feria was not idle at Paris. He observed that the faction of the sixteen were extremely provoked at the conferences, and at the hopes given of the king's becoming a Catholic. He misinterpreted this, as flowing from a blind devotion to the court of Spain; and thereupon roundly proposed to the states, that they should declare the Infanta queen, and the archduke Albert of Austria king in her right, to whom her father was inclined to give her in marriage<sup>o</sup>. The very warmest of the sixteen revolted at this proposition, and declared positively that they could never think of admitting at once of two foreign sovereigns. The duke of Feria then proposed the Infanta, on condition that she should espouse a prince of France, including the house of Lorraine, the choice of that prince to be left to his Catholic majesty. This occasioned debates and delays, and, in the mean time, they received a stroke from a quarter which they little expected; the parliament, by an arret<sup>p</sup>, dated the 18th of June, declared against any treaty for transferring the crown to strangers, as contrary to the Salique law, and to the fundamental principles of the government. The duke of Mayenne affected to be displeased with the first president le Maitre, notwithstanding which, it was generally believed that he was not so much surprised as he pretended<sup>q</sup>. The duke of Feria then proposed the declaring the Infanta queen, upon an assurance that she should marry the duke of Guise<sup>r</sup>. If he had made this proposal at first, it is not impossible he had carried his point; but now the duke of Mayenne scrupled his powers, and the duke of Guise, who foresaw that his fortune was for ever ruined if he manifested an inclination in favour of this overture, and be defeated in his hopes, behaved with great coolness and prudence. But, while they were thus perplexed at Paris, the king took his resolution, heard mass<sup>s</sup> on the 28th of July at St. Denis, received absolution from the archbishop of Bourges, in consequence of which a truce<sup>t</sup> was proclaimed for three months, to commence from the first of August. This chagrined the determined leaguers exceedingly; and some of their angry preachers declared from the pulpit, that no credit was to be given to the king's conversion, though published by an angel from heaven.

THE situation of the most outrageous leaguers being now a little unsafe, as, at the time that Henry the third appeared before Paris, they thought it high time to have recourse to their great expedient, to the success of which some of their best preachers devoted their oratory: neither was it without effect; for Pierre Barrier, a waterman on the Loire, and who had been also a soldier in their service, moved by the exhortations of those whom he took to be religious men, formed in his own mind<sup>u</sup> a strong resolution to kill the king, which he communicated to, and was encouraged in by, several ecclesiastics, particularly one of the parish priests at Paris. The last he consulted was a Dominican friar at Lyons, whose name was Seraphin Bianchi; this worthy man directed him to come again the next day, at a certain hour, at which he appointed also Brancaleon, a gentleman belonging to the queen-dowager, whom he directed to take great notice of that man, and to make all the haste he could to court, in order to apprize the king of his danger<sup>w</sup>. This gentleman, not finding it safe to travel, sent the picture of the assassin to the king, who, by this means, knew him, as by chance he met him on the road one day; and, having occasion to alight, gave him his horse to hold, supposing him to have been a peasant. At length Brancaleon arrived at Meulan, where the king then was, and, seeing the fellow soon after in the street, caused him to be apprehended. He confessed his intention: named the persons who had encouraged and exhorted him to fulfil it; and added, that, in case he was taken up, he was advised to throw the blame a on the count of Soissons, as the person who first put it in his head. The count being present at this examination, and the man having no knowledge of him, rendered it plain, that this was only an artifice to help out one villainy by another. Barrier was executed as a traitor on the last of August <sup>x</sup>.

Success of the royalists in the provinces, and the office of constable bestowed on Montmorency.

The marshal Matignon acted with great vigour, and besieged Blaise, to the relief of which the Spaniards sent a fleet: the marshal procured a small squadron of Dutch ships that were at Ro-chelle to come to his assistance; and joining to these two or three Eng'ish vessels, he went on board them, engaged and beat the Spaniards, who returned, notwithstanding, in a dark night, upon the coast, relieved and victualled the place, and then retired <sup>y</sup>. The marshal, having assembled as great a force as he was able, marched, in obedience to the king's orders, to join him. Lesdiguières was still successful against the duke of Savoy, and was likewise so fortunate as to dissipate three thousand Spaniards on the frontiers, and to destroy the greatest part of them <sup>z</sup>. In Provence the duke of Espèron had rendered himself so odious, that the king found it necessary to send his orders to Lesdiguières to assist the people in ridding themselves of his tyranny <sup>a</sup>. In Languedoc all things were so prudently conducted by the marshal de Montmorency, that the king, as the only suitable reward of his services, conferred on him the high office of constable of France <sup>b</sup>. He also permitted an assembly of the reformed, received from them a long memoir, consisting of upwards of fourscore articles <sup>c</sup>, gave them all the satisfaction in his power, and promised them still greater marks of gratitude and favour, with which, however, they were not intirely content, and, on the other hand, the king was as much displeased.

The duke of Mayenne intrigues afresh with the Spaniards, and imprisons his brother the duke of Nemours.

ACCORDING to the best lights that history affords us, the transactions at Paris had been chiefly governed by secret negotiations between the king and the duke of Mayenne, managed chiefly by the old secretary Villeroi, and the president Jeanin, who, though zealous Catholics, were true patriots, and sincerely attached to the king's service <sup>d</sup>. But the duke had other views than those with which he intrusted them; he had procured the states to renew the oath of union, and to establish the council of Trent without restriction; but one of the deputies of the third estate desired that a clause might be added, declaring that this was only so far to be regarded as should be consistent with the liberties of the Gallican church, which appeared so reasonable, that it could not be refused, and which in effect repealed all the rest. The king was not very well pleased with these proceedings, and much less when he detected him in fresh negotiations with the Spaniards, who were to furnish him with twelve thousand foot and six thousand horse <sup>e</sup>. The truth of the matter was, he delighted in his own authority, and studied by every means in the world to keep it up. He was jealous of his brother by the mother's side, the duke of Nemours, who had formed a design of marrying the Infanta, but had taken a firm resolution to render himself independent in the city of Lyons, and in the country adjacent; with which view he had directed a couple of fortresses to be built for bridling that great city. The duke of Mayenne, suspecting this, had no sooner concluded a truce with the king, than he sent the famous Dr. Peter Espinac, archbishop of Lyons, into his diocese, who so wrought upon the minds of the people, that they practised upon Nemours the old device of the barricades; and, having first confined him in his house, transferred him from thence to Pierre Encise, where they kept him in prison <sup>f</sup>. The duke of Mayenne was more excusable for this than for treating afresh with the court of Madrid, for the marriage of his own son with the Infanta; upon which he promised to re-assemble the states, now tacitly dissolved, and to proceed to an immediate election <sup>g</sup>. The king, being well informed of all this, as well as with the conduct of his agent at the court of Rome, represented it in such strong terms to Monsieur de Villeroi, that, to justify the uprightness of his own conduct, he soon after quitted the duke of Mayenne, and retired, with all his family, to Pontois, of which his son was governor <sup>h</sup>. He was, at this time, reputed one of the ablest heads in France.

By this time five months had elapsed since the king's going openly to mass, without so much as a single place, at least of any consequence, declaring in his favour; which was the more extraordinary, as persons of distinction from all the adjacent places had been to see and pay their respects to him; and, in general, all the kingdom over: in the quarters of the league they began to drop the epithet of Navarre, and to call him simply the king <sup>i</sup>. This behaviour was owing to three causes; some were for making terms, and selling loyalty as dear as they could; many expected the Pope's decision, as to the validity of the king's absolution;

a and not a few hoped that the duke of Mayenne would put a speedy and effectual end to the troubles by making a general peace<sup>k</sup>. At length an event happened, which contributed not a little to draw the inhabitants of France out of their lethargy. Lewis de l'Hospital, marquis de Vitri, was the only man of rank who followed the example of the duke of Espernon, in quitting the king on the death of his predecessor; but he went farther than the duke, entering into the service of the league, by whom he was made governor of Meaux. He had often solicited the duke of Mayenne, as the cause of the war was at an end, to make his peace with the king; but, receiving no satisfaction from the duke, he resolved to follow the dictates of his conscience. On Christmas-eve he ordered his garrison to evacuate the town, and, having assembled the magistrates, he delivered them the keys. "Gentlemen," said he, "I scorn to b "steal a place, or to make a fortune at other men's expence. I am going to pay my duty to the king, and I leave it in your power to act as you please<sup>l</sup>." After he had quitted the room, the magistrates, on a short deliberation, broke up their assembly, and, as they went, cried out, Vive le Roy: the people soon caught the acclamation, and the next day, being Sunday, they posted a guard on the marchioness of Estrees and her children, till they sent a deputation to the king to make their submission, and to desire that he would send back their governor<sup>m</sup>. At their audience their deputies were so confounded, that they could say nothing, only they threw themselves at the king's feet. Henry, having considered them for some moments, burst into tears; then raising them up, "Do not come as enemies to ask pardon, but as children to a father, who is always ready to receive them with open arms<sup>n</sup>." At their request he sent c back the marquis de Vitri. This reception affected the league more than the greatest defeat could have done. The king, having lost all opinion of the duke of Mayenne's sincerity, at the close of the year declared the truce void<sup>o</sup>, of which, more especially of late, the leaguers made a very ill use. A. D. 1593.

It is now time to say something of the conduct of the court of Rome. The king, somewhat more than a year before, had sent cardinal Gondi and the marquis Pisani, to negotiate with the pontif, notwithstanding the extreme ill usage the duke of Luxemburgh, who had been sent by the Catholics adhering to the king, had met with from his predecessors; but the Pope would not suffer them to come to Rome, so that they were obliged to remain, one in the territories of the grand duke of Tuscany, and the other in those of the state of Venice. This was out of d fear of the Spaniards, and to save appearances with the league<sup>p</sup>. Seraphino Olivieri, auditor of the rota, took the liberty of giving the Pope a little good counsel: "Clement the seventh, "Holy Father," said he, "lost England to gratify Charles the fifth; Clement the eighth is about to lose France in complaisance to Philip the second<sup>q</sup>." After his declaring himself, the king sent a letter of submission to the Pope by Clielle, who went through all the political discipline of the papal dissimulation with infinite patience. The Pope had one James Sannesio about him, a man of slow parts, but honest and secret; through him he instructed Arnold d'Offat, who had occasionally acted as a kind of agent for the queen-dowager of France, and from him Clielle received proper hints<sup>r</sup>. At length the duke of Nevers was sent, with two ecclesiastics of rank, as the king's ambassador. He was also treated with a strange kind of mysterious
e insolence, received as duke of Nevers, not as the ambassador of a heretic prince; and though, at one of his audiences, he fell at the Pope's feet, and besought him to put an end to the miseries of France, with an effusion of tears, yet it was to no purpose. The Pope, says the historian<sup>s</sup>, was moved, but not softened; but the duke of Nevers, by changing his language, made more impression. He represented to Clement, that he had been abused by the Spaniards, and deceived by his legate; that the league was declining; that the Spaniards were not able to support it; that Henry was already master of two thirds of the kingdom; and that, as the greatest part of the nobility adhered to him, there was no doubt of his conquering the rest. This was to the point; the Pope now began to see sincerity in the king's conversion; and, though he did not immediately alter his behaviour, yet he gave the duke to understand, that he f need not regard it; and that, though he treated him like a dog, and his master as a relapsed excommunicated heretic, yet all in good time, that is, in proportion as the king's affairs mended, they might both hope for better usage. The Pope, it seems, was piously inclined to abandon the French rebels, as soon as it should be a clear case that they could not support themselves.

The king thought it necessary, in the beginning of the year, to go in person to Meaux, where he did for the people all they could possibly expect, confirmed all the magistrates in their posts, remitted their taxes for nine years, and not only confirmed the government of the marquis de Vitri, but granted the survivance to his son, without burdening them with any greater garrison than their governor's troop of gens d'arms<sup>t</sup>. lished a manifesto to justify his own conduct, addressed to the nobility and gentry of France; <sup>a</sup> the magistrates of Meaux did the like, addressing their discourses to the inhabitants of Paris <sup>u</sup>. The garrison of St. Denis surprised Charenton, the king reduced l'Ferti-Milon <sup>w</sup>; so that Paris was again in a manner blocked up, and its inhabitants every day alarmed with unwelcome news. The people of Lyons, having intelligence that the Spaniards were about to march a body of troops to secure their city, thought proper to secure it themselves; and, having sent for colonel Alphonso Ornano to support them, revolted, and declared for the king <sup>x</sup>, to the no small grief of their archbishop; not that he was much offended at the change, but that he missed the credit of making it, and thereby the opportunity of securing, at a proper time, the king's recommendation for a cardinal's hat, his passionate desire of which had been one principal cause of the troubles. The Sieur de la Chastre, intrusted with the government of the <sup>b</sup> provinces of Orleanois and Berri, after having applied in vain to the duke of Mayenne, thought it high time to make peace for himself; and, having explained his sentiments to the magistrates of Orleans, they very readily concurred with him <sup>y</sup>, so that, in the middle of February, all these provinces were detached from the league. The king confirmed la Chastre in his government, and in his dignity of marshal of France. He was one of the four created by the duke of Mayenne, at the opening of the states; upon which Monf. Chanvalon, a friend of his, said pleasantly to the duke, "You are begetting bastards, who will legitimate themselves at your expence." By the advice of his father the Sieur de Villeroi, who retired for that purpose to Pontoise, Monsieur d'Alincourt delivered up that important place to the king <sup>z</sup>. Henry was now intent upon the ceremony of his coronation, which, he resolved, should be <sup>c</sup> performed at Chartres, Rheims being still in the hands of the league. It was performed, with great solemnity, on Sunday the 27th of February, by Nicholas de Thou, assisted by five other prelates, who represented ecclesiastical peers, as the prince of Conti, the count of Soissons, the duke of Montpensier, the dukes of Luxemburgh, Rhetz, and Ventatour, held the places of the ancient lay peers. As some scruple was raised about the holy oil, the king sent for that of St. Martin, kept in the abby of Marmoutier at Tours, which satisfied the people full as well <sup>a</sup>. The cardinal legate, either out of zeal for the league, or pressed to it by his friends, the faction of the sixteen, published a letter <sup>b</sup>, addressed to all good Catholics, in which he assured them, that the Pope had not acknowledged the duke of Nevers as ambassador of France, and was resolved never to give absolution to the king. From this letter great effects were expected, <sup>d</sup> and much greater followed, but of a very different kind than those which the legate intended; for, as there were no reasons assigned, it was considered merely as an artifice of the Spaniards to perpetuate the war, upon which numbers of gentlemen quitted the quarters of the league, and retired into those of the king. This cardinal, bishop of Plaisance, was a zealous leaguer, and by birth a subject of the crown of Spain.

The duke of Mayenne
quits Paris, and leaves the count de Bri-
fac governor.

THE duke of Mayenne, as it may be naturally supposed, grew every day more uneasy, as, in effect, his situation grew every day more hazardous. He had of late, from motives that historians do not explain, listened more than ever to the proposals of the court of Spain, of which the king had authentic proofs. This lost that duke many of his old friends in Paris, and gained him very few new ones. The faction of the sixteen were irreconcilable; the politics <sup>e</sup> of the king's party abhorred his falshood, and he was still suspected by the Spaniards <sup>c</sup>. At length, not knowing well which way to turn, he retired with his family to Soissons, leaving the government of Paris, and the command of the French garrison, for there was also a Spanish, to the count de Brisac, from whom he exacted the strongest securities that words could give, that he would use all imaginable care to preserve the place <sup>d</sup>. The count de Brisac, when he came to examine things to the bottom, conceived this to be impossible, there being by this time a great majority of the best families intirely devoted to the king; so that, to avoid being borne down some time or other by the torrent, he held it best to go along with the stream. The provost of the merchants, Lullier, and the sheriff Langlois, were of the king's party, and it was with them, the president le Maitre, and the attorney general Molé, that he concerted <sup>f</sup> every thing <sup>e</sup>. In order to communicate with the king safely, he pretended to refer a family-dispute with his brother-in-law St. Luc to some persons of distinction in the law; upon which they met at the abbey of St. Anthony, where, having privately settled every thing, they had in public a great quarrel, and parted, in all appearance, open enemies <sup>f</sup>. At his return to court St. Luc spoke with all bitterness of his brother, and the king, in public, treated Brisac as a man devoted to the Spaniards. The new gate, which had been for some time blocked up, was the most convenient for the entrance of the royal troops; the count observed this in public, and that it might be easily opened, for which reason he gave orders it should be walled;

a in order to which it was unstopped of course. He posted there, for the greater security, and at the port of St. Denis, strong guards, under the command of the sheriffs Neret and Langlois.

THE day fixed for letting in the king's troops was the 22d of March<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Feria and Don Diego d'Ibarra had some intelligence, with strong suspicions, upon which they sent for the count de Brisac; he told them he believed there was nothing in it, but, for their satisfaction, he would go the rounds that night in person; which he did at two o'clock, taking with him some Spanish captains, who had orders from the duke of Feria, upon the least commotion, to dispatch the count. Out of pure complaisance he attended them back to their quarters, where, between jest and earnest, he rallied the duke of Feria upon his being too easily alarmed; but, when he retired, he gave orders to the next French guard to fire upon the Spaniards, if they offered to stir<sup>b</sup>. The king's troops were introduced without noise; and by five o'clock the king himself entered at the new gate, with the corps de reserve, commanded by the duke of Rhetz: he was met by the count de Brisac, who threw over his shoulders a fine embroidered scarf; the king gave him his own in exchange, embraced, and declared him marshal of France<sup>c</sup>. The whole was performed with very little stir; a corps of Lansquenets, consisting of about sixty men, who refused to cry Vive le Roy, were cut to pieces; and two or three leaguers, who attempted to raise the populace, were knocked on the head. Cardinal de Pelevé, archbishop of Rheims, the great incendiary of the league, lying sick in his bed, hearing that the city was taken, and the king in quiet possession, turned himself about, and, without saying a word, breathed his last<sup>d</sup>. At noon the king heard mass, and caused Te Deum to be sung at Notre Dame. He dined in the Louvre, and in the afternoon went to the gate of St. Denis, to see the Spaniards march out: they were in number about three thousand men, and the king allowed them the honours of war. The duke of Feria, Don Diego d'Ibarra, and Don Juan Baptista Taxis, saluted him with profound respect as they passed. The king returned the salute, and said, laughing, "My compliments, gentlemen, to your master; but don't come back any more<sup>e</sup>." By this time all the shops were open, and the city as quiet as if nothing had happened. The king rewarded every person who had any share in this event, exiled only a few of the obstinate leaguers, and more especially the clergy<sup>f</sup>. On the 30th of March, the parliament of Paris, now complete by the union of Chalons and Tours, declared null every thing that had been done against the royal authority from the last year of the late reign to that time. The rector of the university came and humbly asked the king's pardon; the faculty of divinity retracted all their decrees in favour of the league: and thus the quiet of the capital was intirely re-established<sup>g</sup>.

VILLARS, who had so gallantly defended Rouen for the league, and on whom the duke of Rouen and Mayenne, for that service, had conferred the title of admiral of France, treated with the king for the surrender of that place, and the baron de Rhosny was sent to conclude with him. He demanded four hundred thousand crowns, a pension of sixteen thousand livres, to be continued in his government, and three articles besides, which were harder than all these; that his government should be for three years independent of that of Normandy; that he should be confirmed in the office of admiral; and that Fescamp, which had long before yielded to the king, should be annexed to his government. Henry consented to them all, pacified the duke of Montpensier, who was governor of the province, raised Biron to the rank of marshal of France, and indemnified the governor of Fescamp, so desirous was he to be master of that important place<sup>h</sup>. A multitude of other places either made terms, or opened their gates without stipulating for any. The duke of Elbeuf, of the house of Lorrain, who had seized the government of Poitou<sup>i</sup>, without the consent of the duke of Mayenne, declared for the king. Marshal d'Aumont, with the assistance of an English fleet, commanded by Sir Martin Forbes<sup>j</sup>, beat the leaguers and the Spaniards, and recovered a great part of Bretagne out of the hands of the duke of Mercœur.

f THE Sieur de St. Pol, whom the duke of Mayenne had created marshal of France, held the government of Champagne, and treated the duke of Guise, who had pretensions upon it, with disrespect<sup>k</sup>. The duke, a young prince of great spirit, expostulating with him in the streets of Rheims, in favour of the people whom he oppressed, he not only gave him a surly answer, but laid his hand upon his sword, upon which the duke drew, and killed him upon the spot. The people, in whose quarrel it was done, and who were otherwise well affected to the duke, owned him for their governor. He treated immediately with the king; and, though he refused him all his demands, he accepted the propositions made on behalf of his majesty, and surrendered the province<sup>p</sup>. The city of Aix having declared for the king, Lefdiguieres, by his orders, a turned the duke of Espenon out of Provence<sup>q</sup>, the government of which, contrary to the advice of Chiverny the chancellor, and most of the council, the king conferred upon the duke of Guise<sup>r</sup>. In the autumn the king besieged and took Laon; upon which Amiens, and a great part of Picardy, declared for him<sup>s</sup>. The Pope still continued to act the same double part; and, after having obliged the duke of Nevers to leave Rome, and received the agents of the league with kindness and respect, he gave assurances to d'Offat, that he had the best intentions in the world towards the king, and would not fail, at a proper time, to discover them. The duke of Lorraine very wisely made his peace; and Baligny, the bastard of Montluc, bishop of Valence, who still held the principality of Cambray, submitted to the king<sup>t</sup>, and was confirmed in his post of marshal of France, bestowed upon him by the duke of Mayenne. b

HENRY, irritated by the behaviour of the Spaniards, and having a better opinion of his own power than formerly, was inclined to declare war against Philip, and to attack the Low Countries. He had certainly good, or at least plausible reason for this; but he was chiefly instigated by those who had their own ends in view. His mistress Gabriella d'Estrees was desirous of having a principality for her son. Baligny, the most avaricious man living, hoped to plunder. The duke of Bouillon had more extended views. His consort, the heiress of the great family of la Marck, was dead without issue, however he held her dominions, under colour of their being legally bequeathed to him by will; he thought to enlarge them, and at the same time to make a diversion in favour of the prince of Orange, to whose sister he was contracted. The king relished the project, but resolved to be well advised<sup>u</sup>. He returned c from Picardy to Paris, and, the same day, which was the 26th of December<sup>w</sup> (others<sup>x</sup> say the 27th), being in a chamber of the Louvre, and two noblemen coming in, as he went to embrace one of them, he received a stroke of a knife in his lip with such force, that it beat out one of his teeth<sup>y</sup>. Some writers<sup>z</sup> of good authority say it was his upper lip, and others<sup>a</sup> of equal authority say the lower; but, which-ever it was, the assassin intended it for his throat, and his stooping suddenly prevented it. The count of Soissons, who stood before the king, seeing a young man by him change colour, and endeavour to slip away, laid hold of him: "Friend, said he, "either you or I have wounded the king." Presently after, the knife was found upon the floor. At first he denied, but soon after confessed it<sup>b</sup>. His name was John Chastel, d in the nineteenth year of his age, the son of Peter Chastel, a draper, and a rich man. The youth was silly and very debauched; he had fallen into a fit of despair, in which had occurred to him, from the monstrous doctrines of those times, that he might expiate all his sins by killing the king. He had been educated amongst the Jesuits, and had picked up these principles amongst them<sup>c</sup>. This occasioned a strict inquiry into their conduct; and, in the chamber of John Guignard, one of the fathers of the society, there was found a treatise, written in his own hand, in which Henry the third was stiled the Nero and Sardanapalus of France; his murder justified and commended; and, in respect to Henry the fourth, it was said, that, though he had abjured his heresy, he would meet with milder treatment than he deserved, if he was deposed and confined to a convent for his life. The parliament, by an arret, condemned John Chastel to suffer as a traitor, his father to be banished Paris for ever, and the kingdom for e many years, because his son had revealed to him his design, for which, though he had reprimanded him severely, he had not either discovered it or confined him<sup>d</sup>. Father John Gueret, under whom he had studied, was banished for life; and Father Guignard condemned to be hanged<sup>e</sup>, not for composing those treasonable pieces, but for having them in his custody, after an arret forbidding the keeping of any such flagitious treatises, on pain of capital punishment. A pyramid of infamy was erected where the house of Chastel stood, and the Jesuits banished<sup>f</sup>. The other parliaments of the kingdom followed the example of Paris, except those of Bordeaux and Toulouse; and thus this affair ended: but the Jesuits, nine years after, were recalled, though the parliament opposed it, and some of the ablest lawyers in the kingdom wrote against them.

IN the beginning of the year the king made a great promotion of knights of the order, with a view to attach the nobility more particularly to his service. He declared war against Spain; and that he might carry it on with a better effect, he took into his pay the troops of Lorraine, consisting of about six thousand men<sup>g</sup>. The duke of Mayenne was still master of Burgundy, and of some strong places in Picardy, which were very troublesome; but, in the beginning of February, Baune revolted from him, called in marshal Biron, who secured it for the a king. The duke of Nemours, who had made his escape out of Pierre Encise, had seized Vienna, and, with some Swiss troops sent him by the duke of Savoy, endeavoured to block up Lyons<sup>b</sup>. Marshal Montmorency, marching thither with a considerable body of troops, not only relieved the last, but recovered the first-mentioned city, the loss of which affected Nemours to such a degree that it broke his heart, though others say he was poisoned. About the middle of May<sup>i</sup> Autun opened its gates to marshal Biron. The inhabitants of Dijon, the capital of Burgundy, encouraged by this example, expelled the viscount Tavannes, and declared for the king, who soon after repaired into Burgundy, in order to command his army in person<sup>k</sup>. Before his departure he committed the frontier of Picardy to the care of the duke of Nevers, the count de St. Pol, the duke de Bouillon, and the admiral de Villars, and declared the prince of Conti head of the council he left at Paris, which extremely offended the count de Soissons, who was never much in the king's favour<sup>l</sup>. The true design of the king's expedition was to gratify the ambition of his mistress, by the conquest of Franche Compté, which he proposed to bestow upon his son Cæsar, reserving the sovereignty not to himself, but to the Swiss cantons, to prevent their being jealous of this conquest, and to engage them to protect this new prince, in case he should die without lawful issue. A strange enterprize in itself, and which, notwithstanding, he prosecuted with such eagerness as was very near costing him his life, in which, the circumstances of France considered, he shewed himself a better father than a king, since his death, at this time, must have created a fresh civil war.

THE king made his entry into Troyes on the 30th of May, and from thence continued his march into Burgundy, where he had the news that Velasco constable of Castile had entered Henry, by a Mayenne<sup>m</sup>. The king, apprehending that they intended the relief of the castles of Dijon and Talan, ordered them both to be besieged, and, in the mean time, resolved, with a corps of fortunate re- merit, baffles the designs of the Spaniards, and engages the duke of Mayenne to quit them and retire to Cha- lons. cavalry, to harass the enemies army, in order to give time for the reduction of those places. This corps did not consist of above five hundred men. He had ordered his troops to rendezvous between Lux and Fontaine Francoise, fully determined to give the enemy battle; but continuing to advance, that he might the better inform himself of their strength, he fell in with their van-guard, charged them, and gave the highest proofs of his courage, at the expence of his prudence and conduct<sup>n</sup>. The troops he engaged and dispersed were those of the duke of Mayenne, who rode up immediately to the constable, and intreated him not to lose so great an advantage. The Spaniard answered, with great gravity, that he knew what he had to do, and, as a proof of it, would not advance at all. The duke then intreated him to spare fifteen hundred horse, but in vain<sup>o</sup>. The king, all this time, maintained the fight, till at length a body of eight hundred of his forces appeared in sight; upon which the constable recalled his cavalry, and retired<sup>p</sup>. Some writers<sup>q</sup> have from hence affected to say, that the king, with two hundred horse, meaning the squadrons he immediately commanded, defeated an army of fifteen thousand men, which is very far from the truth. The fact is, that by this happy temerity he carried his point, and, the two castles being taken, was in a condition to have given the Spaniards battle. On the other hand, the duke of Mayenne, not being able to engage the constable to do any thing for his service, and having but two places of consequence left, was on the point of retiring into Savoy. In these circumstances, the king, with great generosity, sent him word, that, if he would go to Chalons, he would grant him a truce of three months, in which they might treat of peace; which offer he very readily accepted<sup>r</sup>, and, under pretence of securing what he had still left, separated from the Spanish army, and marched to Chalons.

AFTER ravaging Franche Compté, which, after all, the Swiss cantons would not permit him to conquer, the king thought it necessary to go to Lyons, where he had many things of great importance to transact. He made his entry with great magnificence, and was received by the archbishop, who had been stiled the soul of the league, with all possible marks of duty and submission<sup>s</sup>. Mr. Bois-Dauphin, who held some places in Anjou and Maine, concluded a treaty with the king, by which he surrendered them. He was one of the duke of Mayenne's marshals, but the king would not permit him to make use of that title; yet, after he had signed, and came to pay his duty, the king, as a mark of his favour, restored him the bâton<sup>t</sup>. He was in hopes of concluding a treaty also with the duke of Savoy, but it ended only in a truce<sup>u</sup>. Lefdiguieres came thither to pay his respects, and to receive his commands, which chiefly regarded the expulsion of the duke of Espernon out of Provence, who was more troublesome there than ever, and who, in return to a message that the king had sent him to quit the province, with an intimation, if he did not, he would come and drive him out, he answered rudely, "Let him come, I shall be his harbinger, not to prepare him quarters, but a

 "to lay every place in ashes where he is to pass". The king was much less affected with this, than with the discovery which he received from various hands, that the duke, notwithstanding all his professions, had in reality sold himself to Spain, and received from his catholic majesty a great pension, paid him in hard money every month*. It was, however, some consolation, that, after infinite pains and infinite patience, the Pope was pleased, though not in the most gracious manner, to absolve the king on the 17th of September, in the persons of his two agents, du Perron<sup>y</sup> and d'Ossat, both afterwards honoured with the purple. But while on the score of this and some other favourable pieces of intelligence, the king feasted with his fair mistress, and amused himself agreeably in those parts, things changed their appearance in Picardy, where the Spaniards seemed desirous of shewing how much better they could make b war for themselves than in support of their allies, whom they sometimes relieved indeed, but never cordially assisted.

The conde Fuentes takes Dourlens and Cambray.

AT the very entrance of the campaign the duke of Longueville<sup>z</sup> was killed by a musket-ball, that happened to be by chance in the piece of a foot soldier of the guard, who saluted him at his entrance into Dourlens. Don Pedro de Gusman, conde de Fuentes, with an army of fifteen thousand men, and a good train of artillery, besieged Catelet; and, while he was thus employed, Monsieur Humieres laid a plan for the surprisal of Ham, a very strong place, where the Spaniards had a garrison of sixteen hundred men in the town, exclusive of the duke of Aumale's troops in the castle. This enterprize succeeded, but at the expence of its author, Monsieur d'Humieres, and several other brave officers, killed in the attack, which so incensed c
 the French, that they gave no quarter to the garrison<sup>a</sup>. Catelet having surrendered, the count de Fuentes invested Dourlens, assisted by the Sieur de Rosne, to whom the king had refused the confirmation of his title of marshal of France, which he had the greatest reason afterwards to repent. The duke of Nevers intended to have assembled an army for the relief of the place; but the marshal de Bouillon, the count de St. Pol, and admiral Villars, who had no mind to be commanded by him, undertook to do what he proposed before his arrival. But when they came to execute it, they quarrelled amongst themselves, which ruined the affair, and the admiral and Mr. de Sesseval were taken prisoners, and in cold blood murdered, because they had formerly deserted the league. Dourlens was soon after taken. The parliament, irritated at the share the duke of Aumale had in this transaction, declared him guilty of high treason, d and caused his effigies, dressed in a Spanish habit, and with a red scarf and garters, to be beheaded and quartered by the common hangman<sup>b</sup>. The Conde Fuentes next attacked Cambray, and, partly by force, partly by the assistance of the inhabitants, made himself master both of the place and of the citadel. Henry, on the first news of this siege, set out for the frontiers, having ordered his forces to assemble for their relief; but being met by the duke of Nevers on the road, he advised him to desist, looking upon the attempt as impracticable. As the king was a man of a quick temper, he made him so brisk an answer, that the duke immediately retired, took his bed, and died in a few days<sup>c</sup>, after having refused a visit which the king proposed to have made him. He was looked upon as one of the bravest, and, beyond comparison, a man of the greatest probity of his rank in France. With the forces that were in- e tended for the relief of Cambray, the king invested, or rather blocked up, La Fere, and while his forces were thus employed, he found no small trouble in adjusting the demands made upon him by his new friends of Rome, and by his old ones the Hugonots.

A. D. 1595.

The king
 grants very advantageous
 terms to the duke of May-enne, which are censured.

IN the beginning of the year the king finished his treaty with the duke of Mayenne, fortified by an edict dated at Folembray in the month of January. In this edict<sup>d</sup> the king speaks very respectfully of the duke, promises an intire oblivion for what was past, discharges him from any account for the public money he had received, restores him and his adherents to their estates, declares him and all the princes and princesses of his house to stand uncharged with respect to the murder of the late king, grants him the towns of Seure, Chalons, and Soissons, for his security, gives the government of the former to his son, for six years, independent of f that of Burgundy, charges himself with the payment of three hundred and fifty thousand crowns, due from the duke to private persons, and transfers all his public debts of whatever nature upon the crown. This agreement seemed too favourable to many, and not a little strange to all, more especially as the king treated with him expressly as the chief of his party, and promised oblivion and his favour to all who would embrace it in quality of adherents to the duke. Some ascribe this to the intercession of Gabrielle d'Etrées, but it seems more probable that it was owing to some other causes. As great as these conditions were, the duke might have obtained still more advantageous, if he had treated in time; but he always declared that he would wait for the Pope's absolution, that he would treat as the head of a party,

- a and that all his public and private engagements should be fulfilled. He remained firm to these, and his firmness recommended him to the king. He was persuaded that the duke had a perfect knowledge of the affairs and interests of the kingdom, foreign and domestic; and he felt so many inconveniences from the rancorous resentment of the duke of Aumale and the Sieur de Rosne, that he was resolved not to force a man of the duke of Mayenne's wisdom and weight to throw himself into the arms of Spain. He considered that, from the beginning of the war, the duke of Mayenne had manifested a constant respect for his person, and, what errors forever he had committed, had fairly saved his crown, by preventing the assembly of the states from proceeding to an election, which must have been attended with a long, hazardous, and perhaps disastrous war<sup>c</sup>. The duke came soon after to Monceaux, which, with the title of a
- b duchy, he had given to Gabrielle d'Etrées, to kiss the king's hand, and met with such a reception, as attached him intirely to this monarch's service for the remainder of his life.

ABOUT this time one Francis de la Ramee appeared at Rheims, and endeavoured to get himself crowned king of France. He pretended to be the son of Charles the ninth and Elizabeth of Austria, and that he had been exposed by order of the queen-mother, and bred up by the gentleman for whose son he was taken. Some people of distinction believed this strange story, and relieved him. He appears to have been an enthusiast as much as an impostor; however, he was convicted, condemned to be hanged, and suffered<sup>f</sup>. The duke of Joyeuse, who, upon the death of his brother, had quitted his convent, and the name of friar Hugh, to put himself at the head of one of the armies of the league, made his peace, surrendered Toulouse, and was created marshal of France. The new duke of Nemours took the same method, and was very kindly treated<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Guise found himself very little at ease in his new government. He had the Spaniards, the leaguers, the duke of Savoy, and the duke of Espernon, to deal with; little money, and very few troops. In this perplexed situation he meditated the surprisal of Marseilles, though there was a Spanish fleet in the harbour; he was so fortunate as to effect this by the assistance of Peter de Libertat, a Corfican, and with the hazard of his own person. When the news came to Henry the fourth, he could not help crying out, At length then I am a king<sup>h</sup>. The duke of Guise, in a short time after, drove Espernon to such difficulties, that he seemed inclined to retire, and the provincials were so desirous to be rid of him, that they presented him with a free gift of fifty thousand crowns, and c added thirty thousand more to content his officers. He went, notwithstanding all this, to court, and obtained of the king the government of the Limousin by way of an equivalent<sup>d</sup>. In that juncture, Henry bestowed rather from apprehension than inclination.

THE blockade of La Fere, which had now lasted all the winter, was turned into a siege, which the king commanded in person. The cardinal, archduke Albert, had assumed the government of the Low Countries, and had brought with him such supplies of men and money, as, exclusive of the forces that acted against the states of Holland, left it in his power to assemble twenty thousand men, with a good train of artillery, with which he resolved to carry the war vigorously into France, and a very strange accident put it in his power to do more than he ever expected. Henry, for very particular reasons, had refused to include the Sieur Rosne in his treaty with the duke of Mayenne. One of those reasons was, that he had begun to practise with Rosne himself, who, on the first proposition, answered roundly, "Tell the king that I am in debt twenty thousand crowns; let him enable me to pay that, and get out of this country (he was then at Brussels) and I shall with great joy throw myself at his feet<sup>k</sup>." By some indiscretion in those whom the king had employed, this was discovered to the Spaniards, who immediately sent for Rosne, and as he went to the council, he received a note, in which were these words, Save yourself, or you are undone. He tore it immediately, went on, entered the council with an assured countenance, and told them, that, when they sent for him, he was coming to make them a proposal of importance. He was thereupon ordered to withdraw. Don Diego d'Ibarra, who hated the duke of Mayenne, and all that belonged to him, e was for punishing without hearing him; but the Conde Fuentes asserting, that Rosne had done great service the last campaign, was a very able officer, and capable of great things, it was resolved to hear him<sup>i</sup>. Rosne immediately proposed the taking of Calais, and shewed that it was not only possible, but easy. The archduke was charmed with his plan; and this man, who had entered the council a criminal, came out a favourite. The whole direction of affairs was left to him; and before the king was well apprized of his danger, the principal posts were forced, and the town taken. The stormy weather prevented the Dutch; and, it is said, the English, who had it in their power to save it, declined that service (B). The king, who

(B) The loss of Calais was not only great in itself, but brought much discredit on the king's affairs. Its fortifications were in a miserable condition, and those intrusted with the defence of it very negligent, which probably had advanced with a body of cavalry into its neighbourhood, returned to the siege of La Fere. Calais was taken the 22d of April<sup>m</sup>. La Fere surrendered to the king on the 22d of May<sup>n</sup>; it was a place of very great consequence; but the loss of Ardes, which was taken the very next day by the Sieur de Rhosne, against the opinion of the Spaniards themselves, chagrined the king extremely. Rhosne did not enjoy his reputation long, being killed the same year by a cannon shot at the siege of Hulst<sup>o</sup>.

Public affairs
plexity.

CARDINAL de Medicis, whom the pope had sent legate into France, made his entry into Paris on the 25th of July; the king had just reason to be pleased with his conduct. He treated with contempt some endeavours to excite new disputes with the court of Rome, and did all that was in his power to promote peace<sup>n</sup>. The king, notwithstanding, found his affairs very much embarrassed; the duke of Mercoeur still supported himself in Bretagne, by the assistance of the Spaniards, and amused the king with a very insincere negotiation, notwithstanding he had permitted his sister, the queen-dowager, to make him a visit, and to offer him all that he could desire. The Hugonots, prompted by the dukes of Bouillon and Trimouille, were on the point of taking dangerous resolutions, which the king had much ado to prevent<sup>a</sup>. His finances were in such disorder, that in the camp before La Fere he wanted the common necessities of life<sup>r</sup>. Henry, however, kept up his spirits; he sent marshal Biron into Artois, where he treated the country in the same manner the Spaniards had treated France. His affairs requiring it, he concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with England and Holland<sup>s</sup>; and, in order to settle his domestic concerns, he called an assembly of the notables at Rouen, an epidemic disease prevailing at Paris, where many good regulations were made, and some steps taken to pacify the Hugonots<sup>c</sup>. The queen of England, as a mark of her sincere reconciliation, sent him the order of the garter<sup>u</sup>.

Amiens sur-

Spaniards.

THE Hugonots, who had transferred their first assembly at Laudon to Vendosme, and from thence to Chateleraut, continued to give the king infinite disquiet, notwithstanding all the methods he could possibly take to make them easy<sup>v</sup>. He suspected, and with good reason, that there was more of faction and intrigue, than of concern for religion, in their manner of behaviour; for, while the kingdom was in this distress, they fortified and garrisoned their own places, instead of sending troops to his assistance. To supply their expences, they seized the probably was owing to their having no apprehensions from England, and the bad state of the king's finances. But, after all, there were other circumstances which contributed not a little to its being so quickly taken. Rhosne, whose life and fortune depended upon the success of the expedition, surprized the bridge of Niculle, and the fort of the Risbank, before the governor, the garrison, or the inhabitants, were recovered from their first consternation. The king shewed his activity and his courage, in embarking himself with a handful of men, in hopes of entering the port; but the weather was so bad, that the execution of this design proved impracticable to him and the Dutch, who had also made an embarkation with the same view. After all, the French endeavoured to throw the blame entirely upon queen Elizabeth. They say, that the earl of Essex was then in the channel with a fleet and army; and, that if he had but made a shew of landing, the Spaniards must have raised their siege. Monf. de Sanci, then in England, pressed queen Elizabeth extremely upon this head, to which she answered, "I see that Calais is lost, if I don't undertake its defence; and I will, provided the king will leave it in my hands." "Madam," replied Sanci, "the king is at hand to prevent its being lost, or to retake it if it should." But if you must, returned the queen, had not you rather it were in my hands, than in those of the Spaniards. We would not have it, answered Sanci, in the hands of either; but, if this must happen, we had rather it should be in the hands of the Spaniards than yours. To this the queen answered with some warmth, I cannot believe, Sir, that you have your master's orders to talk to me in this strain. No, madam, replied Sanci, the king never gave me any orders of this kind, because he could never have imagined, his affairs being in such circumstances, you could have formed such a demand. The king sets so high a value upon your friendship, that he conceives nothing could repair the loss of it. But if you were in possession of Calais, you must become his enemy of consequence; for the French cannot endure those who despoil them of their best places. We know what time and trouble it cost us to expel the English. If the Spaniards should take it, they will not be able to keep it long; and we persuade ourselves, madam, you would join your forces to ours, in order to drive them out. The queen said, that she would acquaint the king, her brother, with her intentions, by her ambassador; and accordingly lord Sidney informed him, that, tho' the queen had affairs of great importance to the common cause upon her hands, yet she was content to relieve Calais, provided she might retain it as a security for the large sums she had lent him. But the king turning his back, said, that, if it must be torn, he had rather it should be by a lion than by a lioness. Our own writers, in what they say, agree perfectly well in this account; the fleet then preparing was for the expedition against Calix, but it was not in such readiness as the French authors affirm. On the contrary, when the news came of the danger of Calais, the queen on the 9th of April, which was Good Friday, issued her orders to the mayor and aldermen of London to press a thousand men for that service, who were ready before night, and being furnished with all necessaries, might have marched the next morning for Dover; but on Saturday afternoon they were all discharged. Yet on Easter-Day, about ten in the morning, the same orders were given, and the church doors being shut, a thousand men were pressed by noon, the best part of them sent away that night, and the rest the next morning towards Dover, and other corps resorted from different parts to the same place; but in a week's time they returned, Calais being taken. The reason assigned was, that the French were more inclined to let it fall into the hands of the Spaniards than into those of the English; and Henry is reported to have made use of this expression on the occasion; We are old enemies, and but new friends.

a public money; and, in their addressees to him, took such freedoms as chagrined the king the more, because the zealous catholics testified a malignant joy at these proceedings, and the dukes of Savoy and Mercœur insisted upon higher terms than formerly, and seemed less disposed than ever to peace. While things were in this situation, an event happened which threw the king and kingdom into absolute confusion *. Don Ferdinand Tello de Portocarrero, who commanded the Spanish garrison in Dourlens, formed a design of surprising Amiens. The king, who saw that place was exposed, would have put a corps of Swiss troops into it; but the inhabitants, who had opened their gates to the king, were averse to it, and the king, on that account, was unwilling to give them any just cause of discontent. Portocarrero, that he might the better know how to take his measures, went thither several times, sometimes in one disguise, sometimes in another. At length he brought his design to bear; and, with very little effusion of blood, made himself master of the place on the 11th of March †.

THE news of this misfortune affected the king more than any thing that had ever happened to him. He sent for the baron de Rhosny, and complained to him passionately, that he was surrounded with difficulties and dangers, and entirely destitute of the means to defend himself; that the Hugonots were ready to revolt on one side; that the Spaniards pushed him hard on the other; that the small number of troops he had about him could scarce be called an army; and that his want of money, though extreme, was not greater than his want of resources and credit. Rhosny gave him the best comfort he could, and undertook to form a scheme for delivering him out of his distress. In a few hours he brought him a memoir, which raised the king's spirits; he copied it with his own hand, and resolved to take the honour of it to himself, not to lessen the merit of the baron's service, but to give it the greater weight in his council. This had the desired effect. He raised, by a voluntary loan, by engaging his faith for repayment in two years, with interest, six hundred thousand crowns; he raised the Gabelle; and to stop all enquiries into their ill management, he drew from those intrusted with the receipt of his revenues, in a very short time, two millions and a half, by way of contribution; and, that they might be better managed for the future, he put the baron at the head of the finances ‡. These acts of prudence and vigour put it in his power to besiege Amiens.

WHILE the necessary preparations were making for this purpose, the king was obliged to go to Paris, on account of a distemper which was the effects of his debauches, and there it was he spent in his chamber the most melancholy three weeks of his life; for, having good intelligence from some about him, who would not on any terms conceal the truth, he understood the real state of his affairs, which were never in a worse condition. The loss of Amiens had cooled that spirit which before prevailed of imploring his clemency, and expiating past faults, by present assistance. It was a wind that fanned the dying ashes of the league; and the duke of Mercœur, having persisted in his revolt in hopes of some such turn, received with open arms such as retired into Bretagne, and encouraged all who were capable of causing little castles or villages to revolt, who were near him §. The duke of Savoy carried the war on briskly, and would certainly have made great impressions on France, if Lefdiguieres, without any assistance, had not baffled all his projects ¶. Even the duke of Florence, who had acknowledged the king so early, and had done him so many services, thought him now in so weak a condition, that he seized the island and castle of If, which, in some measure, commanded the port of Marseilles, without troubling himself about an excuse †. But what affected the king more than all the rest, and forced from him complaints that were not suitable to his character, were the attempts made by the three dukes of Montpensier, Bouillon, and Trimouille, to establish a third party, under the title of Bons-Francois, or True Patriots, under the protection of the queen of England; and in consequence of this strange design, the refusal of the Hugonots to march any troops to his assistance, under pretence that they were afraid of a new St. Bartholomew in the field; the very thought of which the king abhorred. In this distress he sought the assistance of the parliament, in a manner very different from that in which he had treated them, when he forced them to register the edict in favour of the duke of Mayenne. However, he had much better fortune than his predecessor; his misfortunes operated in his favour, his old friends stuck fast by him, and his new ones exerted themselves in a manner that he did not expect ‡, and which justified his former conduct towards them.

THE baron de Rhosny reproached the Hugonots for their behaviour, and shewed them the folly of forming a faction against a prince, who was inclined to do for them all they could reasonably ask. Lefdiguieres, upon whom they had great dependence, gave them to understand, that he not only disapproved their conduct, but that, if they persisted in their designs, he would turn his forces against them. At length, by dint of Rhosny's influence, Lefdiguieres's menaces, and the king's granting them all that they asked, they were prevailed upon to be

Henry exceedingly affected with his misfortunes, and is luckily supported by Rhosny.

Becomes more uneasy at Paris, which excites a general spirit in his friends to assist him, and to recover Amiens.

The cardinal archduke marches to its relief, fails, and Amiens is recovered.

quiet, and the third party came to nothing <sup>a</sup>. The duke of Mayenne made a great stir. He told his old friends that the only way to shew they had formerly acted upon principle, was not to spare either their persons or their purses for the king: the queen of England sent over a body of four thousand good foot; and when the king came in person to the siege of Amiens, he quickly increased his army to thirty thousand men <sup>b</sup>. But while he had been taking his measures, the Spaniards had fortified the place, in which they had a numerous garrison, composed of their best troops, commanded by Portocarrero, who made continual sallies, till, very luckily for the French, he was killed by a cannon shot <sup>c</sup>. The garrison then chose for their governor Don Jerom Caraffa, marquis of Montenegro, a man of cool but determined courage. who prosecuted his predecessor's plan, retrenched himself within the town, and gave the archduke time to march to his relief, with twenty-five thousand men, all old troops, and by much the best in the Spanish service. On their approach, there arose great debates among the king's council. Marshal Biron advised the king to give the enemy battle in the field; the duke of Mayenne vehemently opposed this; the king said coolly, What then is to be done? "Sire," replied the duke, you came hither to recover Amiens, and not to gain a victory. To fight, "is to stake your kingdom upon the fortune of a day, against an army equal in number, "and composed of excellent troops. Remain in your lines; I know the Spaniards, they are "slow and cautious, and will not be forward to force you <sup>d</sup>." The king took his advice. The archduke, with his army, advanced towards the lines. The troops in the trenches fell into a panic, and ran away. The duke of Mayenne kept a continual discharge of his artillery, that the smoke might conceal the misfortune, and marched in person to repair it. <sup>e</sup> The archduke, through his caution, lost his opportunity. He advanced a second time to attack the weakest part of the intrenchments. The duke of Mayenne posted six pieces of cannon so opportunely, and they did such terrible execution, that the Spanish forces retired. If they had advanced briskly two hundred yards farther, they had done their business. The duke caused that weak part to be fortified, and on a third attempt they were repulsed with loss, upon which the archduke retired, and the place surrendered on the 25th of September, on honourable terms <sup>f</sup>. The king would needs carry the news to Arras, where the archduke lay sick; and, having advanced with his army pretty near the walls, he saluted them with a discharge of his artillery, and resolved to conclude the campaign with the siege of Dourlens, that the enemy might be removed to a greater distance from his frontiers; but the bad season <sup>d</sup> of the year, and the fatigue of his troops, constrained him to desist from that design <sup>e</sup>; which, for that reason, it had been better he had never undertaken.

Amazing
change of the king's affairs,
and happy escape from secret conspiracies.

THE king was received at Paris, on his return from the campaign of Amiens, with all possible marks of loyalty and respect. The face of his affairs was entirely changed; and he saw himself now on the point of becoming entirely master of his kingdom <sup>1</sup>. Lefdiguieres, though constrained to raise money upon his own credit, and by what other methods he could devise, had disappointed all the views of the duke of Savoy, notwithstanding the assistances he received from Spain, had taken from him five or six places, had repulsed his army with loss, when attacked in his intrenchments, and more than once beat his troops in the field. Infomuch that the duke, quite tired out by this Fox of Dauphine, as he called him, who was <sup>e</sup> never to be out-witted, began to think seriously <sup>m</sup> of peace; the rather, because he understood that his Catholic majesty intended, by the mediation of the pope, to put an end to the war without delay. Henry was far from being averse to either of these treaties, though he had discovered that the court of Madrid had still some partizans in Paris, who, under the beloved title of the council of sixteen, had begun to hold private meetings after the taking of Amiens. But being discovered and secured, seven of them were hanged, and others banished; two advocates, one of Beauvois and the other of Paris, by whose assistance the duke of Mercœur carried on a correspondence with the archduke in Flanders, were, by an arret of the parliament, condemned to be broke alive upon the wheel at the Greve, which sentence was executed with the utmost severity. But the king spared the life of Peter Owen, a Carthusian <sup>f</sup> monk, and a native of Bretagne, with whom the Spaniards had treated to procure a person to attempt the king's life, because, before it was discovered, it appeared that he repented of his design; and the man being dead with whom he had tampered, refused to proceed any further <sup>n</sup>. The king consented likewise that marshal de Brisac, who commanded for him in Bretagne, should conclude a truce with the duke of Mercœur for the remainder of the year, to take place from the middle of October; and he sent M. de Villeroy to the frontiers, to settle with Mr. Richardot, the minister of the cardinal archduke, the place and time for opening the conferences for the conclusion of a general peace <sup>o</sup>. The duke of Luxembourg, who had been twice there before, was the king's minister at Rome, and very well received; but the

a secret remained with Arnold d'Offat, one of the ablest and one of the honestest ministers in the king's service; and yet he was more fortunate in this respect than most of his predecessors<sup>p</sup>. For in no period the French monarchy ever produced better officers or abler statesmen than A.D. 1597. under this reign.

THE king, while his ministers were treating of a peace with Spain, meditated an expedition, which he thought might restore at once the interior quiet of the kingdom. In order to this, having sent the constable to command in Picardy with a small corps of troops, knowing well that the Spaniards had not inclination or force to give him much disturbance, he ordered the marshal de Brisac to renew the war in Bretagne, and not to listen to any propositions whatever. The marshal pursued his instructions with spirit and success. In the beginning of February the king began his march with two thousand horse, and ten thousand foot, directly towards Bretagne. On his approach, six or seven of the principal nobility of that duchy rendered their fortresses, and made their peace with the king<sup>q</sup>. The duke of Mercœur was so astonished, that he gave all for lost, and resolved to make his peace also on the best terms he could. He was indeed the dupe of his own politics, and this to the very last; for as, at the beginning, he had flattered himself with the hopes of keeping the duchy of Bretagne, in right of his wife, so, at this very juncture, he scarce made any doubt that he should have been comprized in the general peace, as an ally of Spain. But finding himself on the point of being attacked by a royal army, and at the same time on the brink of being deserted by most of his dependents, he was obliged to have recourse to an expedient, which, though it operated much better than he could expect, was a resource not very pleasing to himself, and extremely mortifying to his duchess, the heiress of the house of Penthièvre, and one of the proudest women in France. What made it still more afflicting to her was, the untoward circumstance of being obliged to go in person as a suppliant to Angiers, where the king was, and to make the proposition herself<sup>r</sup>. This was to give their only daughter to the king's natural son, whom the courtiers, to please his father and flatter his mother, called Cæsar-Monsieur. This was accepted, and the king gave his son the duchy of Vendosme, with that of Beaufort, after the decease of his mother; on the other hand, the young princess was to have the duchies of Estampes, Penthièvre, and Mercœur. The duke was likewise obliged to resign, in favour of his son-in-law, the government of Bretagne; and the king, to make all things sure, caused the young couple to be immediately contracted, and soon after married by the cardinal de Joyeuse, with as much pomp as if he had been his lawful and not his legitimated son<sup>s</sup>. The king went afterwards to Rheims, to hold the states of Bretagne, and from thence to Nantes. In the space of two months, which the king spent in this country, he amassed twelve hundred thousand crowns in ready money, two thirds of which arose from the free gift of the states, and was a very seasonable supply for his coffers, which were in a great measure emptied by the expence of the war, and the vast sums which the settlement of his son had cost him, and by which he was rendered the richest prince in France.

By this time the Hugonots also had altered their manner of thinking, and were very solicitous to have their affairs once for all settled, upon which subject they had followed the king from Blois to Nantes, and there it was that they at length procured the famous edict<sup>t</sup>, bearing the name of that place, dated the last of April, which for a while procured him quiet, and ought to have secured to them a perpetual and solid establishment in France. The commissioners on the part of the king were the Sieurs de Schomberg, de Thou, de Calignon, and Jeanin; and the deputies from the Protestants were the Sieurs de Conflans, de la Mothe, de Casès, and Chamier. This last was minister of Montelimar, and one of the ablest and worthiest persons in that communion. According to some<sup>u</sup>, it was he who drew the edict, which was well considered, and highly favourable to the reformed. It is certain there was at least as much of policy and apprehension, as of gratitude or inclination, in what the king did for them. On one hand he was much estranged by their behaviour, and by the ingratitude of their chiefs, who sought chiefly to render themselves formidable by a pretended zeal for religion. On the other, the lords of the Catholic league had lately rendered him very important services, and professed themselves zealously attached to his person and government. But the fear he had, that, if the Hugonots took arms, they might not only draw foreigners again into their kingdom, but also retard the peace with Spain, and afford a pretence for reviving the Catholic league, made him willing to grant them favourable terms: but, above all, his desire of peace, that he might have an opportunity of remedying the disorders and extinguishing the grievances of which his subjects of all ranks complained, induced him to grant this edict, and to maintain it, after it was granted, with that firmness which became a king, conscious that he had acted from no other motive, and that what he had done could have no other tendency, than promoting the general tranquility and public good (C). Henry, when a he was secure as to the rectitude of his measures, was equally eloquent and firm in their support.

By the peace of Vervins, the king obtains that tranquility necessary to restore the public welfare.

THE conferences for the peace with Spain were carried on very successfully at Vervins, under the mediation of the cardinal of Florence, the pope's legate, and Francis Gonzagua, bishop of Mantua, who had the title of nuncio; the French plenipotentiaries were Messieurs de Bellievre and Sillery, successively chancellors of France; and on the part of the archduke (for the king of Spain would treat no otherwise than through him) were, the president Richardot, the commander de Taxis, and the Sieur Verreiken, who had a high office in the administration of the Low Countries <sup>w</sup>. As both parties were eager for peace, it had been very soon concluded, but for the respect due to their allies. Queen Elizabeth sent over Sir Robert Cecil, and the states employed count Justin of Nassau, to persuade the king not to conclude, and even to offer him a new alliance, by which the maritime powers were to furnish him with a numerous corps of troops to augment his army, and to maintain them at their own expence <sup>x</sup>. The influence of the court of Rome, and the advantages the king promised himself from the peace, induced him to reject these offers, and to endeavour by all the arguments possible (in which, however, it has been doubted whether he was sincere) to engage them to concur with him in his views, and to accommodate their differences with Spain. But they declared flatly against that measure, not that the queen herself was so much against this measure, but that she was determined not to separate her interests from those of the republic; and the states having intercepted some of king Philip's letters, were but too well apprized of the sentiments of the court of Madrid to think of making peace <sup>y</sup>. On the other hand, the Spaniards had as much to do with the duke of Savoy, who would not hear of the restitution of the marquisate of Saluces, though taken from the crown of France in a time of full peace. At length an expedient being proposed to leave that matter to the decision of the pope, it was agreed to. The treaty of Vervins was signed on the 2d of May <sup>z</sup>; but it was not to be published till the 12th of June, in order to afford some kind of satisfaction to the queen of England and

(C) This famous edict bore date at Nantes, April 13th 1598, and besides re-establishing in a most solid and effectual manner all the favours that ever had been granted to the reformed by other princes, and particularly by this predecessor, there were added some which had not been either imagined or demanded before; particularly the granting them a free admission to all employments of trust, profit, and honour, the establishing chambers in which the members of the two religions were equal, and the permitting their children to be educated without constraint in any of the universities. The Protestants were so well satisfied with this edict, that they appointed deputies to attend the king, with their thanks, and ordered public prayers to be made for his prosperity. His illustrious historian, who was also a firm and zealous Protestant, applauds the temper, moderation, and steadiness, with which Henry made and adhered to this edict. He gives us a full account of the circumstances of his master at the time he granted it, and from thence shews that he was extremely willing to extinguish religious as well as civil feuds amongst his subjects, for which he applauds him highly. We learn also from him, that the edict was no sooner signed than he resolved to make the duke of Bouillon acquainted with his real sentiments. The duke had the gout at the time, and was confined to his room. The king made him a visit, ordered every body to retire, and, when the room was cleared, told that great lord he must hear him without interruption. He then entered into a long detail of the favours he had heaped upon him, of the strange returns he had made, of his immeasurable ambition, of all the intrigues into which he had entered, and of the measures he had pursued to excite jealousies of him amongst the Protestants. In vain the duke offered to make excuses; the king told him there needed none, for that as an old friend, and one equally sensible of and grateful for past services, these were both forgiven and forgot; but that, for the future, if he trod in his old paths, and made it his business to throw the cloak of religion over pernicious practices, instead of expostulating with him as he did now with the freedom of an old acquaintance, he should treat him with the language that became his master and his king. He discoursed with the like freedom to his parliaments; and, as he spoke well, he was commonly well heard, and what he said made a great impression. He told the parliament of Paris, who had made very warm remonstrances upon his directing them to register this edict, that he was surprized to find they doubted his being a Catholic, when the pope and the king of Spain were convinced of it. He owned to them that necessity was the parent of this edict; but not such a necessity as some of them imagined. He avowed the necessity he meant to be that of a general and solid peace. He told them the state of the kingdom, and the safety of the Catholic religion required this; that in point of religion there was nothing to be done by violence; that when he was himself a Protestant, and at the head of the Protestants, that he had always found persecution did them service; that by driving men of conscience and constancy to extremities, it furnished the Protestants with troops that were invincible, even by defeats; that it was idle to think of beating men out of their faith; and that if they had really a mind to convert the Protestants, they must amend their lives, and render their actions conformable to their doctrines. He added, that he was a Catholic king; but that he was a shepherd as well as a king, and would not sacrifice one part of his flock to please the other. He expatiated on the pains he had taken to unite and quiet all parties, by granting them whatever they could reasonably desire, notwithstanding any offences he might have received. He told them farther, that it was not through weakness or fear that he made use of this language, for that he knew where to find twenty thousand men who would make his will the law; but that this would be acting like a tyrant, which he despised and abhorred. He told them that he was always ready to hear their remonstrances, and not theirs only, but those of the meanest of his subjects. He concluded with advising them to have for the future no other emulation than who should appear the best Christians and the best subjects. His advice was received as it deserved, and the edict was verified, as will be shewn in the text.

- a the states, who, notwithstanding, highly disapproved the king's conduct, with which the latter had the least reason to be satisfied, and with which, notwithstanding, the former seemed to be the most offended. All these great affairs being concluded in four months time, gave the king very high pleasure, though it suffered some abatement from the reproaches he met with from the queen of England, so much the more cutting as he owed her infinite obligations <sup>a</sup>. The archduke sent to Paris the duke of Arscot and the admiral of Arragon, to assist at the ceremony of the king's swearing to the performance of the treaty of Notre Dame. On the other hand, the king, in the month of July, sent Monsieur Biron, whom he had lately created duke and peer of France, together with Messieurs Beilievre and Sillery, to Brussels, to be present at the like ceremony on the part of the cardinal archduke <sup>b</sup>. A circumstance that
- b would not have been found in this history, if there had not been good grounds to suppose that this journey gave a beginning to those intrigues that cost France so dear, and at length brought the unfortunate marshal duke de Biron to the block; for the Spanish ministers had been so long and deeply immersed in treasons, that they could not lay them aside.

- THIS year likewise the king, by the negotiation of Arnold d'Offat, concluded a treaty with the great duke of Tuscany, which was attended with singular complaisance on both sides. The king had discovered some intrigues of the grand duke in Provence, but thought fit to dissemble them, in remembrance of the kindnesses he had received from that prince, when his affairs were in a desperate situation. On the other hand, the grand duke having consented to evacuate the islands that he held on the coast of Provence, upon the king's confessing a debt of two hundred thousand crowns, and giving him twelve such hostages as he should name for the payment of it in four years; he, by a letter to Henry, renounced this last condition, merely because he understood it was very disagreeable to him. This treaty was concluded <sup>c</sup> within the same period of time, and by the execution of it, together with that of Vervins, put the king in full possession of all the territories belonging to the crown of France. Before the close of the year the king made many excellent regulations in his finances, disbanded a great part of his troops, provided against the accidents this might have occasioned, satisfied the clergy of France on their remonstrances, and escaped from a dangerous fever that brought him to the brink of the grave, about the same time that his old antagonist, Philip the second, actually sunk into it, and thereby secured the continuance of that
- d peace which had been lately made; for his son was not of a temper to undertake the revival of a war, which had almost exhausted his dominions <sup>d</sup>; and if it had not been for some of his father's old ministers, the duke of Lerma was inclined to leave the rest of Europe in quiet.

- AT the opening of the year, the king, by the advice of the baron de Rhosny, remitted the taxes that were due, to the amount of twenty millions <sup>e</sup>. The minister very wisely observed, that the king might as well have the credit of giving what could never be paid, and at the same time make it an argument for his frugality, in the maintenance of his court, and in the gratifications of his favourites. It was the maxim of Rhosny, that, in the management of the treasury, there was not so much need of a great genius and long experience, as of a clear head and an honest heart. He practised every method possible to bring his master out of debt, and to maintain the state honourably, without oppressing the people <sup>f</sup>. It was the great commendation of the king that these talents made his minister acceptable to him; for he was truly the father of his people. He was very tender in taking from them, and had the highest satisfaction at seeing them thrive. The baron de Rhosny was not content with being a good œconomist, and doing his duty with the utmost fidelity; he would go still farther, and make the king master of his own affairs; and this, notwithstanding the quickness of his temper, which would not allow him to attend to any thing long <sup>g</sup>. Rhosny digested the whole system of the finances into tables, by the help of which the king saw, in a very narrow compass, all the different branches of his revenue and of his expence. It is inconceivable
- f in how short a time this able man drew exact order out of that chaos in which these affairs had been involved by his predecessors. He levied the revenue in the shortest and least expensive manner possible; for he held that every person so employed was a man lost to the public, and yet maintained by the public. He reduced all the expences of the government; but at the same time he paid every body punctually, and took care that the king should have such a reserve, as not to be obliged on any emergency to have recourse either to new impositions upon his people, or to make use of credit <sup>h</sup>. This is a succinct representation of this great minister's administration, to which we shall add but one circumstance more, that, instead of making this ministry useful to himself, by gaining friends, he never hesitated at making himself enemies, by standing between his master and those importunate courtiers who were perpetually craving, in a degree out of all proportion to their merit <sup>i</sup>. Under the reign of Henry his enemies were unable to hurt him. In the next, they had credit enough to a remove him from his employment, in consequence of which the finances soon fell back into the same perplexity and confusion out of which he had brought them.

THE marriage of the archduke Albert, to the Infanta, induced the king to hasten that of his sister with the duke of Bar, which, however, was attended with some difficulties, on account of the difference of religion, which had induced the pope to write to the duke against it, and prevented the obtaining a dispensation, notwithstanding which the king caused it to be celebrated by their natural brother Charles de Bourbon, archbishop of Rouen. The princess, however, notwithstanding this marriage, and her promise to be instructed, lived and died a zealous and sincere Protestant, without issue, and without felicity. Before she left France, she pressed the king extremely to procure the verification of the edict of Nantes, b in favour of the Protestants<sup>k</sup>. It had been delayed till the departure of the Pope's legate, and this delay had given time to some warm spirits amongst the clergy to raise a vehement opposition against it, more especially to one of the clauses, which permitted the Protestants to invite what strangers they thought proper to assist at their synods, without demanding any permission from the crown, which had been put in to gratify the duke de Bouillon, and was penned in such a manner as gave the popish clergy but too much advantage. The king therefore caused it to be modified, with the consent of the Protestants, many of whom disliked it at the time, and, with a few other restrictions, obliged the parliament to register it, in the same manner he had done the edict in relation to the duke of Mayenne. But tho' his commands were peremptory, the reasons he gave for them were conclusive, and c such as, in the sentiments of impartial persons, rendered it evident he had not the gratification of the protestants more in view, than the peace and welfare of his subjects in general<sup>l</sup>. Some historians say<sup>m</sup>, that his sister would not leave Paris till she had seen this great work accomplished, which it was in the month of February. The king was not so successful in respect to his divorce and marriage, which he had for some time meditated, and which, in reality, were rather the schemes of the man than of the king. He was desirous of obtaining from the pope the dissolution of his marriage with Margaret, sister to the late king, to which that princess was not at all averse, and to which she afterwards consented. But at present, being informed that the king designed to replace her by marrying the duchess d of Beaufort, she positively declared that she would give it all the opposition in her power. The pope likewise expressed an extreme aversion to so strange, and, in some respects, so absurd a project, from which, however, the king never departed, till he was released from the importunities of the lady, by her unfortunate death<sup>n</sup>, which he deplored with great violence; but, like all things violent, his grief was but of short duration (D). His courtiers, out

(D) It was the great foible of Henry the fourth, that his intrigues had such an influence upon his conduct, that it is impossible to render the history of his reign, in any tolerable degree, intelligible, without entering into that of his amours. This lady, of whom we are to speak in the present note, was the daughter of Anthony d'Estrees, Seigneur de Cœuvres lez Soissons, master of the artillery (or, as we stile them, master of the ordnance), and of Frances Babou de la Bourdaciere. Monf. d'Estrees was a man of honour, and was extremely shocked at the ill conduct of his wife, who had an intrigue with the marquis d'Alegre Mcillan, governor of Issoire in Auvergne, and was murdered in a tumult raised against her gallant. The sister of madame d'Estrees, whose name was Isabel, espoused the marquis de Sourdis, and, in the life-time of her husband, was the declared mistress of the chancellor Monsieur de Chiverni: as for the fair Gabrielle her niece, the king's amour with her commenced in the year 1591, to which her father opposed his authority as far as it was in his power; but the young lady's inclinations, and the counsels of her aunt madame de Sourdis, soon put her in the king's power, who is said to have run strange hazards for her sake, and whose passion certainly brought his person sometimes into danger, his authority more frequently, and his reputation always. We find her mentioned by so many names in the French history, that an ordinary reader may be easily confounded: sometimes she is called La belle Gabrielle, or, The fair Gabrielle, in respect to her beauty; sometimes mademoiselle de Cœuvres, from her father's title, more frequently madame de Leincourt, and madame de la Roche Guyon, on account of her marriage with Nicholas d'Amerval Seigneur de Leincourt, and de la Roche Guyon, afterwards marchioness de Monceaux, and duchess de Beaufort, titles bestowed upon her by the king. According to some writers she had a great share in Henry's conversion; it is certain, that she was present at it, which was very indecent. The league had thoughts of making use of this lady to remove the king, even after his conversion, and on this score, one of their preachers was reprimanded for declaiming against the king's scandalous life with her. Henry was so little master of himself and of his passions, that he sent for her to the siege of Amiens; but the clamours of the army, and the bold remonstrances of the marshal de Biron, obliged him to remove her. On the death of Monsieur St. Luk, she procured for her father the post of master of the ordnance, but with great difficulty, because the king intended it for the baron de Rhosny. We are told by this great man, that the king resisted her caresses and tears, but, upon her threatening to go into a convent, he yielded; but he does not tell us, which, nevertheless, is true, that the father of Monsieur d'Estrees had that office, which he discharged very honourably, and that the conferring it upon his son was universally applauded. She was extremely ambitious of being queen; and this is supposed to have been one great motive for her pressing the king to become a Catholic, because, without the interposition of the pope's authority, and that too in several points, it was absolutely impossible. The king himself was much bent upon it. He mentioned it to cardinal de Medicis, when a out of complaisance, approved what the meanest of his faithful subjects had sense enough to deplore.

It is absolutely necessary, how little soever it may correspond with the dignity of history; to proceed in our account of the king's amours, because the effects of them produced some of the most remarkable events in his reign. In three weeks after the decease of the duchess of Beaufort, which delivered him out of one of the greatest perplexities he had ever known, he ran himself into fresh difficulties, by commencing an intrigue with Henrietta Balsac de Etragues, the daughter of the famous madame Touche, who became the mother of the count d'Auvergne by Charles the ninth. In order to obtain this lady, he gave her a promise of marriage; and, which is still stranger, he shewed this promise, before he delivered it, to b Monsieur de Rhosny, who, without much ceremony, tore it. The king asked him if he was turned fool? "If I am, Sir," said he, "you have shewn in writing that you are a greater. I have done what it became your faithful servant to do; and you do, Sire, what it does not become a great king to do." Notwithstanding this, the king wrote and gave her another promise; and, from his countenance for some days, Rhosny looked upon himself as disgraced, and was of that opinion when the king surprized him, by adding to his former employments that of master of the ordnance<sup>p</sup>. In the mean time the business of the divorce went on as well as the king could wish it at Rome; queen Margaret, on the death of the duchess of Beaufort, having done all that the king could desire to forward it, and the pope having directed a commission to his nuncio and two other prelates, they, upon

c the queen's declaring that she was violently compelled by the king her brother to espouse the then king of Navarre, to which she never gave her consent, the marriage was declared void, and the parties permitted to marry again<sup>q</sup>. Arnold d'Ossat, now raised to the purple, and Monsieur de Sillery, negotiated this affair, and afterwards the marriage of the king to Mary de Medicis, niece to the grand duke of Tuscany<sup>r</sup>. It was concluded sooner than he expected; but, when he found it was so, he entered into it with a good grace, and declared, that, as it was necessary for the welfare of his subjects, he was content to marry; though his minister tells us, that this monarch, whom all the dangers of war could not affright, and for conspiring against whose life no less than three monks had suffered this very year, trembled at d not fail to excite them.

THE persons who were at present about the king, and had the principal share in his confidence, were the chancellor Pompone de Bellievre, to whom the king had given the seals on when legate in France; but he heard it so coolly, that, when the king sent Monsieur de Sillery to Rome to press his divorce, he was particularly instructed not to mention it to this cardinal. When the king was taken ill at her house at Monceaux, she pressed him exceedingly, and obtained such assurances, that it appears from her discourses with madame de Rhosny, that she considered it as a thing certain. Her death was as remarkable as her life; she had accompanied the king to Fontainebleau, and passed with him there the greatest part of Lent, being at that time big with child; but the king, considering the scandal that would attend her remaining with him, during passion week, prevailed upon her to return to Paris; the reason of the thing induced her to consent, and the king conducted her as far as Milun; but, when she came to part with him, she recommended her children, her domestics, and all that belonged to her, with such earnestness, as if she had known she should never see him more. On her arrival at Paris, she went to the house of Sebastian Zamet, a native of Lucca, who had been long employed in the finances, and, for his pleasant temper, was in great favour with the king. It is a feature of the times worth knowing, that when this man married his daughter, and the notary came to draw the contract, he asked him how he wrote himself, lord of—? "As for that matter," answered Zamet, who on the side of family had nothing to boast, "write me lord of seventeen hundred thousand crowns," by which surname he went ever after. She was treated at his house with all possible attention, and every thing provided for her that she had been observed to like. One day, eating a citron after dinner, she felt herself extremely ill; however, becoming something better, she went to vespers, but, at her return, walking in the garden, she had a stroke of an apoplexy. As soon as she came a little to herself, she desired to be carried to the house of her aunt madame de Sourdis, where she died in violent convulsions in the month of April. The populace, and even some who should have been wiser, because her face was twisted in a very strange manner, and her body became a most hideous spectacle as soon as she was dead, concluded that she was strangled by the devil. Mexeray and other writers intimate that she was poisoned; Clement the eighth ascribed her death to a particular providence in his own prayers, foreseeing the miseries of France in case the king had married her, and insisted on the legitimation of his children by her, which was indeed one of the strangest projects that ever came into a wise man's head. She is said to have had many amiable qualities, and not to have been so generally hated as modern writers report. As to her marriage to Monsieur de Liencourt, a man of great quality and very rich, but withal very deformed, it was an artifice of the king's to get her out of the power of her father; but this marriage was never consummated, and was afterwards dissolved. She was far from being a woman of great capacity, was exceedingly addicted to astrology, though continually tormented with the apprehension of those miseries that were foretold her. The king had by her Cesar duke de Vendosme, born in June 1594, and who died at Paris, October 22d 1665. Alexander, grand prior of France, who died in 1629. Catherine Henrietta, who espoused Charles of Lorraine, duke de Elbeuf, and died in 1663.

the death of Monsieur de Chiverni, a man of extensive parts and incorruptible probity; Monsieur Silleri, whom he had sent to Rome; the president Jeanin, and the baron de Rhesny; men every way equal to the king's intention of restoring order and justice through all parts of his dominions, repairing all the ravages which were caused by the civil war, and abolishing all those innovations that had been made either to the prejudice of the prerogative of the crown, or the welfare of the people. These schemes, how just, how necessary soever in themselves, were not acceptable to all the world, and were more especially displeasing to those great lords who did not care to be put in mind that there was such a thing as duty, or that they had any superior. Amongst these might be reckoned the constable Montmorency, the marshal duke de Bouillon, the dukes of Tremouille and Montpensier. But the duke of Espernon exceeded them all in his discontents, and was himself exceeded by the marshal duke de Biron, whose head was so turned with vanity, that he could no longer endure the thoughts of being a subject; and there is the less reason to wonder that he lost part of the reverence due to his king, when he made no difficulty of preferring his own military skill and valour to those of Alexander and Cæsar.

Savoy comes to the French court.

THE agents of the duke of Savoy had acquainted their master with all that passed, and more especially with these appearances of discontent amongst the *grande*es, that he might avail himself of their misunderstandings. The duke, who had already treated the pope in such a manner as obliged him to lay aside the character of arbitrator, with which he was invested by the treaty of Vervins, in regard to the marquisate of Saluces, took a sudden resolution to make a tour to the court of France, in which he had two great points in view; the first was to try if he could cajole the king and his ministers, so as to obtain from them the country in dispute, with which, at all events, he was determined never to part; and the other to form a party amongst the malecontents in France, in case his first design failed<sup>a</sup>. Henry would willingly have avoided this visit; but the duke piqued himself so much upon his skill in negotiation, and flattered himself so much with the hopes of making partizans in the French court, that nothing could divert him from his project. He was received with all possible marks of respect, treated with the utmost politeness and magnificence, and the duke, on his side, exceeded in all respects the notions that had been entertained of him<sup>b</sup>. He made his court to the king with equal address and assiduity, without the least intermixture of meanness or of flattery; he conversed with all the great men about the court with much ease and affability, without departing from his dignity; he made presents to the value of four hundred thousand crowns; and, in short, omitted nothing that was possible for him to do towards carrying his point, and yet without advancing it at all. He was a full month at court before the king mentioned any thing of business; and at length, when they came to treat, he told him plainly, that the restitution of the marquisate of Saluces was what he expected, or an equivalent<sup>c</sup>. This seemed to please the duke best; and he proposed first one, and then another. At length a treaty was signed at Paris, about the middle of February, by which the duke stipulated to restore the marquisate of Saluces, or to yield to the king the equivalent therein expressed, and to make his option by the first of June<sup>d</sup>. As for the manner of this negotiation, the king and his ministers had very little reason to expect that the duke would carry it into execution: there wanted not some who advised Henry to secure that prince's person, as the most effectual means of procuring the marquisate of Saluces without a war. But the king declared that he would imitate the conduct of Francis the first, and not break his faith for the sake of any advantage. He gave the duke to understand as much; who thereupon laid aside all thoughts of making his escape, and, in the beginning of March, set out for his dominions, the king and the whole court accompanying him as far as the bridge of Charenton, and sending the baron de Lux to wait on him to the frontiers<sup>e</sup>. On his arrival at Bourg in Bresses, which was then a part of his dominions, he wrote a letter of thanks to his majesty, and then continued his journey to Chambery, where he remained till the 20th of March, and then went to Turin<sup>f</sup>, where he promised to give the king's ministers their definitive answer.

Henry makes war on the duke of Savoy.

THE duke who, while he was at the court of France, had laboured to persuade the king and his ministers that he was intirely detached from Spain, and had even insinuated, that he should not be averse to see Henry revive his pretensions to the duchy of Milan, no sooner returned home than he sent his chancellor to Madrid, to demand the protection of Philip the third, and his assistance, in case of a rupture<sup>g</sup>. At first he was coldly treated, and had some broad hints given him of the overtures made by his master while at Paris; but upon his denying them, the Spanish ministry altered their language, gave him strong assurances of support, and sent the necessary orders for that purpose to the conde Fuentes, governor of Milan. In consequence of this the duke demanded first a delay, when summoned to <sup>a</sup> make his option, and at length declared that the treaty of Paris was too hard, and that he could not think of carrying it into execution <sup>a</sup>. The king who had taken his measures in the mean time, caused Bresse, Savoy, and the county of Nice, to be attacked all at a time. The first of these countries was entirely reduced by the marshal duke de Biron, except the citadel of Bourg <sup>b</sup>. Chamberry and the best part of Savoy was likewise carried without much resistance. But the duke of Guise failed in his attempt to surprize the castle of Nice. All these transactions happened within the compass of the month of August. In the beginning of September the king took Miolans. Lefdiguières made himself master of Conflans, which opened a passage into the Tarentaise and of Charbonnerie <sup>c</sup>, which gave him an entrance into the valley of Maurienne, both of which he reduced, and was then recalled, to satisfy the jealousy of the marshal de Biron; but what astonished the duke most was the reduction of Montmélian, which he looked upon to be impregnable: but the baron de Rhosny, whom the king had assured of this, upon his telling him, in jest, that the new cast cannon he saw was for the siege of that place, found means to carry six of them to the top of what had been thought an inaccessible mountain, from whence he battered the place, which so amazed the governor, that he promised to surrender, if he was not relieved in a certain time. The duke marched with a body of fifteen thousand good troops to relieve the place, and the king likewise marched to give him battle; but the snow falling, prevented it, and the place surrendered <sup>d</sup>. This was followed by a fresh misfortune; marshal Biron, in the depth of winter, took fort St. Catherine, another of the duke's impregnable places, which he had fortified, at an immense expence, in order to bridle the city of Geneva, and which, at the request of the inhabitants of that city, the king caused to be demolished <sup>e</sup>. This chagrined the duke exceedingly; however, as he had entered rashly into the war, he was constrained to think in earnest of getting out of it, for which he was indebted to the mediation of the pope.

AFTER the reduction of fort St. Catherine, the king resolved to go to Lyons, where the princess of Florence had waited for him a week <sup>f</sup>. Bellegarde, master of the horse, and a great favourite of the king's had been sent to demand her at Florence; he carried with him the king's powers to the grand duke to espouse his niece, as the king's proxy, which he did on the 5th of October. After prodigious rejoicings, and a great display of magnificence, the galleys of Florence, the pope, and the order of Malta, brought the queen to Marseilles, where she landed on the 2d of November, accompanied by the grand duchess of Florence her aunt, the duchess of Mantua her sister, Don Antonio de Medicis her brother, and several other persons of high quality; she was received there by the constable, the chancellor, the dukes of Nemours, Ventadour, with the duke of Guise, as governor of the province, four cardinals, and many princesses and ladies of the court, who accompanied her to Aix, from thence to Avignon, and then, by the way of Vienne, to Lyons, where, on the king's arrival, the marriage was celebrated by the cardinal legate Aldobrandi <sup>g</sup>. But in the midst of all the pleasures and diversions that attended a ceremony of this kind, in respect to which, tho' naturally frugal, the king suffered no expence to be spared, the great affairs of state went on, and particularly the treaty with the duke of Savoy, which was chiefly negotiated by the cardinal legate. The king was desirous of peace, which was absolutely necessary to the duke, and the pope also had his reasons to have it concluded without delay, which, notwithstanding, they were all inclined to dissemble <sup>h</sup>. The address with which they acted their several parts caused at length the whole negotiation to be suspended; but, by the skill of the baron de Rhosny, it was again revived, and brought to such a conclusion as the king desired <sup>i</sup>.

He marries the princess Mary de Medicis, niece to the duke of Florence.

A. D. 1600.

IN the whole French history there is scarce any instance of a war undertaken with more spirit, prosecuted with greater skill, or ended with more success; and it was, in a great measure, owing to this, that it was the last foreign war in this reign. But there is a secret as well as a public history of these transactions, necessary to make them thoroughly understood, since from a bare detail of events it should seem that the duke of Savoy, contrary to his character of being one of the ablest and shrewdest politicians of his time, entered into it rashly, conducted it weakly, and consequently was easily vanquished, which, in reality, was far from being the case. We have mentioned the reasons which induced him to make a tour to the French court, he mentioned them himself a little too plainly, when he said he came thither not to reap but to sow <sup>k</sup>. He did indeed sow, and had the prospect of a fair harvest, tho' it deceived his hopes. He saw but few troops, and the difficulty made of shewing him arsenals and magazines induced him to conclude them empty; and besides, from the parsimony of Rhosny, he entertained a notion that the treasury must be exhausted. an enemy in this situation, he thought, there was little to fear. He was thoroughly informed <sup>a</sup> of the factions in France, and, from the vivacity of their chiefs, he took it for granted, that, if a war broke out abroad, it would produce various insurrections at home. He relied upon the strength of his own places, well fortified, abundantly provided, and filled with numerous garrisons. Besides, he depended much on the impression made by his liberality. It was scarce to be believed, and yet so it proved, that he was deceived in every one of them, by the vigilance and activity chiefly of the baron de Rhosny, who, in his character of a minister, advised the war, and, as master of the ordnance, conducted the sieges<sup>1</sup>. Marshal Biron was in his interest, and at first endeavoured to serve him; but, when once in arms, his vanity prompted him to make conquests. His friends were continually about the king, and did for him all they could: but Henry understood the trade of war better than any of them; and <sup>b</sup> Lefdiguieres and Rhosny served him with such spirit and fidelity as baffled all their attempts. At the very opening of the war, there was a woman proposed to a great prince of the blood, whose discontents ran very high, to poison the king; but, instead of encouraging he disclosed the treason, for which she was burnt alive<sup>m</sup>. The Spaniards likewise, tho' they promised much, performed little; and, after all, the power of the duke was by no means equal to his project, and could not at all bear him out after so many disappointments. His great losses determined him to make a disadvantageous peace, and his chagrin on this engaged him to continue his intrigues, in hopes of recovering by them what he had lost by the war. The good fortune of Henry inspired him with fresh courage, so that he applied himself, with greater assiduity than ever, to put his affairs in a good posture at home, and to support <sup>c</sup> the honour of the crown he wore, in such a manner as might secure him respect abroad. He knew that upon this depended not only his grandeur but his safety.

Henry goes to Calais to crown the archduke, who was besieging Ostend.

An insult offered to the count de la Rochepot at Valladolid embroiled him with the court of Spain; but the pope seasonably interposed, and procured such satisfaction as the king desired. The count de Fuentes had some correspondencies at Marseilles, which, being discovered, were prevented. The archduke Albert, notwithstanding his placid character, had likewise entered into some intrigues for surprising Metz, which met with the like fate<sup>n</sup>. On that prince's besieging Ostend, the king thought fit to make a tour to Calais, that it might appear he was ready to defend his frontiers in case of any new attempt. This was in the month of August; and it happened that queen Elizabeth was then at Dover, from whence <sup>d</sup> she sent Sir Thomas Edmonds to compliment him, and by Sir Thomas a letter, with which he was extremely pleased<sup>o</sup>. He sent over the baron de Rhosny, not in a public character, but as if he had taken that step out of curiosity; but, however, this gave him an opportunity of seeing and discoursing with the queen, whose abilities made a great impression on him, and to whom he said all that could be said to confirm her friendship for his master<sup>p</sup>. Some writers<sup>q</sup> say that she was very desirous of an interview with the king himself; which, however, considering her great age, and the state of her affairs at that juncture, is not very probable.

Marshal Biron sent over to compliment the queen of England.

THE king also sent over marshal Biron, with a train of one hundred and fifty noblemen and gentlemen, to express the sense he had of the queen's attention and respect. At the <sup>e</sup> time of his arrival the queen was gone to Basing, whither he followed her, and met with a most gracious reception. Amongst those persons of distinction who were with him, she took particular notice of the count de Auvergne and Monsieur Crequi, the son-in-law of Lefdiguieres<sup>r</sup>. She had a very long, and, if what is reported of it be true, a very singular, conference with the marshal himself, to whom she spoke at large of the insolence of the earl of Essex, who had been executed in the month of February preceding; adding, at the same time, that her brother Henry would do well, on a like occasion, to imitate her firmness, and not to risque his safety or his authority by an ill-timed clemency<sup>s</sup>: as to what some writers<sup>t</sup> report, that the queen should shew him the head of Essex either in her closet or in the tower, it is altogether idle and ridiculous, since it is very certain that the earl's head was <sup>f</sup> buried with his body. It is justly observed by Camden<sup>u</sup>, that the queen might enter into some particulars regarding the earl of Essex, with an intention to divert the marshal from persisting in those dangerous intrigues, which, in a few months after, brought the like fate upon himself. At his return the marshal found the king at Fontainebleau, where, on the 27th of September, the queen was delivered of the Dauphin<sup>v</sup>, to whom the pope, being sponsor, gave the name of Louis. The propensity to astrology was so strong at this time in France, that the king engaged his principal physician La Riviere to calculate his son's nativity, upon which he pronounced a very mysterious and unintelligible judgment. The duke of Savoy had been engaged in the war that was so fatal to him by his credulity in this very point,

- a which was still more fatal to the marshal duke de Biron, and from which even the wife and great duke of Sulli was not wholly free <sup>a</sup>. The birth of the young prince occasioned great joy in France, where they had not seen a Dauphin born for four score years <sup>b</sup>. It was also of very great importance to the king's affairs; and by fixing the succession, gave them, in a manner, a new face both at home and abroad, but at the same time it quickened the conspirators in their measures, and their precipitancy exposed them to those discoveries which were very soon after made. It is also remarkable that Anne of Austria, daughter to Philip the third, who became the consort of Lewis, was born but five days before him. Henry made his queen a present of Monceaux upon this occasion, and the city of Paris gave her likewise a fine suit of tapestry, both being promised in case she brought a son <sup>c</sup>.
- b THE king caused a royal chamber to be erected for making a strict enquiry into the mismanagement of such officers as had been intrusted with the receipt of his revenue, which raised great expectations, and performed very little. The baron de Rhosny, afterwards duke de Sulli, attributes this to their not being at liberty to punish otherwise than by fine. But another historian assures us, that not only the guilty paid largely, but the innocent also, and for this reason he puts it upon the same foot with an inquisition of the like kind in the reign of Henry the third; and adds, that it was likewise copied in the succeeding reign <sup>a</sup>. The Grand Signor Mohammed the third sent over a French renegado, whom some historians dignify with the title of an ambassador, who was intrusted to demand three things; first, That the king would not enter into the league which the pope was endeavouring to form amongst the Christian princes against the Porte. The second, To use his interest with the emperor, in order to dispose him to a truce: and the third, That he would recall his vassal the duke of Mercœur, who commanded the armies of the emperor in Hungary. The king gave general answers to the two first points; and, with respect to the last, declared it was out of his power; for tho' the duke of Mercœur was his vassal, he was likewise the vassal of the emperor, who from thence derived a right to his service <sup>b</sup>. It is highly probable that the duke of Mercœur was not very well pleased with his situation in France, and was therefore glad of so honourable an occasion of shewing his courage and military skill against the Infidels, where he gained a very high reputation. He was accompanied in this expedition by the duke of Nevers, and died the year following at Nuremberg <sup>c</sup>, in his way to France, where he was coming to recruit his forces. At this juncture the young nobility in France were of so martial a disposition, and so desirous of learning the art of war, that many of the Protestants went into the army of the states, and the prince de Joinville did the like in the army of the archduke <sup>d</sup>. It is not impossible that this was looked upon in a favourable light at court, as it employed those warm spirits that might have been otherwise troublesome at home.
- c WE have before mentioned the strange disposition of marshal Biron, his discontent, and his intrigues, which were better known to the baron de Rhosny than to any other of the king's ministers. After the war of Savoy the marshal demanded of the king a gratification of thirty thousand crowns, which was very frankly given. When he came to consult with Rhosny the manner of receiving it, for the state of the treasury was such that it could not be paid at once, the minister paid him half in ready money, and assured him of the remainder in a year. The marshal seemed to be very well satisfied, but turned all his gratitude towards the minister who paid, and not to the prince from whom it came. Rhosny instead of accepting his compliments, endeavoured to set him right in his judgment, which, in appearance, the marshal seemed to receive very well; but from this conversation Rhosny entertained such an idea of him, that he thought it his duty to acquaint the king with the necessity there was of his being upon his guard against a man of the marshal's turn, whom no obligations could restrain, and whose talents rendered him very capable of executing whatever his resentments, well or ill founded, might dictate. The king told him that he thought he knew Biron better than any man; that his great foible was vanity; and that, tho' very capable of lip treason, yet, in the midst of his extravagancies, he would be as ready and as zealous in his service as ever. That instead, therefore, of disgracing or estranging this malecontent from business, the only way to keep him out of mischief was to employ him <sup>e</sup>. It was with this view that the king sent him over to England the last year, and it was with the like view that he employed him in another negotiation at the beginning of this; a negotiation of infinite consequence to the French monarchy, and which hitherto had not been very far advanced even by the ablest negotiator. It was renewing the alliance with the Swiss cantons, which, from the difficulty that attended it, the king was very desirous of putting upon a new basis, and to stipulate not only for his own time, but for the reign of the Dauphin <sup>f</sup>. The consequence and the difficulty of the business were equally great, more especially as it was known that the traversing of this alliance was the capital point both of the king of Spain and of the duke of Savoy, the former a very potent, the latter the most politic prince, at this time. The a statesmen hitherto employed had, with all their reasonings, made no great progress; the sending Biron shewed the king's penetration, and that he really knew him better than any body, perhaps better than he knew himself. His martial disposition, his open artless manner of talking, his frankness, generosity, and magnificence, wrought upon the Swiss, and gave such weight to his arguments, that they could refuse him nothing. In short, he carried his point, the terms of the treaty were settled, the reducing it into form was to be left to others.

 This, as the French historians <sup>b</sup> truly say, was the last, but not the least important, service that Biron rendered the king, and, which is still more, the crown of France; therefore we need not be surprized that, having thus spent the spring, it seems a little hard and ungrateful that the king should cause the head of this great man to be struck off a little after midsum- b
 mer. But, to judge rationally, we must consider facts, and, at the same time, take into our view the circumstances attending them.

The strange disorder of public affairs,
 and the causes
 of this embairassment.

At a time when, through the good intentions of the king, and the intense application of his minister, it might have been expected that public affairs should have worn a favourable aspect, it was evident, even to vulgar eyes, that they never were either more obscured, or more embarrassed <sup>c</sup>. Indistinct rumours prevailed through the provinces, the king lost his usual good humour, the court had nothing in it of gaiety; councils met often, and were long assembled, without people's knowing the true causes, which gave occasion to a variety of rumours that heightened the general perplexity <sup>d</sup>. All this did not rise from the same motives; the king met with fresh sources of uneasiness, which ever way he turned. Seve- c ral of the great lords retired, some to their governments, some to their estates. The clergy complained that bishopricks and benefices were bestowed at the recommendation of women, and sometimes upon children; the nobility and gentry that they were little considered;
 and that, since the settlement of the kingdom, the men of the long robe had engrossed all employments, and with them the king's favour. The Hugonots were as much discontented as any. They thought that the king was estranged from them, and that whatever respect was shewn them arose more from fear than inclination. The bulk of the people began to murmur. Amongst other impositions laid by the assembly at Rouen, there was one called the pancart, which was held in universal execration <sup>e</sup>. It consisted in levying a sous in the livre upon all kinds of provisions that entered into cities and great towns; and a pancart, or d table, shewing after what rate these sums were to be collected, was hung up at every gate.
 Insurrections happened in several places; the king went to Blois, and from thence to Poitiers, that he might put an end to these murmurs. His presence and some acts of severity had that effect; the new imposition was every-where levied, and immediately upon this an edict issued, in which, after acknowledging and applauding his subjects submission, the king abolished the tax <sup>f</sup>. He was rather to be pitied than censured for imposing it. His debts were immense; his revenue did not much exceed a million sterling <sup>g</sup>: demands came from every quarter, and the king was treated as false and ungrateful for not doing what was not in his power to do, and which his endeavouring to do had raised this general discontent.
 But, besides, he was apprised of the intrigues carried on by Spanish emissaries in several e provinces; he saw suspicious armaments by land and sea, and his allies were also dissatisfied.
 He was convinced that several of his own subjects had conspired against his person and government; and, when he came to look more closely into it, he saw reason to doubt whether he had a friend left, the list of the malecontents was so numerous <sup>h</sup>, and the baron de Rhosny's name stood there amongst the rest. In the midst of all these troubles, that which he feared most fell upon him, a domestic quarrel <sup>i</sup>, which once rose so high, that he had thoughts of parting with the queen, or at least of obliging her to discard all her Italians, people equally hateful and hated in France. He was dissuaded from this by the baron de Rhosny, and, at the time he gave him the advice, Henry told him he would repent it.

A length the king gains an exact account of the conspiracy, and resolves to seize on Biron.

It was at Poitiers that things came to such extremities, and from thence, upon some f fresh discoveries, the king suddenly returned to Fountainbleau, fully resolved to extricate himself out of these difficulties and dangers by some stroke of vigour; and how necessary this was, and with what reluctance he took that determination, appeared evidently from the general concurrence of the best informed writers of those times, and is put beyond all doubt by the dispatches of the English ministers at his court, in which he is treated as a suspicious, timid, mutable prince, much inclined to fear, and whose anger was not much to be feared <sup>p</sup>.
 A strange character of Henry the fourth! But, if we consider, that those who gave it must have been governed entirely by appearances, and that they could not possibly have the lights we have now, it will appear some-what less strange. On the other hand, the king and <sup>a</sup> his ministers were not without their faults, the dissolute life that he led (it would be well if princes would consider this) of necessity rendered him contemptible ; but while kings are men, what they do as men will affect their characters as kings. The baron de Rhosny was a great minister and an honest man, but he was austere in his temper, haughty in his manners, and had too little complaisance either to his master or to his subjects. Besides all this, the grievances before mentioned were far from being imaginary ; and however necessary taxes may be, they are nevertheless burthensome to those who feel them. The duke of Bouillon told the king this upon his expostulating with him, being one of those of whom he had the most suspicion. The king, for this reason, pressed him to remain at court for some time ; he, with great dexterity, offered to go and put his private affairs in order, that he might remain continually about his person, and under this pretence he got out of his reach <sup>1</sup>. The duke d'Espernon acted a wiser and greater part. When the king made him the same proposition, he closed with it readily ; and, without making any compliment, said he would stay with his majesty six months ; and that if, in this space, the prospect did not clear, he would leave his two sons as hostages for his behaviour : the king was satisfied, and the duke performed punctually what he promised <sup>2</sup>. The great point was to get the marshal Biron into his hands, of whose treasons he had abundant evidence ; La Fin, who had been the principal instrument in conducting them, having made his peace by an ample discovery, the truth of which he justified by producing original papers in the duke's own hand <sup>3</sup>, which had been committed to his care, that they might remain safe. The duke had another agent at court, <sup>c</sup> the baron de Lux, who was very faithful to him, and whom the king took care to amuse, as La Fin likewise did, by assuring him that he had imposed upon the ministers by false informations, and that the marshal had nothing to do but to make use of the time he had gained to put his affairs into such a condition, as that, notwithstanding the king's suspicions, he might have nothing to fear <sup>4</sup>. This was the situation of the king, who, notwithstanding, was very far from determining in his own mind the destruction of a man who had entered into measures for destroying him.
